"For not having those two lads, we would have made a serious blunder."

dancing to watch Angelina Michon as she went to do her scouting work close to the enemy's lines from their own place of concealment, and as she went through a small wood, Violet, and her sisters took in the view before them. Angelina pines in the meantime was directing her followers to maneuver, and while doing so was exclaiming "you well—body whirling, hands and feet flying as a signal of some kind. Little as Violet and her sisters knew of the party, of motion it appeared clear to their somewhat untoward astonished eyes that this very fairy was one of the few with the natural gift of translating feeling—joy or excitement in motion, when in reality she was signalling in motion to her scouts the command "halt" which by movement they alone understood. They nevertheless recalled general Vivian's remark about "The dancing spy fairy." While they were still staring almost spellbound the fairy suddenly disappeared. The flying arms, and the flying feet suddenly shot into positions most demure and Angelina Michon no longer the fairy was a walking along with a no-demeanor which was plainly more than natural, and was as near the enemy's lines as she had dared to go.

Yet unknown Angelina Michon by this unusual stunt had illustrated illustrated to Violet, and her sisters the saying of the prestidigitator "We move so quickly we deceive the eye." Yet none of the enemy had observed her, and the boy and girl scouts who observed her apparently graceful movements had suddenly halted in scattered groups and suddenly alived out of sight, the moment she suddenly stopped her movement. Angelina Michon of course was unusual in her ways, full of cheerfulness in face of all trials, crosses and difficulties, fearless, strong, crafty and as shy as a phantom panther. However she was joyous she nevertheless would express it by many of her well known graceful actions, which only those who know her would distinguish from joy, and dignity, but if she was angry, she was as ferocious and as uncontrollable as an untamed tigress despite her age and smallness. Therefore the enemy feared her, and though great rewards were offered for her capture none of the enemy dared to lay their hands upon her secretly or openly and to surprise her was as surprising a sight which lays before you have a chance to fire.

ANGELINE AND LINE RICHES VISIT
CLOSE TO THE GLANDOLPHIAN CAMP.....

Angeline Riches in the ensuing six or seven minutes must have missed anything she wanted to observe, it was not a uncommon for her to look in every direction to get a view of an opening, but none she could see. She felt that she would rather miss many a supper than fail in her quest now. She not only strove to observe some point of entrance for Violet, and her sisters to enter the enemy lines, but she retained everything she saw. But as yet she did not see anything to pick up, even though her memory was unusual. On one occasion during these few minutes an cautious going forward a little closer, she heard an also quickly darted behind a tree to escape observation, a military voice. It was the voice of Angeline Jennings, somewhere, at some distance to her right. Angeline picked up, and for nearly five minutes listened. It was not her intention of course to play the eaves dropper. But Angeline Jennings was not engaged in actual conversation, she was giving directions to a number of girl scouts, for it seemed evident she had discovered something, she was saying something to them and whatever it was it made Angeline Riches feel as if she was glad in and the owner of the "Wonderful Lamp".

The flow of language was so easy, the words were so well chosen, the sentences so satisfying that at first Angeline Riches believed she must be reading, but on second thought she rejected the inference, no child of her age could read with such fluency as any and so natural. This strange and most curious seemed to have committed some entire story to her memory. After a time Angeline Riches made her way over to where she was. A circle of girl scouts stood around her was giving a spellbound at Angeline Jennings their spellbinder. All of them paid strict attention to her with wide open eyes and aglow mouths as if listening to some very exciting and stirring fairy tale. Indeed here was Romance in its primitive innocence. Angeline Riches was hesitating as to interrupt her when little Miss Jennings in a mad gesture intended to signify what she was explaining among partly raised, and suddenly observed Angeline Riches watching her.

"Oh there you are Riches dear. I was just telling my followers what to do. Did you hear me?"

"I did, tell me, and did you learn anything about the enemy camp?"

"I made an investigation twice, and I got some information for you. You see that long road well rounded? Well I never need to explain anything very much. I overheard one of the glandolphian officers, and I know what to do if the princesses will follow the plan. You see Angeline Riches, I overheard everything he said, and then I decided to tell it to all the rest. But I had orders not to leave this spot unless told to, and as you came out this far to meet you can convey the message to Violet, and her sisters. Oh we'll have an awfully good time. Listen a large party of rebel or glandolphian boy scouts went out this morning and have so far failed to return. I know the password and the number who went to it fortunately equals all ours. The best thing we can do is wait their return, capture them all, make them change clothing with us, and then detain a number of our followers to bring them into the christian lines as prisoners. Then we can pass an hour together on the return. Did you ever hear of such a good plan before, we can put out on the glandolphian camp in column formation, and as I know the name of the boys' leaders we can do everything the best way, and then if possible hide in the foe camp till dark, or as you suggested, nerve the glandolphian cause at pretension until what we are striving for is a thing of success. Then Violet and her sisters also can carry out what they set out for. Do you think such a plan will work Angeline?"

"Violet, and her sisters will try it, Jen, on your recommendation."

"I'll save lots of time too," persisted Angeline Jennings. "And if you have no dear fear as to the consequences we can attempt it at the hour they are to return. And if you haven't any plan you don't know or need to know the difference as my plan will pull us all through. It's just like putting out the lamp for a story in the dark."

"Isn't the name sometimes on guard now?"

"They are going to be changed in fifteen minutes."

"Are not those boy and girl scouts on the return now?"

"They will be coming within another two hours. They are late because of long distance."

"Come behind me," this time Jen.

She followed Angeline Riches, and they stepped behind a large tree.

"Jen, tell me just what you have discovered."

"That road is the only easiest way into the enemy's camp."

"Jen, what did you have to enable you to go so near the foe?"

"Nerve Angeline."

"Anything else?" with a smile.

"No Angeline, though of course recklessness is not very happy though they said."

"How long did it take you to discover this?" Michael told Angeline Riches to come right away?"

"No is Angeline Riches?"

"My Billy Gertrude Angeline then. Learn more 'I wish and you'll know us all." and she laughed. As Michael ran off as they Jen answered:

"About twenty minutes. The officers were close to my hiding place dressed like the Kings of the world and, overheard every word. I lost no time in observing what they said. The officer said general Federal had been wounded in the awful battle at Glandolphian St. place just past, that he was having a "Sick spell" and temporarily lost his command as a consequence. General Aitchfield go nurse or Dr Garbe whatever they call him who is in command sent these scouts out to watch us, but we out-sighted them. General Vivian says we are just born for good luck, and therefore must see that it stays with us. I wish Angeline Riches would hurry up, or maybe Michael is having a fine finding her. I wish you knew general Aitchfield-Dr Garbe. I wish he is just the most dangerous glandolphian general you ever heard of. The officers said of him "He's in going to tell us what he is going to do about the disasters inflicted upon the christian dogs." The name of the general who ordered the creation of the disasters is nicknamed the "Hardly Ever" he says."

"Well let us go to the princesses to look for Mr. Hardly Ever and when they see him come along, we all can try to capture him, and then he is going to tell us why he ordered those floods, and who put him up to it, and make a good confession all written, and then he's going to come along with us, all full of the information as to the cause of the biggest disasters ever known, and then he's going to come along with us to the christian lines as a prisoner. If he refuses--"

"It's certainly a good plan if it works" said Angeline Riches. "But when do you expect we'll ever capture him, when we have no description of him whatever ever whatever and know nothing about his features and manner of uniform and hat. You know it's rather said thus done."

"Well when 'Hardly Ever' comes into our trap he is at least going to give Violet and her sisters a library full of all the information that's ever written, and he's going to tell them what explosives his men used, and for Angeline Riches he's going to make a map of the next states glandolphian plans to devastate, give them information what ought to be done in the future, and a collected list of all the generals who are in the glandolphian army, and he's going to continue living. And he is going to make a list of the names of the glandolphian Government officials who are responsible, and Angeline Riches will obtain a written list of the names of the spots previously blasted as well as the dikes and levees, and I'm going to have a collection of all the towns previously named that were destroyed beyond recovery with a account to do the checking, and a list of the names of the grilling, and several of the names to make the examina-tion. Wouldn't that be fine as a record breaker?"

"It certainly would. When do you expect to capture that general? And when does Aitchfield-Garbe expect that general to come in. Maybe 'Hardly Ever'?"

"He won't tell. We'll have to find out for ourselves. General Dr Garbe keeps it a secret. The staff generals of this 'Hardly Ever' are government officials of high rank and no one knows who. The captain general of this officer is captain General Baines and his lieutenant is not known."

"I'm afraid Jen a good many things will happen before we'll ever capture general 'Hardly Ever' or his confederates."

"I guess so, but there's no harm in trying. I've been thinking about it all this while."

"Are you sure Jen about the time the rebel boy and girl scouts come back? I wonder what keeping Gertrude?" to herself.

"Just possible. You understand I've heard everything. When I discover anything I'm not the slightest girl to let an opportunity slip."

"I'm going to inform Violet and her sisters Jen."

"You the sooner the better. You see I've no fear of the outcome. When I've an opportunity I take advantage of it."

"And how about the plan?"

"Oh I've got that handy. If I have time I'll show it to you. Here comes Angeline Riches. She's always on the alert. You ought to see how she can manage it. I mean when she gets a chance."

"The boys come back now. Oh and get Aitchfield and come back here."

Presently with a feminine clinging to her, Michael and on the lookout, with Aitchfield and others followed Angeline Riches who was walking under cover toward where Violet and her sisters were hidden not making a vain effort at dignity. With no one little girl on the lookout far ahead, and the others in her wake, she was in all right and sound, walking now sideways, now backwards, and now not at all, in confusion.

while possible was anything but dignified but they had to do this to be on the look out, and Gertrude Angeline acted worse..... The reader must be reminded they were perilously close to the enemy's camp. There is not far away between a lar large group of tall pine trees a small pool of water, and near this this were hidden the given girls. Into this place went Angeline Riches, and the others, and explained things to the princesses.

"Are we to do it Violet?" asked Gertrude.....
"Too small a chance we but we'll try," she answered. "But as attacking those scouts near this camp no I'll send off a party strong enough to see those scouts do not return," and she sent Michael off with the order.

"Are you going to lead the procession?" Violet asked Riches.
Violet explained that the discoverer of the opportunity would make such an attempt on her part ill advised, and presently the whole party was waiting for the time to arrive hoping ardently the glandelinian scouts would not appear. And why while they waited they partook themselves of a small meal. Violet had taken along with her two small beef steaks, rolls and a small bottle of milk which she started to make good use of. One of the boy scouts offered her some coffee, but as he only had enough for himself, Violet declined the offer.

"Aint you going to eat anything Gertrude?" inquired Joice.
Gertrude explained that a breakfast just taken, when she had one and a hearty meal at that just before was not desirable, and presently the rest were enjoying the meal splendidly within full view of the glandelinian camp.....

"Angeline Riches, serious and solemn eyed now started in to heat her breakfast with a will, while the others seemed to play with their food, seemed, for in the long run their execution quite equalled Riches. Within a quarter of an hour they were through though, and had an hour and a quarter to wait.

"I'd like to start now, as we'd never have a chance to come here again," said Gertrude. "That's the sort of a move I'd make."

"Would that we could, but if we to the time won't work, and what'll happen if the scouts would come after we entered and prove there are the real ones? We won't have to wait an hour at least. It'll take a quarter of an hour to reach the road."

"Would that be all?"
"Thank you, yes."

"I hope our scouts will delay the real party for good or long enough for us to to have the chance to slip through," continued Gertrude.

"You and I hope we'll enjoy our adventure girls," added Angeline Riches, inspired to their kindly wish by the shining eyes, and more than placid content of the rest.

"We will very much if the enemy gives us lots of excitement," answered Joice. "But for the success of our undertaking, I hope the enemy for the time being will not discover us, or otherwise we won't feel quite well this morning."

"You bet we'll successfully do it, we MUST," answered Angeline Riches, not saying as the other girls could see by her disquieting glance at Violet exactly what she wanted to tell girl like so many of her class said not what she wanted to say, but what she could..

"You are a little worried, about the outcome of the adventure, especially one of deep mystery like this one. I hope Gertrude you are not thinking of backing out!"
"I should say not," answered Gertrude, more anxious to proceed than to quit.

"It's very kind of you to volunteer to go with us Gertrude, isn't it, Violet?"
asked Joice.

"It is indeed," returned Violet, decidedly.

Angeline Riches was dumb. Over the delay red signals of impatience and distress were spreading over her features. Considering it time to end the watchful waiting, Violet looked at her wrist watch and arose. They had twenty minutes yet. Angeline Riches made a dash for her horse's.

"Princess," said Violet and her sisters together, shaking her finger at her. "You forgot something. We must first pray for success."

"Angeline Riches looked a trifle disconcerted, but she turned and stood at attention, fastening her eyes quickly on Violet and her sisters, and watched for further orders. Then Violet and her sisters with all the other girls in line made a big sign of the cross, the rest following their example.

"Oh Dear Sacred Sacred Heart of Jesus aid us in our mission as it is a most holy cause."

As Violet pronounced these words, all heads were bowed, their eyes were closed and twelve pairs of hands were clasped in united ritual. "Amen" cried Violet with vibrant earnestness and solemnity. Then each remounted their horses, and the procession a little more difficult in the way, of a final prayer, then before made slowly toward the appointed road. The leader of the girl scout column who met them was no less a person than a really big, a slight bright eyed trim affable little girl a child scout who taking the adventure at its best grasp had by her attention to detail her ability and her executive ability raised herself in esteem favor of Violet, and her sisters.....

She had from her hidden position behind a tree taken in with impatient interest the consultation of Violet and her sisters with her leading scouts, they had listened with deep concern to the conversation between the Princesses and Angeline Riches concerning her discovery, and when the prayer was said by them the tears came into their eyes. The reader may understand, just a few weeks before a number of her elder scouts including her brother who day after day scouted on the enemy had probably made that trip for the last time, for they never came back.
They had even said that prayer, said it with such faith, innocence and devotion, but now she believed the enemy had laid them down to a sleep which this side of the grave knows no waking.

As she waited their approach with a smiling nod of welcome she was eyeing eyeing Angeline Riches.

"How did the plan come out Jen?" said the girl scouts as Riches made her famous famous curtsy. Jennings attempted the same feat with good success.

"Violet, where did you get those two Angel Scouts? Girls you must go through an adventure with me some time."

"We'll be glad to," answered Riches. "I wouldn't we Jen?"

"Oh yes," asserted Jennings earnestly.

"Did the glandelinian girl and boy scouts come in sight yet?" queried Angeline Riches.

"Not yet," the girl answered.

"Then lets get started for the others of our scouts succeeded in detaining them."
said Violet. as she slipped something into her pocket. "It's my pass she" she announ ced. "It ought to bring us through."

"Then forward we go," Joice continued.

They then gathered in a long column, in equal rank formation and proceeded in silence to or toward the head bend of the road a silence of several minutes broken suddenly by Angeline Riches.

"We have to be very careful in this ruse," she said.

And so it proved to be.

On reaching the bend of the road she signalled to Michael to deploy his column and told him she was of "Riches Riches' Discovery."

"But danger lurks if we fail," the boy scout said. "I'm going to send my scouts to cover our rear in case the scouts of glandelinia come at the appointed time, that if if ours had failed to stop them. We must be on our guard, for if they successfully worsted our band, they'll all be suspicious and make trouble in the camp for us."

"All right," Michael said Riches with a smile.

That smile was solved subsequently. No one were ever so cautious as these. They knew they would pay for it if they were not, but the glandelinian boy and girl scouts were already prisoners on their way to the christian camps, giving Violet, and her sisters, and all their followers the opportunity they were looking for....

VIOLET, AND HER SISTERS TAKES ANGELINIA
ARONBURG AND THE OTHERS INTO THE ENEMY LINES.

VIOLET and her sisters were prompt in following at Angeline Richee's plan, and to their astonishment and dismay matters she discovered were not so good as supposed for the Glandelinians looked carefully at their faces, sized them up diligently, spoke to one another excitedly and made queer signs. By signal the Vivian girls reported the situation at one once and a warning all those behind to be on their guard at once, and to have their pistols ready in case of trouble.

"It is an extraordinary case," Richee observed. "The Glandelinian Guts are more watchful than ever."

"It certainly puzzles me," answered Angelina Aronburg. "But it strikes me our faces are not the same as the Glandelinian child scouts, and therefore it is evident that the Glandelinians are suspicious. The officer of the guard looked fairly strong at us and will not let us pass directly, but even supposing he'll let us pass in the end there's a good reason of his being suspicious of us, but how comes it he can almost tell by our faces that we are not the ones he's expecting. It might be well to have to fight our way out."

"I think," said Angeline Richee. "It would be advisable-----well after all the sentries are allowing us to pass."

And so they were. Therefore they rode carefully on, while Gertrude said;

"Our guns are lovely and well cared for, and we can trust Violet and her sisters to lead us safely through the adventure as they are a sort of spiritual phenomenon to us. I overheard them telling the guards all sorts of strange stories. He even told the officer of the guard that she intends to be an author and write books on war."

"We know," said Richee as they continued on past the gauntlet of guards. "She and her sisters even can do better than any one thinks. But isn't it anything unusual that such beautiful girls like they are have the desire to go through such an adventure like these, when what heavenly music, what lofty aspirations may already be germinating in their beautiful heads?"

"Despite their dangerous adventures they certainly have beautiful thoughts," Richee. Violet says the successful issue of the adventure is going to be dedicated to you, and if they succeed in obtaining the information they desire they are going to give you all the credit. But if none of us are successful we can turn the whole expedition into a circus and probably in disaster, and therefore we must seek all the help from God and His Blessed Mother, and continually beg the aid and intercession of the Saints, and angels."

"Talking of a circus," cried Angelina Aronburg. "That reminds me of something even more peculiar. I noticed that as we passed by all the guards closest to the Glandelinian camp, are looking at us very shrewdly. But they are allowing us through just the same, but nevertheless we must keep our eyes open and not allow ourselves to be drawn into a snare. If we succeed in getting in, Violet and her sisters will certainly enjoy it. Yes, I don't know of any girl or boy scout in any kind of an expedition who would enjoy this adventure the more. It is the most desperate move of their part and I fancy that we'll all share some of the excitement. It's a pity we can't arm ourselves with machine guns, pistols or rifles."

"I think we can arrange fair enough with our customary weapons Richee. We are close to the camp now. My followers intend to follow or cover our every move and they arranged for that before we got into camp."

They were now insight of the camp. But before they were allowed to pass they were examined closely, and cross questioned I'll call it. But they answered every question carefully, and shrewdly, without even flinching, apparently satisfying the Glandelinians who finally allowed them to continue on.

"I think," said the officer who was a goodlier, "it would be advisable to allow them to pass in. They must be all right I guess."

"But," said the officer, "the child scouts seem to be too lovely for those who went out, especially those in the lead. The leading girls appear to be very unusual."

"Who knows said the first. "They might have disguised themselves to escape the Christian dogs. Would it not be an awful thing we if we unknowingly allowed those Vivian girl spies to slip into our lines. Manley likes to meet these children every day for a good purpose purpose, but not without first getting at his hands on them, and they not knowing what dreadful thoughts what great desires of awful and terrible revenge, what awful inspirations may always be bothering him!"

"What ever they are, those Vivian girls have unusual bravery, Optimism. But Manley reward for their capture dead or alive will be given to only the one person responsible for it, but if he gets the huge sum he is supposed to give his helpers part of it, that is if any one helped him. With the rest of the money he could do as he likes."

"Talking of a reward," the other officer cried "that reminds me of the surprising impossibility of it. I have noticed the dangerous effort and difficulty of capturing them, and the greater difficulty in retaining them. I noticed also that other things are to be given out to those who capture them. If they were captured for good, Manley surely would enjoy it more. It is his favorite hope, and I fancy that their cries from torture, would be music to his ears."

"I think," said the officer, "some will arrange for their capture, Captain. If they are anywhere about, my boy scouts can shadow them, and they can easily arrange for bringing about their capture."

Being permitted to pass however, Violet, and her sisters and their followers gained a more easier entrance into the rebel lines than any other time in their career, and were even assigned to a boy and girl scouts camp and outfitted with more cleaner and good fitting uniforms and demanded to "wash and bathe themselves, to avoid detection, and to obtain the information they desired, they released the best plan was to make pretensions of serving in the Glandelinian army as Glandelinian child scouts. Therefore though it was a sacrifice, they assigned themselves for the most unpleasant tasks of their lives, for they saw no other way but to go through with it, or fail one or the other."

"Don't you think it is a wrong against our cause?" asked Gertrude the second day after they were working out in the drill fields with all kinds of scouts, and when after drill hours they happened to meet.

"I think we can arrange that Gertrude," said Violet. "It's our only way." Some time later the following code letter reached Violet:::

"DEAR VIOLET;

I and a number of my followers were to day summoned to general Manley's headquarters to take a message to general Heidi Mele-De-Garbes. Angeline Richee was with me during this important mission, and I must write to tell you about it. We took turns examining the message, before we delivered it, but though otherwise important we did not find it indicating anything that we were seeking for.

Angeline Richee claims she thought she discovered something, but I do not. When she was in general Mele-De-Garbes' headquarters, she missed nothing in view as an audience does from the rise of the curtain to its fall. As for myself I was compelled to go and spend most of my time in watching her, and preventing her from doing anything rash, or what would lead to our discovery. While the general while the general was reading the message, she stood motionless, her body at least was motionless, gazing at everything on the table. But her face. You ought to have seen the changes-----caution, the alertness of a cougar, awe, suspicion, anxiety, curiosity, temptation, merriment, laughter, enthusiasm, and an embracement. I couldn't begin to describe the emotions that were changing one another upon her face.

During the time I was waiting for his return message, she seemed to be looking looking all around the room too, and but still nothing moved but her eyes and her face. That's it, her eyes were observing everything, and when if officers came into the room in stately gray uniforms, Angeline Richee looked as I imagine little girls look and ought to look when suddenly getting on their guard. She was at attention apparently. The officers turned their eyes upon her and as two officers (all were generals) sat down but she took no notice of them. She had some plan in mind. When the officer cleared everything away from the table, she came to herself with a little sigh like a sort of peri at the gate of heaven getting one glimpse of the splendor within, only to have the gate closed in her face. I sometimes think all girls can be like her if they wish, but most grown folks don't give them a chance for an adventure.

Anyhow I'm so glad you suggested taking Richee with us, and though I gave or payed no attention to the comment of the officers, that three and half hours, spent in the general's headquarters was the most surprising in the way of any kind of an adventure I myself have ever spent.

Your little dancing fairy spy seemed quite at home in the general's Headquarters. To night if general "Hardly ever" comes to his tent I intend, please God to try and take him prisoner. I've escorted Richee to her tent that is her own, and all the way her conversation was an succession of ohs, and ahs, and exclamation points. There is one circumstance on our arriving at her camp-----God help us-----which caused me a little wonder and suspicion. We had not quite started up the company Street leading to her tent, when Angeline Jennings and others came hurrying down to meet us. For some reason they appeared very ill at ease, thanked me for bringing Angeline Richee safely back, and begged me most anxiously to stay saying it isn't safe for us to go ahead any further than day or explain things now, but the enemy had been suspicious, for rumors are that the real Glandelinian child scouts have escaped from the others and have returned, and we are on our guard. She spoke in a low voice and was evidently very nervous & nervous.... This is a long letter but I thought you would be interested in it, and at least the last of it will put you and your sisters and the whole company on guard. Come to us real soon, but at dark. Joined by all the scouts in best wishes and prayers for seeing the adventure through, I am yours sincerely, Angelina Gronburg....."

But the letter was by no means the last echo about Angelina Blanche. Toward Noon Violet was called to the army telephone and there ensued the following conversation. The author may as well give all the preliminaries, because it illustrates what a busy christian girl scout must endure with other christian scouts within a rebel camp numbering hundreds of members of boys, and daring girl scouts of eleven hundred or eleven hundred and covering parties if they don't know how many, besides keeping your eye on glandelinian soldiers when they hold you under some suspicion.

"Yes this is the girl scout camp," she declared. "Who are you?"

"Halloa?"

"YES?"

"Is this the Glandelinian child scout camp?"

"Yes, Yes, Yes," that's what I said, and this is the chief scout leader talking!"

"Is that you Princess Violet?"

"Say, who ever that is do you want me to betray myself while here?"

"But are you the person I'm inquiring for please?"

"YES, YES."

"Are you--?"

"Yes, for goodness sakes, that's what I said," impatiently.

"What?"

"YES, YES, YES," she began to bellow. "This is the PARTY you are seeking."

"Oh good morning Princess don't you know me?"

"Well who in the world is it?"

"This is one of your girlscoouts Gertrude by name?"

"Gertrude? Gertrude what?"

"Why Gertrude of course."

"Which Gertrude? Angelina Gronburg?"

"No my name is not Angelina Gronburg. It's Gertrude Angeline."

"Gertrude Angeline. Gertrude Angeline, who do you say?"

"Why Gertrude Angeline."

"Oh for the love of Mike which Gertrude Angeline?"

"Oh don't you remember me?"

"Then Violet became heroic.

"Probably," do. (Sarcastically) I know of three Gertrude Angelines in penrose Regiment of girl scouts, two to twenty two Gertrude Angelines in my special scout brigade, four Gertrude Angelines now in Angelina Gronburg's company of spy corps, a whole procession of Gertrude Angelines in Jennie's army corps, two in Joice's sister, four who have recently attended piches's in the last six months, and about eight eighteen hundred Gertrude Angelines who neither belong to any girl scout regiments in either general Vivians or Hanson's army, but which might be found in the telephone directory. "Well I'm one of the Gertrude Angelines who is captain of a scout regiment under you."

"Ah Gertrude now we can certainly go on." (No wonder) Violet reflected (That the best pious people at times will use profane language) I'm glad to hear from you Gertrude Angeline. What is it?"

"What did you say?"

"I say what is it you dumbbell."

"I say there was a little girl scout come to see me about an hour ago, about ten years old with a smaller companion, and two men. She said her name was Angeline Jennings. Do you know her?"

"I certainly do. Did she want to capture the whole army of the glandelinians?" Irony is a dangerous thing on the phone. Gertrude Angeline (which ever one it was) at considerable length, and with excited tone of voice pointed out to Violet the improbability all things considered of Angeline Jennings even intending to single handed of placing a whole monstrous Glandelinian army under arrest, when it was so hard for an equal size of a christian army to even whip it in battle.

"Well for heavens sake Gertrude what did you want, and don't waste so much time talking." Violet broke in almost angrily. "But why not come and tell me if you have so much difficulty over the phone. Some glandelinian might be eavesdropping over the phone, and we'll be detected."

"Can you speak english?" asked Gertrude.

"Most intently. "Well as soon as I turned my back, your young friend began to make a copy of the code. I could see everything she did in a looking glass on the wall of the tent. I kept my face turned from her and the little girl thinking that her companions were the only witnesses made ten copies of the codes with a speed that was simply amazing and, and—" What did you say Violet? Oh I was forgetting myself and speaking on my own time — oh excuse me — said —"

"Not to my knowledge. I certainly did not know sat about her. But you again spoke in our own tongue. Forget it for...evens saks untill so conversation is so offer."

"Well I never saw it so like... she walked on those six codes as if she had been gone through some greater training to do them all her life. You know it, or rather I could have said them; it was something mysterious about it she being fixed and so great basic explosion d-d-d-what we call big horrors--disast on you." [G] she have made it aaining." "So far as I know getrude the girl never took a code lesson h in her life." "Well can se best est. When she was se feenishd, she asked ze to give se codes to Angelina pichese to take over to youse. Then she asked ne whether she could foist bringed all her discoveries to me. I told her she would be welcomed in the in. You said it she never took se lessons making ze codes?"

"Then she must be a spy fairy."

"A WHAT?" Gertrude's voice expressed all manner of question marks and exclamation points.

"Oh I understood it. Well Angelina riches is on se way with se codes." cried Gertrude and hung up the receiver.

"Well I'd like to see them on particular business. But warn us if soldiers wish to see us."

"Perhaps you are thinking of playing chess with them," suggested Nicholas pleasantly. "Not at all." Angelina Riches made answer. "It is private." He only announced the two entered Violet's tent.

Angeline Riches with a small package under her arm was evidently despite her customary smile in a state of tense excitement. Jennings was as usual solemn eyed and burnded too with something she was busting to tell the vivian girls.

"I see girls there, #2 there is something on your minds." For the first time in her dealings with Angeline Kihoe, the latter seemed to be at a loss of speech. She looked at Jennings, Angeline Jennings looked at looked at her. She leaned over, and whispered in Jennings ear, who in reply snook her head slightly.

"It surely is not bad news I hope hope." Vicist said in a hope to break the silence.

"Violet" said Riches "IT--It's a surprise" and she looked around cautiously. "Oh you want to surprise me do you. Thank you very much. I love to be surprised and providing it is nothing bad. Go on and surprise me." "Haven't you got room for something on your table there?"

"Then, let could you and your sisters please come over and look over these codes" Angeline picked held up her package -- "And then sit down, and join Jennings and I will be the best."

They gathered round the table. Violet, and her sisters noticed as they took their places that the two girls were a little less daintily uniformed in gray. Of course they had a fairly good idea of what was to come. Of course they had a fairly good idea of what was to come. The mysterious Gertrude Angelina had given violet and her sisters some idea of how to look like a young lady.

her sisters the suspicion to what otherwise would have been a mysterious proceeding. The Vivian girls were prepared then to guess that the codes then, was of the 'Hardly Ever' general, and having placed them on the table they seated themselves according to directions. The two girls in the meantime explained the codes.
"Hardly Ever is general Francis Gannonlatonia," announced Angeline Richee.

"And he knows who ordered the flood and explosion disasters to come about."

With the first code they explained the amount of explosives used, the number of men who set the mine, being 1,000 per mine, the power of the batteries 800 volts, the length of the wire, six thousand yards, the parts of the country into which they were to be placed, the names of the rivers, lakes and dikes, already known, the points and directions. Violet and her sisters had observed codes being explained by professionals. But they had not seen in those professionals, work done so complete. It was indeed indeed indeed remarkable. a miracle.

"Capitel girls." Violet and her sisters exclaimed at the end. "who in the world taught you?"

"Angulina Aronburg taught me," answered Jennings "and she had a hard time but took patience with me. Once she almost thrashed a seaw dropper." b6 b7C

"On Jennings how good it was she did. C H How could any one stand an eaves-dropper."

"Well she certainly gave him a good slap, and a shaking up. We all saw how did she did it," corroborated Jennings.

"That sure was great. An savenodropper of any kind would get a saint mad, he's such a nut."

"But who did you say taught you Angeline?"

"I saw how codes were made," answered Riches "And I watched Angelina Aronburg when she made out codes, and then seeing I was interested she loaned them to me. I don't want down to normal. Making handwritings being wonderfully nice, wonderful."

Then I went down to general Vivians headquarters-----he is an awfully nice general--- and let him take a lesson from me before I forget the mysterious signs I saw."

There was to be some headway in this discovery hoped to be made on the next day to the extreme and volubly expressed delight of Violet and her sisters.

"How's Angelina Aronburg getting along with her work?" Violet asked as she returned the codes to their envelopes.

"Oh she's getting along very well thank you Violet." Angeline Riches made reply. "She's been working on everything she's discovered. How do you like the results of the codes I brought?"

"They are just right. You are a good expert with them, and so is Jennings."

"For the first time we stayed up all hours of the night to do it, and she said she was only too glad to accomplish it for you, in her teaching us."

"How nice of Gertrude Angeline. Is the rest of her girl scouts working as I planned?"

"They lost their chance yesterday. But they have during drill and leisure hours been watching all the glandelinian officers, listening to conversation, and to all they said, but the glandelinian officers seem suspicious of them too, and therefore though they see, it, not nevertheless say nothing with the scout s are within hearing distance. You know wicked as glandelinians are they won't use rash judgement and only do thing on evidence."

"Singular," Violet and her sisters reflected. "We are either catching the glandelinians for in important information while in the camp, and they are keeping their eye on us. We are either losing our chance for anything for our cause or just getting suspected. We are either pursued or their pursuers. Some day I hope to see our scouts successful and hope to heart they are both well arranged, organized, and working like a machine." These reflections they did not voice, but having dismissed the two girls with fawning congratulations, Violet telephoned Angelina Aronburg to look into the affairs of her scouts closely.

So far their efforts was a common success. Throughout the war so far Violet and her sisters had been successful again and again. And unknown to the glandelinians this was the first appearance of so many child scouts within the camp since the great conflict began, and though the glandelinians were totally ignorant of it their camp were filled with boy and girl scouts by hundreds for miles, who were bent on covering the movements of Violet and her sisters, and get the information for them also. Angelina Aronburg and her two most trusted companions were with her, and her sisters, and watched them and took care of them to such an effect that they felt sure of success. For to ally all suspicion, Angeline Riches continued to be the bright particular fox and human phantom but then all had to be careful and to keep down the suspicions they joined all drills of scouts in the camp and did everything necessary not injurious to their purpose and cause. Angeline Riches proved her merit again and again. With this first part of the adventure concluded, Violet and her sisters took care that the glandelinians did not get into their game, and every one did their best to such an effect that so far Angeline Riches had succeeded in discovering part way what Violet and her sisters expected of her. For the next two days the boy and girl scouts continued their work successfully, and then something happened after the drilling hours which made a considerable change in their hitherto pleasant success. Violet, and her sisters had noticed for some reason or other that since that day came things had not been just as they wished. They knew something was wrong. It was their fourth day in the enemy's lines and the enemy's army had remained stationary, and new forces was joining it. Seated at their table after returning from drilling duties, Violet and her sisters were going over the accounts of their work so far a pleasant successful duty when one of the girl scouts with very big blue eyes, and angle angle in beauty entered.

"Princess Violet" she began coming to the point at once. "Angelina Aronburg gave me this note to give to you. She says she does not know what to do about it."

The note in question had been placed in an envelope and sealed by Angelina Aronburg. It ran thus--

"Dear Violet, and your sisters.

I'm keeping Angeline Riches in her tent this day as she has been injured through Ned's blunder. All day long she has not seen herself and is wild with grief and anger. Angeline Jennings is out trying to learn the cause of it. Michael too is out of shape and to day is very sick. Could you get some one to investigate this. I have heard you have some of the Gemini with you. It is very hard to stand for this but do it for the sake of the cause. Ned is being a missing one so far. We are to arrest him on his appearance and sent him to you.

Respectfully
Angelina Aronburg."

"Mary June" said Violet carefully folding the note and putting it inside her waist. "You sent a message to Angelina Aronburg that she need not trouble about this affair at all. I'll take care of it myself."

About an hour later she went to the telephone.

"Is that you Gertrude?" (In English)

"Yes."

"This is Princess Violet speaking. Did you really send me that note?"

"Yes."

"Have you seen Angeline Riches lately?"

"Yes Violet. I was with her just ten minutes ago, and things do not look so good. Michael lost his opportunity this morning, or rather what he done succeed at he could not hold because of Ned's carelessness. He was in bed and in his tent this morning, and Ned said he must not be disturbed."

"Do you know Gertrude that I haven't received any news whatever since yesterday."

"What?" Screamed Gertrude.

"Violet repeated her statement adding 'And to day I've received no communications, and there's not a thing like news come to me or my sisters either, except this note.'"

"Why Violet you've been misinformed. I sent you six mysterious codes yesterday. I almost risked my life yesterday morning getting them."

"It was now Violet's turn to scream 'What?'"

"No said the notes were sent" put in Joice

"Gertrude," answered Violet. "You know I have in my possession her written statement. To day Angeline Riches is not in camp or on duty because through some reason she is laid up temporarily, and so is Michael. We have nothing to replenish our success."

Finally Gertrude again cried;

"Violet, listen. There's something wrong, and I'll go around and see what's the matter. I'm afraid we are under suspicion."

"Wait awhile Gertrude. Before we do anything rash, let's try to get our facts in good shape. First to begin with, are you sure the new codes were delivered?"

"I take it for granted. I ordered them to be sent from Cathleen's tent."

"Well I suppose I'll have to call up Cathleen and find out." And accordingly Violet called up this girl scout by telephone while her sisters just came into the tent and hear her. To Violet's question Cathleen replied;

"Certainly sent the codes yesterday afternoon before 5 o'clock. I prepared the sending of them myself. There was something mysterious written by General Federal himself, something about a new flood, well enough information to give us sufficient clues and a list of disasters made by the enemy since the war began. There was also a slip of paper with designs of dikes, levees, map of Lake Silvia or Seltola, the dikes of the flood making rivers, a plan of mine making, the next movement of General Welles whole army--and--and--well plenty of evidence to prove that some glandelinian general or more is at the bottom of the whole business. My boyscout John was to have delivered them into your own hands. I am surprised and worried sick that he has not returned yet as he is my brother."

Telling her aide-de-camp who blessed with excellency hearing had taking in the situation thoroughly to get Gertrude Angeline to make a good investigation, she summoned Mildred Maxwell to her tent, as she could and would tell anything she knows. Mildred came in looking troubled.

"Mildred is it true that the codes got waylaid somewhere?"

"Angeline Riches did not want to have you see that note for fear you'd be worried."

"So I suppose, but that doesn't answer my question. Are the codes waylaid somewhere?"

"The codes? No I don't believe they were. I'm afraid they are gone. Otherwise I could not tell you anything else Princess Violet. The boyscout did not return."

"And Mildred is it true that Ned did not return early to his camp as is his time?" Asked Violet.

"I do not know what time he returned if he did return Violet, not unless he had something to do with the disappearance of the codes. But Violet, be merciful to me and let me not hear his name again."

"And how about yesterday. We had an awful time. We ought to dismiss him from the way. If what I fear is true I'll--"

"Go get your horse, race to Angelina Aronburg's tent, and if he has been arrested by her scouts bring Ned to my tent as fast as you can."

Within two hours and a half Mrs. Ned entered, with Mildred Maxwell, and another girl. His step was slow and his smile was gone.

"Ned began Violet "Is it true that you have lost all traces of the codes from your tent?"

"Yes Princess Violet" he made answer hanging his head.

"Wasn't it true that you did not have the nerve to report the loss to me though you knew of it all day yesterday?"

"I had no chance to report the loss to you."

"Why did you remain away so long?"

"I was forcibly detained."

"And is it not true that you did not have full control over yourself all day yesterday because you saw something and Mildred got sore at you?"

"I had no time and plans made."

"But about yesterday evening. Did you not have the chance to trace the loss then?"

"No but I tried to do something."

"Nothing." Violet exclaimed with an energy, which caused Ned to jump and blanch as though she had slapped him with all her might. "Good heavens Ned Parker what about the codes John was supposed to deliver to me? Why is he missing? What about the plans Angelina Riches sent you with yesterday afternoon?"

Ned had gone white. His head was down, he was squeezing his hands, but he gave no answer.

"Do you hear me?" cried Violet losing her patience.

The Glandelinians discovered what Ned had done and took them all away, last night.

"Ned you have lied to me and I am simply disgusted with you. I never thought that Ned Parker would tell a lie like that. You know it is a sin."

Then Ned raised his voice in protest to her reproach. There was no mistaking the sincerity of his opposition, or of Violet's grief, and he scolded as much as she did. "Excited though he was, and hurried away by anger, the pain in her eyes, the poignant pain remained to haunt his memory for weeks to come. Violet finally ordered him to sit down and was waiting for him to compose himself, when there appeared on the scene, Angelina Aronburg and Angelina Riches. The latter was a distressed night. Her face showed the haggardness of weariness, and watching, and one of her eyes was badly discolored.

"Violet," said Gertrude, while Ned tried to escape out of the tent, but was stopped forcibly by Mildred. "We have got the truth at last. Ned is a good boy scout most of the time, but whenever he thinks he faces too great a risk on anything he does, he gets scared at once, and then he hides until there is no Glandelinian soldier in sight. And when they do appear he is like a frightened lamb. Ned is a coward."

"I do not like to tell on my boy scouts and girl scouts either." Said the patient brave little girl scout of the black eye. "And I never would have told if I could help it, but I cannot stand a cringing coward no matter who he is. It's dragging my heart and soul into the dust. But I didn't think he would do that. When I had found it out, I had Angelina Aronburg write you that note. After Ned failed me in time of peril, I couldn't so much as look for him. I hoped he had been captured."

"But what became of the codes?" Violet asked.

"I do not know. I, Ned, and John went out to deliver it to you. It was in John's possession. A number of Glandelinian boys and girl scouts suspecting us attacked us. We tried to escape and though I succeeded in fighting my way out, the boys disappeared. Ned and John were captured. Soon six hours after that is just now Ned came back greatly scared without the codes having deserted me, and John. It was Gertrude who arrested him and she told him good and proper too."

"How did you come to injure your eye, Riches?"

"On I just ran against something, that remains as of the fist of a rebel or Glandelinian boy scout."

"Oh stuff!" Violet exclaimed impatiently to Ned. "You have been deceiving me and the rest right along. You are a deserter and if you was a man I'd order you to face the firing squad right now. I'm through with you for all time, and so are my sisters and every one else. We are too merciful to expose you. But the best thing for you to do is to leave the army and go back home."

"The princess Violet, I wasn't responsible," said Ned. "anyhow I did not mean to do it."

Now again Ned was lying.

"Perhaps you didn't," said Angelina Aronburg doubtfully. "but you are a swarthy cut just the same. You should see what happened to Michael through your cowardliness and carelessness. Everything was in disorder, our whole plan I'm afraid has been smashed, the codes are gone, and probably all of us will have to leave the camp post naked or be captured."

"By all means let's have him court-martialed, and sent home in disgrace," said Jennie Vivian.

"My girl and boy scouts said 'Said Angelina Riches vi with some spirit, are the kindest, the cleverest, the best any one could desire, and they are the most loving the most attentive scouts, that any boy or girl commander could have'—she paused a moment and then added—"But they won't have Ned no more. Neither will I or Jennie Turner."

"Yes," said Gertrude Angelina herself harshly. "and in order to keep him out of danger and what he is afraid of, we'll put him through our court-martial and vote him to be discharged and sent home."

"Angelina Riches and Gertrude," said Violet. "I'm sorry to have put such a boy in your command. We have been deceived by him. Good bye Ned."

The poor Vivian girls who had gone through a whole lot during the whole war were smothered and turned away. Any one could see the repressed tears struggling to their eyes. Looking back now the memory almost brings tears to mine. But who could blame the Vivian girls who were too angry, too mortified to stand for his cowardly desertion, such a too foolish and rebellious to perceive the sad note of the full situation. God help us all, we try always to do good but there are many who allow their feelings to influence them, so that therefore they are cruel when they profess to be kind merciful when they talk mercy hard hearted when they assume philanthropy. Ned's wounded self love had obscured his judgement, and so in unreasoning coarsety he deserted his girl scouts and wounded to the quick the loving hearts of the princesses and they need strength and consolation during these awful times.

THE WONDERFUL ADVENTURE OF ANGELINA ARONBURG AND JENNIE TURNER.

"I say Violet," said Angelina Aronburg during the early hours of the next morning. "I forgot to tell you about that awful mixup that day when Ned deserted us."

"Why did you forget to tell us?"

"I was too angry at Ned, and so forgot. It is nevertheless a pretty good story; and I kinda believe it will be of great interest to you."

"Did you tell any one else?"

"Yes I told Michael about it."

"Why did you tell him?"

"Oh because he was one of those who got hurt. I also told it to one of the Glandelinian officers who shadows us. It was a pretty good story you know, and I was very sure it would interest him."

"And was he interested?"

"He certainly was. When I told Captain Jack about the big floods in the past, and the danger of what more we might have in the near future, all caused by the enemy, and the devastating forest fires raging, about the great numbers who lost their lives, and the many millions of women and children nearly starving, and the great plagues raging, and of the floods talking their slowest time to go down, and some places maybe never, he sighed like the engine of a freight train when it's pulling a big load."

"The picture was vivid if overdrawn."

"Was he excited?"

"Yes."

"Did he not say anything?"

"I'll say he did. He made speeches. He told me never to stick up for the Glandelinians as long as I lived, and that he did not respect any nation who while making wars, could cause floods and other big disasters, and massacres and starve millions of children, and not only endanger the nation with plagues but the world in general. I shot back at him and asked 'Suppose Germany is responsible.' I say or he said no one knows who is really responsible until the princesses succeed in their mission. I said they were what everybody in the world says. The world declares Germany and his Confederates are responsible, directly or indirectly. And that's true Violet, I told him how I once got cornered by a Glandelinian officer, who got mad and attempted to throw me out of the window!"

"How did you escape that Gertrude?"

"Oh easily. I put a knife into him before you could say Jack Robertson. I said 'Michael let me tell you how it all came about, and why we are trying to find out who is responsible for the flood and other disasters.... That drew Michael's attention, and when I told him all I knew he hopped up and down grunting and chucking to beat the band. Then he told me what he thought of the Glandelinians and of these mighty disasters, brought on the starvation of a whole state of people, and what he'd say about them was plenty enough and what he said he also thought about them was not fit for a prayer book. He said that little Christian children was worth more in the eye of our dear Blessed Lord than the whole Glandelinian nation."

"Well Gertrude what was the result of your talk with Michael?"

"It's a long story Violet."

"Let me and my sisters hear it."

"Well Captain Jack did most of the talking. After making a lot of speeches he said that something ought to be done. I asked him what? He said Miss Aronburg if we must get all the Abbi-annian states into line we can. I asked him how he was going to do it. Then he got me to promise to go with him to waylay some rebel general, and force him to tell who caused the floods to be ordered since the awful disasters began. At first I did not care about going but Jack insisted it would be a good help to the cause. The fact is Jack didn't have the nerve to enter the Glandelinian general's headquarters alone, and I did. That is why he wanted me to go with him I think. So after supper I sat Jack outside in the Company Street."

"Then my word," Violet put in.

"For we sat all right and on the Company Street down a you should have heard the line of talk Jack handed out to me. He said the only way to bring a stop to the disasters was to firing but who ordered them capture them, and make an example of them before the world. Massacring the Glandelinian armies does no good, they'll massacre in return, punishing the wicked nation by making for them big floods first and other disasters or starting any kind of a rough sea roughhouse with them the Glandelinian nation herself if it is bad in results—always bad, and would have a terrible result of the Glandelinian war. Jack got so worked up talking this way about the results of the awful floods, that we were both crying, and when we came to an army canteen nothing would do Jack but go in and get sixty five cents worth of provisions done up in a bread basket to act as bait. Jack had only thirty five pennies about him, and I had to loan him thirty pennies. He repaid me the first thing this morning and---"

"Yes, yes, yes, go on."

"We did go on Violet, and Jack finally explained to me how he would pretend he was a distributor of provisions and would present the basket to one of the officers, and then get to talking with another of the generals. The great mistake spies make Angelinia he said in these efforts is that they go pottering about among officer generals, pretending they were one of them. My Angelinia, he said, you can't do nothing by trying that, and there are many spies who even don't know their own minds long enough to leave them up. What you want to do is to trap and get the Glandelinian army officer. you can force a Glandelinian officer to tell anything you desire. If you use enough reason," said Jack. You can make a Glandelinian officer tell the most secrets, but as easy as not. And then Angelinia, he said once you have a Glandelinian officer in your power you'll have him leading right out of your hands. Then he got back to his first line of talk. He told me, always to be patient in everything. I do, even when good common sense told me to go at any thing I wished to undertake rashly. He said that any spy who always showed patience in anything he does was the one who even always won out."

"Well we'll have to get Jack to give a speech to the whole army," observed Violet sincerely.

"Well he did give me a real good speech, and by the time he had finished in fact before we had finished we reached the headquarters of general Kneley. He then turned or Angelinia as long as you live," he said in dealing with such desperate people as these never to lose patience. Much as I admire Violet and her sisterly efforts if they were only a little bit more patient they would accomplish more."

"Did you agree I with him Gertrude?"

"I--- why yes, Violet indeed I surely did--especially at that time."

"Thank you Gertrude. Proceed."

"By this time Violet we were on the way up the last flight of stairs. And then we began to hear very loud talking up above. It was general Francis gunda gunda Schmidt. who was talking. He was saying that he defied the whole world to interfere with his plans, if he wanted to make a secret map he would like to see who was the christian spy who would dare to come and take it away from him. He said he did not see where Abbleania had any right to interfere with the child slavery going on in Glandelinia if he wanted a child slave he had a right to make it suffer, that he was a free born Glandelinian citizen, that Glandelinia's cause wicked as it was, was in the right, and don't you forget it, that if anybody from Abbleania up to the whole world tried to interfere with Glandelinia's purpose of making floods and explosion and forest fire disasters and other massacres when it wanted to win a war that way Glandelinia was the nation that would show them where to get off. That's General Francis Schmidt talking," I said to Jack. Then we heard another voice. It was general Federals. He said the Glandelinian armies were not trying to win the war because the christian generals were too familiar with the country. "So you mean to say that in the cause only," cried general Francis Schmidt. "I'm afraid it's true," answered general Federal. Then we heard a noise as if there was a convention going on.

"As if the generals were holding a council Gertrude!!!!!!"

"Yes a council. We were at the door by that time, I with the basket on my arm and Jack in front. He gave a thundering knock at the door and when one of the generals said "come in" he threw open the door. About sixty generals were seated about a large oblong table with lots of books and papers on it, and general Francis Schmidt a fierce-looking man was walking toward us. "What do you want?" he said. "Good morning everybody," says Jack. "I want to general to see general Schmidt. I'm that that officer said Schmidt. What is it?" "I'm sent by Kneley but I want to speak to you in private," says Jack. "It's very important," Schmidt stepped out, and secretly Jack closed and locked the door. "You are not a christian dog are you?" says general Schmidt. "No I'm not such a thing as says Jack. Suppose general we come downstairs, where no one will overhear us." "Sure," says the general, and down the steps the went arm in arm like two long lost brothers. When we got to the first floor two flights down we walked to the front part of the corridor where there was a large entrance. That house used to belong to your aunt. You remember?"

"Most distinctly Gertrude." Violet answered. She could see that Gertrude had something worth telling. "Go on Gertrude don't leave anything out."

"There was a large lighted candle at the center of the corridor--the end looking north toward the National line, and right below it was a water faucet, and Jack who is powerful and big marched him up turned on the faucet and said in a voice that was louder than a whisper "Now you Glandelinian stripped Skunk, you can of a skunk farm, tell me who ordered the making of the flood explosion and forest fire disasters or I'll sent you to help the devil shovel coal. That" continued Gertrude did not exactly bring any results, in fact he---"

"You may let that part go Gertrude."

"Thank you Violet," said Gertrude visibly relieved. "Then as the general refused to say anything, he gave him a sudden squeeze and a whirl, and before you could count one he had his head under that water faucet. Now will you tell?" demanded Jack. But in answer, the cursing, swearing and blaspheming that general Schmidt let out was terribly shocking. But Jack stopped that pretty quick. He gave a sudden jerk to the general's head, and the water got into his mouth and set him to coughing and choking something awful. Then he began kicking Jack in the legs but he just held on and didn't seem to notice at all. "Now will you tell?" yelled Jack. "No you spy," gasped the officer.

"They Gertrude turn on the faucet more," shouted Jack to me. I obeyed turning it on all the way. My leg is sore yet from the kick I got. I thought the Glandelinian general would be drowned, but Jack did not seem to take notice or probably did not care. By this time three or four Glandelinian soldiers were out in the hallway making comments. They would have rushed us, but I covered them with my pistols. One of them had a face that looked as if he had a bad case of small pox his face was so covered with big blackheads. But Jack did not notice them either. "Now who caused the floods?" But in answer the Glandelinian general kept on kicking. He landed this time squarely on Jack's stomach. "Stop your infernal kicking or I'll hold your head here forever," roared Jack. Violet, in a wonder by this time the whole Glandelinian camp full of soldiers wasn't in the corridor--Jack was making such noise. He didn't know it, I guess he thought he was only whispering. You see he was mad all through because he could not make him tell. The Glandelinian officer gave another kick and then stopped. Jack was choking him.

It was all quite for a minute--nothing but the sound of the water spouting over that big man's head. Jack was dripping water too but he did not notice it. Then that Glandelinian officer whose face seemed to be broke out into a bad case of small pox, said "It's a wonder the generals can't take an extra drink or two without fighting over it and trying to drive each other. Lieutenant whatever your name is," bellowed Jack "Mind your own business or my foot will do a real guard action." Seeing that the general would not tell what he desired of him he took the same head from under the faucet. General Schmidt had no fight left in him, he stood there blinking and sputtering.

"Jack," I whispered "you are forgetting the last backbit. Give it here he said. "I'll give this Glandelinian skunk a hat that will fit him." I handed it over to Jack and the next thing you know he clasped that skunk food and all over general Schmidt's head, he made it fit too somehow or other. Just then a rebel general in that room above had managed to break down the door and came running down the stairs, and when they saw Jack tormenting general Schmidt they shouted and set up a bedlam of cursing, swearing and blaspheming. Then they came heading down the stairs, some of them with drawn pistols and made toward us. "Run" cried Jack, upsetting a smoke lamp he lit on the floor on purpose, and down the stairs we went nearly breaking our necks, and not stopping until we were far off. We were pursued hard, but in the darkness of a coming smoke cloud from near forest fires we escaped."

During this graphic recital, Violet, and her sisters tried in vain to keep a sober face.

"You and Jack might as well get up a new organization for practical spy banditry," said Violet. By "By the way, isn't Jack out there now. Call him in."

Jack when called, entered and saluted. Indeed he looked too virtuous to be true.

"How are your legs Jack? Did the Glandelinian officer kick you hard?"

Jack looked at Angelinia Gronburg, and then he understood that the young girl scout leader had told of the adventure adventure, and he burst into a laugh that caused a flutter, as Violet, and her sisters afterwards learned among a large group of soldiers outside.

"I have been very much interested Jack by Gertrude's account of your spy work," said Jack grinning and reaching for his knee, which he rubbed gingerly....

"It is not so easy,--this spy work of that kind Jack. You were in danger."

"I should say not princess Violet. But I took chances."

"How did you know that general Francis Schmidt knew something about the making of the flood disasters Jack?"

"Oh," cried Jack "I learned all about it. And I'll go now if necessary and get the information or kill every Glandelinian general there is in the army. These disasters are unfair and going too far. I knew of another officer who also knows of the ones who ordered the floods, and when I cornered him he fought me like a tiger to get away he was so anxious to escape. Hold on here," I cried "I'll make you tell your secret or kill you. Go to H---ll," he shouted in answer swinging at me with his sabre and then missing drew his pistol and leveled it at me, and then in the split second he shot him."

"I understand Jack that you've made up some very good ideas as to how we little princesses should deal with the Glandelinians, when we spy upon them, especially officers and generals, and Glandelinian spies also, when there's great information to be obtained...."

"We must always get the Glandelinian officers first-----always the officer who knows the most information," put in Gertrude Angeline. "There are a lot of these so called spies who go snooping around the ignorant or more suspicious Glandelinian privates, and there's nothing to be found out."

"You're right," said Jack. "No doubt he intended to whisper these words. But any one out in the company streets could have heard it."

"And" continued Gertrude with solemn face "No matter how often we fail we must never lose our patience. We must strive harder for every time we fail."

Jack said nothing, but he showed approval of her words. Also as Violet, and her sisters saw out of the corner of their eyes there was certain pantomimic signs directed by Jack at Gertrude Angeline, expressing clearly that he did not want her to leave anything out.

"And on no account," Gertrude went on "is there to be any recklessness, any over cautiousness, overconfidence, and especially no backing out of the very game."

"What about the reputation of those generals Jack?" Joie asked.

"What do you mean Princess?"

"Their reputation. Did you look up the reputation of those generals?"

"I didn't in notice their reputation but I don't want to know it Princess. You see I didn't have a good look in their room where they were gathered. Besides we didn't have the chance to remain as long as I intended."

"I should say not," interjected Gertrude, "and the way we did get out with a bunch of Glandelinian officers chasing us, one with a million big blackheads on his face and trying to shoot us, was a sight for sore eyes."

"Sure" said Jack almost laughing. "The slight of the broomstick legs and pie faces of some of those goofy looking Glandelinian officers would start a whole world of blind and near sighted persons to going to moving picture shows to see them."

"And then Jack" Joie continued "Did you go into the matter of caution?"

"I only dared to go as far as their room alright," answered Jack. "I couldn't summon the very nerve to go inside."

"Ah Jack you may be a good spy but you are not at all scientific."

"Qin't I?" inquired Jack anxiously...

"No you are not. H..J."

"All the same" Gertrude put in "He gave general Schmidt the water treatment."

"Yes."

"And if that ain't science I'd like to know what is."

"And the general looked like a top popped skeleton," said Jack.

"If you had been a scientific you would have spent a week at least in trying to study the surroundings of the rebel generals---that's environment, and then you would have spent a month or two to find out all about, what the generals know, their caution."

"Sure but of information? I don't want to know anything about them, or their reputation, the old gray uniformed skunks."

"Well then heredity of enmity," Joie went on saying. "If you had been more scientific you'd have done nothing if you discovered a Glandelinian general or officer would not give in to your demands?"

"Well I'm glad then if I am not at all scientific."

"But he sure was patient," said Gertrude sweetly. "Pretending he also was a Glandelinian general, he walked down thru flights of stairs arm in arm with general Schmidt. The two of them at that time looked like a pair of cooing doves. And what followed makes me almost believe that Jack got you princesses beat in spy work. He says you Violet, and also your sisters are great indeed, but you'd be the biggest and the most record breaking spies on record if in your work you would only have a teeny weeny bit more of patience. Oh Jack studied it out, all out I'll say. He knows what he is talking about. I never saw any one as patient as he was as he stood for ever so long holding general Schmidt under the water or water sput spout, because he would not tell him who ordered the flood."

Jack looked at Gertrude in open mouthed wonder, and he was about to say something in answer but the proper words not coming, he remained open mouthed.

"Jack" said Joie "I must say I wouldn't have done what you did."

"You were too rash and could have caused us all to be under detection," interpolated Gertrude.

"But all the same" Joie went on "You Jack did in one way, what I'm inclined to believe was the right thing."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes."

"How?"

"You acted on impulse and sometimes impulse is the very thing to act upon, even though it is like throwing yourself into a hot furnace."

"Thank you princess Joie" said Jack with a smile.

"Only" Joie continued "I wouldn't advise you to get the habit of using the water faucet whenever you in your efforts to get information go catching or kidnapping

"Glandelinian officer."

"Do you think," placed myself in more greater danger, even if I would have been a little more patient?"

"I rather think you did."

"Jack looked as if he could not smile again."

"Never mind Jack, you were perfectly right. Cheer up Jack."

"Everybody's doing it," added Gertrude.

"Except the victims of the explosion and flood disasters," put in Violet, and her sisters nodded assent.

Nevertheless Violet and her sisters did not feel so easy. As far as they could understand, from experiences of their own, this was one of the most desperate means taken on record for any one to make a Glandelinian officer tell anything. Their own way of intention for obtaining information was usually to, eavesdrop upon the Glandelinian generals or other officers while they would be holding a meeting, or having conversation at certain places, but to seize one and try to force him to tell anything they wished to know---well it seemed out of the ordinary. They felt it could bring some danger if not upon themselves, upon Jack and Gertrude, though Jack had more to do with it than Jack did.

And what was more the attempt had been a failure for the general had refused to tell anything the two desired to know. They at first didn't say anything to Gertrude, or confirm their suspicions to her, but they dismissed Jack, and then settled down to do a little work of their own.

INTRODUCING MORE OF JENNIE TURNER AND A NOVEL
BOYSCOUT LETTER

NOT suspecting who they were a number of glandelinian girl scouts paid Violet, and her sisters a visit that afternoon.

"Did you hear what happened at General Manley's headquarters sometime yesterday?" one whose name was Jennie asked.

"What was it sister? Anything unusual?"

"Two christian spies, and a man giant in size, called on the generals, found general Schmidt and during council time got him to come outside of his room, pretending he had some important information for him. Then they got him out the big one seized him, and forced him along to a water faucet, and kept him there until he was nearly choked. They would have killed him the soldiers tell me, if the generals had not broken out of the room, raced down with pistols drawn and driven them away. It was terrible they say."

"Pretending to be ignorant of the fact, Violet asked:

"What could have been their object? Were they really spies or were they some foreign bandits trying to rob him."

"No they didn't do anything to show they were thieves. They were trying to force some information out of him concerning floods, and something about the explosion horrors that has been going on since the war began otherwise I do not understand it."

"Possibly," said Alice. "The christian spies wanted to steal his plans. Thinking to make it more stronger," she continued "I and my followers here were doubled crossed by a spy boy scout. Maybe he was also our enemy."

"Plans," exclaimed the girl scout "That's about the last thing I could imagine."

"Why?"

"Because the general confessed to every one that the two who grabbed him knew he had some information about floods that the generals had created."

"Why should they create floods? And how did they create floods? And how come they approach me with all that nonsense," she said thinking by this argument she might obtain some information."

"I do not know myself but they created floods. I thought you heard all in the news, but we must be going and if we can return we'll bring you some of the newspapers that tell about the floods."

And they were gone.

Gertrude who was in the tent at the time had pretended to be reading a large geography though she was covering her face with it, and looking at it upside down.

"You see Gertrude," Joyce said as the astonished girls came within. "The system you and Jack have inaugurated is of such a kind that fortunately for us all the glandelinians instead of taking you for spies you and your companion, imagine you to be a pair of cutthroats. Did not any of the glandelinian generals recognize you and Jack?"

"I hope not, when we ran outside it was quite dark, and besides we didn't fairly get into the room, where the generals were holding their council, and finally when the officers came running down and started yelling and cursing at us, we both dashed off before any one could see us well in that dimly lighted hall. Jack blue the candles out and the glass of the lamp was black from smoke and didn't give much light. I say Violet I hope we do not all be detected for what I saw Jack did last night, we might all be either taken or forced to flee like the camp, and our mission will be of no avail."

"I and my sisters promise Gertrude that if we can help it that mission of you and Jack will always remain a dead secret to the enemy."

To this day the best of the glandelinian generals do not guess the identity of the two christian philanthropists, (except Schmidt) who in their excess of desire for very important information held the head of general Francis Schmidt for some eight or ten minutes or even more under a large water faucet giving him an ice cold bath. As a result of Jack's phil philanthropy, the whole camp was being scoured for him and his small companion. General Schmidt assured his generals that he was sure the little girl who helped his assistant was Angelina Aronburg.

Danger for a while lurked everywhere for her, the suspicion of her presence showed in the faces, and in every conversation of all glandelinian soldiers and officers met with, and also in their actions. Much of this Violet and her sisters learned from Jennie Turner, and to keep her under cover for their sakes as well as hers she could not visit the for a while, so avoid suspicion when they dared to meet her she always smiled and bowed with the winning grace so peculiar to her, but to avoid suspicion for them and herself she pretended to show no candid confidence unless the place was clear of soldiers. Those not knowing the true situation would have thought that she had lost faith in them, and that she was ashamed of the princesses. No one knowing the real truth could answer

THE question. For the same reason too, Angelina Ichoe, kept out of their way. Meanwhile Jennie Turner the young Abbeannian tigress girl was in close communication with the glandelinian generals serving Manley in particular as a messenger, which notes and the like she secretly took the opportunity to recopy before delivery. Through her efforts Angelina Aronburg who had been keeping under cover for several days was persuaded to cleverly disguise herself, and return to her work in another way but warned to keep out of sight of Violet and her sisters and the rest for a time until notified further, and also to keep her eyes open and her pistol pistols well loaded. The good girl scout like so many girl heroines overburdened with the strain of keeping at bay out of reach of her enemies had simply lost hopes of any success in her undertakings and often suffered strongly from the almost overpowering temptation of drawing her pistols and shooting down in ambush every glandelinian general she saw.

Although Angelina Aronburg through their advice visited Violet, and her sisters no more; they had no reason to worry about her. The child scout was still leader in all their efforts and her efforts, and though Jennie Turner acting through their signatures was supplied with such help as they thought would best develop the girls success and her efforts. As they now were with a multiplicity of important affairs, and also to keep the enemy from being suspicious they did not do nothing to establish with Gertrude Angelina their old relations. Of course this had to be pretended otherwise disaster might ensue, which evidently came from the very conversation among officers and soldiers Violet and her sisters also overheard.

Many would believe by this that Gertrude Angelina was now thinking less of Violet and her sisters when in reality it was not the case. These few days had passed away, another day came dark and dreary and the sky black and dark gray with smoke clouds as if an approaching thunderstorm and the temperature was unusually high so that every one felt uncomfortable. Nevertheless, on that hot morning Jennie Turner was ready for the opening hand of the adventure, and with them to the surprise of Violet, and her sisters they brought Mildred Maxwell the same pretty little girl heroine we so well know. What she was to go through during the remaining many months of the war was enough penance for any little girl of her age. Whether truly existing existing or not little girls and boys in this story and outside of it are sure of heroic stuff. Usually they defy any peril, as if it did not exist.

"Good morning Princesses," said Jennie Turner. "I hope and pray that sooner or later we'll be successful in our undertaking. This you know is our friend Mildred Maxwell. Mildred, shake hands with the 'Darlings of the Nation.'"

In answer to which Mildred clasped the hands of the princesses most heartily while at the order of one of them the hide-de-camp retreated to a more respectful distance as was the custom from which cordon of vantage, unobserved by them except Jennie Turner, he peeped out at the girls with large investigating eyes.

"My friends," demonstrated Jennie Turner severely. "No matter where you are you are always a peeping curiosity complex, and you said you do not do any such thing. You are always talking good of Violet, and her sisters, and you said you wanted to see them succeed in everything they do so awful bad."

"I do want them to succeed," said Francis stoutly.

"Well then, try to overcome your curiosity. We'll mistake you for a glandelinian boy scout spy some day, and then you'll wish you had overcome your foolish habit."

There were several pieces of paper on Violet's table. She glanced over them, and then held one of them over, toward Jennie Turner, who took it with noticeable alacrity and glanced over it with promptness.

"What do you think of that Jennie?" asked Violet beaming.

"That's excellent."

"Well Jennie," Joyce inquired. "How have you succeeded so far?"

Yet Violet, and her sisters could to a certain extent, anticipate the answer. The two girl scouts were nicely uniformed, the gray color was good, their eyes were shining with intense excitement. Both notably Mildred had grown taller.

"Princesses we have made success, but had a delightful time of it. All of our followers have been working steadily, and Gertrude said she would not at all be surprised if final success did crown our undertaking. For most of our efforts have been great and yesterday we were working for a glandelinian general at Camp Dell, near the village of Goring View, and we just had no end of fun. I learned to do new things."

"And I," said Mildred, did "Discovered something very important."

"And Princesses," continued Jennie "the glandelinian generals had such a great council, and they had ever so many generals attending it, and me of my followers went into the general big tent, barefooted with a long stick in her hand, disguised as a housegirl. And Mildred was the attendant to the general, and brought to any one of them what they called for after secretly copying them off hastily."

"I secured one general thirteen times and secured thirteen pages from his original" said the accurate and solemn Mildred.

And many of the boy and girl scouts were with us. One of the boy scouts tried to teach us many tricks but we proved we could do anything ourselves."

"Yes we sure did." Said Mildred who by this time, was standing before Violet, and her sisters not so much in token of her growing confidence in them, as for the reason it was a good strategic position for getting on the good side of them an advantage of which she was not by any means slow to avail herself. Just then Michael in all the splendor of a dazzling new uniform stepped in to announce that there were some Gemini Members in the outer tent to see the Vivian Girls.

"Why Michael? Did Jennie Turner?" "How do you do?"

"In any way you ask." answered the lad.

"Did you discover anything important?" asked Violet.

"Yes," was taking a little nourishment from a general table while he was not yet there, and learned that though every glandelinian knew who ordered the making of the flood and explosion disasters and the like they pretend uttermost ignorance of it, and all our followers are taking days and night, watching every general, and listening to all kinds of conversation and waiting an opportunity to seize an important paper with the hope of learning something..."

"You haven't been successful have you?"

"I haven't but I have this." Pointing to Jennie Turner.

"Have you Jennie?"

"Not so as you could notice it."

"I thought so." exclaimed Michael. "It's not so easy as you think."

"Things ain't so well, Michael, and we are all being watched."

"Now what do you think of that?" growled Michael much displeased. "That's sure beautiful news you're giving me. Maybe it's not true" and Michael's face was glowing red fast.

"Yes it's absolutely true" declared Mildred. "I never saw so many looking upon us with suspicion before."

"Can you beat that?" ejaculated Michael much embarrassed. "I'll have to get busy and if anything happens signal the warning," and saluting he disappeared.

"Well Mildred" Violet said as she surveyed her from head to foot "do you still think you are able to continue your dangerous work, or do you want to go home?"

"This vacation" said Mildred is good enough for me."

"She was a little timid when she first began to serve with us in the army," explained Jennie Turner but she is very fond of the work now. She is always talking about the holiness of the cause and every night and morning she prays most heartily for the success of our side in the war. Don't you Mildred?"

"Yes I do" answered Mildred.

"I taught her myself Violet-and oh for you and your sisters who have suffered so much in our behalf and for the sake of our dear blessed Lord and his His other I'm going to try my best at everything in the future and get good credit and will deserve the nickname of "Little Princess of Abbelesman. And to begin with we ourselves must capture some glandelinian general and force him to tell us about who originated the flood, and so will Mildred, and we are going to prove to the world, what good girl scouts all of us including you Princesses are and can be. You are too are you not Mildred?"

"Gee my heart and hope to die," came the eagerest answer.

"Thank you girls, and as you are so good in doing all this for me, and my sisters I'm going to make it a point to lend you all the aid possible, and to remember everything you did every day at our own prayers, as we have been doing in the past eight or nine months."

"Oh Princesses" cried Jennie coming up on her toes "Have you really remembered everything we did every day?"

"Surely surely my dear"

"After all you have gone through yourselves all the danger," she says she ejaculated these words was dumb.

"To get whatever we do Jennie. Do not fear anything."

"I'll never forget all you do," vowed Jennie coming down on her heels with savage emphasis. "And Princesses and do you still still expect success for all our adventures?"

"Long ago Jennie."

"Oh" cried Jennie her eyes shining, and her face flashing red. "I thought you couldn't the way the war is going on so far. Vivian Girls I am so happy. And so is Mildred are you not Mildred?"

"I feel like a big bird flying away," answered Mildred. Jennie then executed her familiar courtsey something similar to that of Angeline de Richee, Mildred bobbed and then the two disappeared.

So this day passed as it had begun and for a time real success seemed to come for Violet, and her sisters. Jennie Turner, Angeline Richee, and Gertrude Angeline kept their eyes on the movements of every one of the glandelinian generals, and from a point of advantage listened to their conversation and brought Violet, and her sisters the most favorable reports.

The loyal followers of these girl scouts, had every justification for their assurance that no better girlscouts, or girl spies could be found than Gertrude Angeline, Jennie Turner, or Angeline Richee, nor more dangerous women persuaded. Between that day and two days later they overheard a glandelinian general out of sight once, but yet they never overheard anything concerning the ones who ordered the flood. On the morning of the fifth or sixth of September among the other important codes letters, the Vivian Girls received the following following:

"September the 6th 1913..."

DEAR DARLINGS OF THE NATION:

Once more we have almost succeeded in our quest. But dear Princesses may anything you dismay, for patience always wins. You Darlings of the Nation are the main spies, who take the places of those who cannot do the work you can for you are the chief professional spies of Abbelesman, and we are merely your aids. Of course dear Princesses we cannot write to you what we discovered as it might be observed, and I don't think Gertrude Angeline would approve of it either, if she made a regular thing of it. On this day of success we feel as good as if it was Christmas day. But especially we feel good to all Christians soldiers and peoples who have been so specially and especially kind in helping us. And Violet, and your sisters now know how awfully good you have been to us! If I was dead and if our blessed Lord allowed my spirit to do so I think I would be able to guide you safely through all future dangers and adventures.

On next Christmas day, Dear Darlings of the Nation I hope that the infant Jesus will bring you everything you need, and more the end of this awful war. Then it will be;

"On Tidings of Comfort and joy, Peace on earth to men of good will"

One more we must make a final effort but even now I do so wish we had already succeeded in the quest we are after and returned to the christian lines, and also to our generals with our information. I wish it mostly for your sakes. But we will pray for your and our success dear Princesses who are our good friends and most loving comrades.

Your Loving Companion, Jennie Francis Turner/..

There was a number of other letters like this--only none quite so original--which Mildred stirred Violet, and her sisters strongly attracted. These brave Abbelesman children had humbled many of the greatest of christian generals. Yet who were they that so many, yet innocent and brave childrenlike these should think of all men with love, serve them and yet pray for them with fervor? It is claimed that poets have gone into east asia over the laughter of a little child. Yet what is their laughter, compared to their friendship and love? A poet has been able to answer that question. It is above and beyond all poetry. And yet to gain it one needs to be kind, sympathetic, and to show the little ones that supreme reverence which the poet says justly is due them.

And even if one fails now and then in kindness and in sympathy there should never be failure in reverence--these little ones forgive and forget so easily, and kiss the hand that smite them.....

"Just this morning."

"Yes we sure did." Said... Alred who by this time, was standing before a Violet, INTRODUCTION ONE OF THE BOY SCOUTS AT HIS WORST, AND OVERTHROW AT HER BEST.

The next morning morning

The next morning, ingmorning a boy scout met Violet and her sisters as they were returning from breakfast.

"Violet" he said "There is a little girl over in your tent waiting to see you and your sisters."

"They found Angelina Rishon huddled up in a chair. On seeing seeing them she arose not however with her usual sprightliness.

"Oh Darlings of the Nation" she said, and burst into tears.

"Don't cry Rishon. What is it my dear? Are the Glandolinians getting wise to us or is Jewdie Turner failing in her efforts again?"

Angelina Rishon after a short struggle controlled herself.

"It's worse than that. Ned threatens to desert us to night."

"Mr. Their hearts sank. A reding away" ki like the unsubstantial pageant of a happy vision they felt sure they saw their fane on which they had high hopes of success being a "parently frustrated."

"When did he decide to do this, Angelina?"

"He was out last night with some strange boys who sided with him, and when he returned to the camp at ten way past the ordinary time he remained up with them disregarding the orders of a taps, and being close by I could not help overhearing what he said."

"Rishon we are all sincerely sorry indeed."

"Q And Violet please, don't give him a chance to know you evenus out. And don't have him arrested now or he may surely expose him or us!"

"And why not my dear?"

"Because then he might also feel so offended that he might fully turn against us altogether, and even betray the cause which is so good, and which we all love so much, and it would be terrible if from anger he went to take sides with the Glandolinians and betray us all of the away enemy. You know which things are common nowadays. We have to be careful which way we turn"

"Angelina Rishon you may be sure just how I'll not have him arrested but you may be sure I'll have to report him to a sort of the Glandolinians that they'll watch his every move! In the meanwhile I and my sisters will go down to see him and try to coax him to turn from his evil ways."

"Oh will you Princesses?" exclaimed Angelina begging rising other tones and throwing in cut her hands with fashion. "How good. I hope he'll give in. We will await you there to night. And Violet and your sisters you'll say a prayer that he won't do it!"

"We certainly will."

"Good bye Princesses."

With her sweeping curtsey she was gone. Really it was a sudden disappearance. True to their promise Violet, and her sisters entered the camp of the disguised christian boy scouts, as the bugles were sounding for the call of officers to assemble. They were admitted by a delegation, Angelina Rishon, Angelina Gronburg, Mildred Maxwell, and others, all of them uniformed into that was actually exquisite. They were in looks and attire lovely little girl scouts, and as they appeared that night fit to grace the palace of any prince of emperor. Even in any camp these little human flowers of the north change all camp life into joy and cheerfulness, and touch the surroundings into a strange and unimagined beauty. All smiles, the girls saying nothing and their respective and carefully rehearsed salutes, Angelina Rishon her elaborate curtsey, Mildred a less elaborate sweep, Jennie Turner her graceful bob, and so on.

"Down in orchards," said Angelina Rishon. Let us have your umbrellas. We did not think you'd come out in this awful rain, and thunder storm."

During these ceremonies, Violet, and her sisters planned over the camp. It was large indeed for the small numbers in it and for some reason other, the tents were further apart, than usually seen in any other portion of the camp but clear as a Dutch, all parlor. Not far off was the Glandolinian Child Scout Hall. Beyond it important array, glittered a long line of field pieces of brass. They seemed to show to the best advantage, and a long line of breastworks was decorated with those pretty little Glandolinian standards which gave the earthworks an air of refinement even in warlike. But what surprised Violet, and her sisters most were long decorations of Glandolinian bunting with here and there red, yellow and blue national flags hanging across the company streets, and giving the entire camp a very decorative appearance indeed. Jennie Turner herself smiling brightly said:

"Come I will lead you to Ned."

"How beautiful everything looks in your camp." Violet, overheard as she took her hand. "You girl scouts with your sunny ways would brighten any place, but this camp surely has a Glandolinian appearance."

"The other girl scouts and boys also have been working all day Princesses to get things in shape for you. We told them you were coming, and somehow or other they managed to obtain these decorations, and worked like little bays."

"We helped too," protested some of the boys.

"So you did my dear friends" assented the Vivian girls "and without you I don't see how they could have finished."

These boys thereupon looked proud and smiled at everybody, and everything in general.

"Where is Ned Parker?"

"He is in his tent. He says he's not feeling well," said Gertrude with a most suspicious smile. "All day he has been lying in his cot. Oh Princesses thank God, and H is Blessed Mother that he did not begin thinking of deserting till last night else we should not have discovered it. But now--" here she broke down and put her handkerchief to her eyes.

"Excuse me" she said recovering herself. "And I'll try to get Ned to come and see you." saying which she entered a large tent. Accepting the invitation to meet themselves, Violet and her sisters were at once surrounded by the smallest boy and girl scouts. Nor did they show the least surprise, when Ned came walking out. He was a fine looking lad, tall for his age, slightly built, and a decidedly blonde complexion. He looked harmless enough, only his eyes and facial expression gave hint of his high spirited nature.

"Greetings Princesses" he said advancing to meet them.

"The same to you my friend. I see you have a swell camp here."

"Yes Princesses it is so."

Violet motioned her girl friends to follow her to the other girl and boy scouts go outside as she wished to talk to Ned alone.

"You are going to spoil everything by backing out on us. W 2 "Said Violet/ andly."

"I was advised to by some friends and surely the advice is good and fair. You scolded me and therefore I'm returning it good."

"And you believe you will have a good time by being so foolish and and so wicked and sinful by leaving us flat like this so because we righteously rebuked you!"

"Yes Princesses. We all were created with a free will, and I choose to do as I wish therefore."

"I was. And by leaving us flat in the mud you mean to revenge my scolding is that it for fair. Look at the situation Ned not for us but for the sake of your soul. It is desecration to desert a cause like that is playing the part of Judas. You might as well go on and betray us then. You are making a most dangerous move. And you call it a good time by listening to the advice of your wicked companions, and desert your best friends because one of them reproached you for your blunder!"

"You nearly spoiled everything for me when you scolded me that morning."

"But your blunder was so serious."

"But I was accompanied by some of my friends."

"And you had a good time?"

"Yes Violet."

"And by a good time you meant a real blunder."

"I did not know it would happen."

"And yet you lose your reason and want to desert the cause of our Blessed Lord. Look at your hands lad. They are trembling. Your nerves are gone. You are excited very much over your intention."

"That's so Princesses."

"And you call that having a good time a p spoiling our plans do you. In the name of God my boy tell me what it is to have a bad time, or to have a bad time to come to you if you call that sort of thing having a good time."

"Princesses I'll think it over before I quit."

"If not for yourself or us, then for the sake of the cause, and the many millions of children which our nation is trying to free from bondage. Just think of the condition of these child slaves now. They are just as well off as lost souls almost. Suppose you had been alive for about six months it would be quite bad for you and you know it. When when did you say your prayers and go to Confession Ned, and Holy Communion last?"

"Just this morning."

"And yet you intend to desert us?"

"Yes."
"No wonder God had withdrawn his graces from you so you cannot even resist the awful temptation to do this awful thing. Receiving Holy Communion and yet intend to commit this mortal sin and commit a terrible crime to our Blessed Lord as well. A careless Catholic boy about like you need not the expectation of the blessing of God on his daily life, and he'll even excuse you to be taken by the same enemy before you get very far. You must repent and resume your duties as a Catholic should and resolve to remain with our cause as long as you live and repent of and confess that awful sacrilege you're committing. And to desert our cause now would be the same as betraying betraying our Blessed Lord to his worst enemies."

"Well I'll make my final decision to night but I cannot promise you anything until to-morrow or until you repent of that scolding you gave me as I do not take a scolding from any one whether I'm wrong or right. Now I'm at not fully decided I'm not able to think--oh what a fool I've been to come here my how on this expedition. Leaving everything to serve a cause that I believe right, and then be scolded for a slight mistake. I'll try to be ready to-morrow to make a final decision. Princesses. I'd like to go to you alone if I give in if you please for in all ways otherwise you have been very good to me and my followers, and they are talking of you all the time. But I did not like the scolding and I'm warning you Princesses to that I'm square in one way, and so I'm telling you if I go off so will all my followers desert the cause too. If I go so will they all, fifteen hundred boys and girls with me."

"Well how would to-morrow morning do at eight o'clock?" Asked Violet.

"Anything that suits you, suits me Princesses."

"Very well be at our tent to-morrow evening at eight o'clock. Now girls and boy scouts." Violet continued raising her voice "You can resume your duties, we have had our little talk."

Presently Violet, and her sisters took their leave with thankful hearts. The possibility of an ideal boyscout remaining firm to his cause--and still following him a column of lovely and bright child scouts gave promise of at length becoming a reality. Gertrude Angeline and Jennie Turner insisted on accompanying Violet, and her sisters to their tent. Once they were out of earshot of any Glandelinians, Violet, and her sisters stopped, Violet holding Gertrude by the hand.

"Violet Violet, is Ned going to stay with us?"

"You Jennie I think he is. He has promised me to interview us to-morrow evening."

Jennie's face became transfigured.

"Oh Princess I and my followers have been praying for it day and night." "Ned my dear means to do right but he's weak. Keep on praying for him. But I think nevertheless there's something something strange about him."

"Shall we ride all the way to the tent with you Violet?" Gertrude asked when in the girls' camp.

"Oh no my dear. We have angels for our companions."

"You have all the angels of heaven I think" said Gertrude simply. "Good night Darlings of the Nation and sleep tight."

"Before Violet, and her sisters could turn she was a actually racing down the company street. Gertrude Angeline and also Jennie Turner brought encouragement to Violet, and her sisters.....

That following evening punctual to the stroke of the clock, Violet and her sisters returned to their part of the camp after having been questioned three times by some very suspicious Glandelinians. There were they observed their own girl scouts on duty but in the casual glances they gave them, they failed to discover the presence of Ned Parkers. Scarcely the next morning had they seated themselves for supper in the Mess Hall when they heard someone stop inside the hall nearest to them. Violet went to the entrance and was about to ask if it was Ned when a girl's voice gave her pause.

"Don't be alarmed Princesses. I'm Mildred."

"There was bad news indeed Princesses."

"And where is Ned now Mildred?"

"He went away last night about two hours after you and your sisters left, Violet. He said he had to go away somewhere on an important mission or get into serious trouble. Jennie Turner wanted to accompany him, but he wouldn't let her. So he went out himself, and Jennie and Angeline and I stayed up all night. We repeated the Rosary and the Litany of the blessed Virgin eight times, while waiting for him to return. He got back at half four this morning and--here the little voice broke into sobs. "And Violet he made his final decision to desert. When reproached he told me to mind my own business, and threw a rock at Jennie and beat some of my followers for staying up--and he is making preparations to leave. And he'll be gone before very long if you don't stop him quick."

"The poor foolish boy" said Violet "It is his one great weakness Mildred, and we must all continue to pray for him, and in the end perseverance will win. We must be patient. Give us all our love and a good night."

"And Violet, I want to thank you and your sisters for all the trouble you have taken. Oh I and Gertrude were so happy last night. I myself felt as if I could fly. Gertrude all and all of us were so sure he was coming to interview you and your sisters last night or to night. And Violet I'm afraid he'll betray us to the Glandelinians for he said no one has a right to scold him no matter how great his offenses as he has a right to do as he wishes. I'm also afraid he'll kill Angeline Riches, he gets so savage when he knows any one is shadowing him. I don't mind his deserting us so much."

"Didn't he really say he's going to desert Mildred?"

"Yes he did Violet but he did not really say when he is going to do it. And I found it hard to ride here to night as my horses left leg is a little stiff. He fell once and threw me, and my legs, arms and shoulders are black and blue from the way I was thrown and therefore I am a little lame too."

By this time Violet could feel her blood tingling in every vein. After all she and her sisters had gone through, must they suffer this, which is far worse than all of their experiences of the past. Her sisters felt furious.

"If he deserts us he ought to be imprisoned. Imprisoned" Violet said.

"But he is only that way because he is still hurt over the scolding you gave him Violet. Oh if you knew him when he is himself. But I must go or my company will miss me."

Violet and her sisters repaired to their inner tent in a state of mind far from calm. The picture of their well-treated boy friend, who was the son of the man who had helped them escape from Captain Shakoley to turn again at them because he was justly chided for a blunder. And she did not scold him. She only complained. Impossible for him to do that. I cannot be. Why he had aided them in all evils before been most faithful to them. The scene of him now deserting them when they knew he hated like reason before to even be a moment out of their sight--rose so vividly before their eyes that for almost two hours they could not dismiss it. They remembered him in all ways how he could not bear their cries of pain their sorrows, and disappointments as the shame grief and terror in their eyes and face. Oh God, that in such a christian country like Abbeville such things can actually happen. Could he really mean to do it or (a little hope springing up) was he doing this because of a trick of his own in this fashion to secretly risk punishment from them just to find means of his own to obtain for them the information they were seeking. Gradually they seemed to hear the sobs and moans of countless persons made victims by the war and the suffering of the whole human race in general. The low sad music of humanity rose up into a wail. Presently the Princesses were meditating and also fervently and desperately praying the Rosary. More than four hours and a half must have passed, when they were brought to themselves by a call at the tent door.

"Miss Violet" said the guard "There's a little boyscout in front of the tent. He looks wild and he wants to see you, and your sisters in a hurry. He came on unobserved by the Glandelinians."

Her heart jumped. It must be Michael and a visit from him at nine of the night could spell nothing but calamity. Could the worse have happened. Had the girl scout been right in fearing that Ned Parkers in his anger would have really deserted. The guard had scarcely delivered his message, when Violet, and her sisters swung by him and clattered out in the open feeling it terribly warm outside and the sky red as a fire in the distance. Michael it was--standing in the road wringing his hands.

"Oh Princess" he cried running to voice who came first, and pillow his head on her arm. "Something awful has happened and I'm afraid."

So it was not Ned deserting after all. Violet, and her sisters breathed more easily. Gently lifting the boy's head Jennie said:

"What is it Michael? The forest fire coming here?"

"That might be too but that is not why I come. Jennie Turner sent me to watch Ned Parkers four times which struck me very funny that is strange. I then decided to keep my eye on him and finally discovered him making some kind of a preparation. Therefore I thought I'd try to stop him. I heard about a way and I thought I'd try it. So as I went I had his tent surrounded by hidden watchers. After a long while someone came out. He was a Glandelinian officer, the light of the distant fire revealing him plainly to me. As soon as he looked queer to me I jumped on my horse and came to you. But before that I certainly followed him saw him slip something into his pocket which through a clever trick of mine I easily secured. As soon as I secured it I raced here to you."

"What was it that you secured?"

"A letter."

"which pocket did he put it in?"

"The side o' o pocket."

"What kind of a letter is it?"

"I don't know violet, as I took no time to read it. It's this."

Michael produced a small envelope which he had kept concealed with in his right sleeve. Violet, took it inside the tent held it to a candle light, and read "To his gracious excellency general John Parker's son."

"How did that soldier come to be in possession of it?"

"I don't know exactly. I guess Ned wrote it or it may have been a message or an order."

"Wait, Violet said and shot over to where she had her telephone booth. Her good friend Angelina Aronburg fortunately for her on more than one occasion was quite near."

"Headquarters of Angelina Aronburg" came a voice.

"That you Gertrude?"

"No o this is one of her boy scouts. Who calling? The Princess Princess?"

"Yes, violet, Angelic Vivian."

"I'll get her."

"On a few moments of waiting."

"That you Gertrude?"

"Yes."

"This is Princess Violet. I've a hurry call. Can you start with me at once?"

"My horse is right at the tent door."

"Good. Come to my tent and we'll both go together. It's a case of capturing Ned before he gets away. He intends to desert us to night."

"I'm coming" said Gertrude excitedly, and hung up the receiver.

Although it took violet, and her sisters hardly two minutes to get their horses ready, Gertrude Angelina was waiting them before they had gone out into the road.

"Come along quick, Michael," voice said, and together the column of eight girls and one boy trotted, literally trotted from the child scout camp to the street of Company B a distance of one third of a mile to Ned Parker's tent. Voice fairly hurled, Michael toward his horse, the girls jumped on theirs at the same time, and thanks to the late hour and scarcity of the guard set this spot set off at a pace livelier than was legal, for their point.

"Tell me what I'm to know" said Gertrude, as they dashed down vacant Company street.

"Michael wanted to stop Ned Parker from deserting. As he hid near the tent a man came out and Michael secured a note from him. The note happened to be a message of some kind to general Hanley. I did not take time to even give it a look. If it had gotten into his hands I'm afraid it would have betrayed all of us. But I'm not certain I did not read it. I'm afraid Ned is not only a deserter but also a traitor, and we must capture him before he escapes....."

"Vivian, Michael how did you chance to get the note from the man?"

"I followed him, trapped him, knocked him down with a big branch of a tree, gagged him, searched his pockets, and found it. He had it inside the inner cloth of his coat. I took the coat and all until I got a certain way off, and then I tore away the cloth got the letter and burned the coat."

"Did you know it was a most dangerous move on your part?" asked Gertrude as the whole party swung west turning into the street of Company B.

"It did not seem so in the dark," Michael declared.

"If that officer had recognized you" said Gertrude "he and all of the Glandelinians will surely sure you of the habit of attacking Glandelinian officers in the dark effectually."

Fortunately Michael did not understand the importance of her words.

"Did anybody see you take that --a message out of that officers pocket?"

"No."

"Any one know of it?"

"No one Gertrude but you and Violet, and her sisters, and two boy scouts of your company command."

"Well no one is to know not even your command, so you understand young man?"

"Yes Miss Aronburg."

"Can you keep a secret?"

"Yes Miss Aronburg."

"Well you keep this a dead secret or the Glandelinians will capture us all."

Michael was duly impressed no less by the earnestness of Gertrude's voice than by the warning.

"I'll keep it Miss Aronburg for our own safety, cross my heart."

They were now in front of Ned's tent.

"Come that your leisure Gertrude" said violet "Tie all the horses as will you and Michael and my sisters will go ahead at a double speed on fresh horses. I'll let I'll let you know when I want you."

When Gertrude and Violet reached the tent, they found some of the girl scouts on guard. Though they did not show it, the guards appeared to be very much excited.

"Oh Princesses thank you for bringing Gertrude Angelina. We did not know what to do. Ned has deserted us for sure I'm afraid."

"Remain on guard," said violet. "Come on quick Gertrude. We'll catch up with my sisters. We must catch him if possible."

The guards listened to the various sounds and the whispered voices within for what seemed to them generations. At length the girls came out with sober looks on their faces.

"He has escaped all right but he won't get very far girls," said violet, addressing the guards. "Ned Parker our ten-year old boy scout has deserted us for fear and only for the quick action of Michael here would he have succeeded in betraying us all. Tell Jennie Turner that she must signal to all officers of this army of a boy deserting the camp and they'll prevent any boy scout from leaving the camp under any conditions until further orders. Tell her also that by to-morrow that she is to watch every Glandelinian conversation. As for you Michael there is no need of further advice or service to night and after all one of us are in a state to make a pursuit. But early to-morrow you call upon us and we'll see what can be done."

Taking Gertrude aside, Violet gave her a few hasty directions, and presently after some moments Gertrude said to Michael "You might have brought about your untidy end by securing that message in the way you said. As it is there's no harm done. In fact it's going to turn out a good thing."

Gertrude was right. The capture of that message saved them from detection, but the hand writing to the surprise of Violet and her sisters was not that of Ned at all. A number of the shadows were detailed to capture Ned if possible. A number of boy scouts were ordered to accompany them and they received their instructions and pledged themselves to capture him or die. The note which was captured read thus:--

"To whom it may concern;

Be on your guard your Excellency. Vivian girl spies and their companions in the camp indigence looking for important information. Capture them if possible as they are dangerous.

A secret friend."

"And now Gertrude" said violet after looking over the message a second time "what is your opinion?"

"Let me see," mused the girl scout "My opinion is to drum him out of camp, and disgrace, flog him to tar and feather him, and Reichenbach up her decision for hanging him after two hours debate. My horse broke his leg, while on the gallop, I lost my night sleep, and spent twelve hours today trying to have him located. Suppose we call him before a general court-martial."

"I suppose" said violet with a strong accent on the last word.

"Of course" continued Gertrude "With the usual consequence of having a general court-martial of our highest officers in rank with the Christianians."

"And who is to be the judge?"

"The highest general we cannot."

"And who is that?"

"Either general Robertson or General Vivian."

"Those are very general."

"Yes."

"Why not make the poor boy face the firing squad then?"

"To be sure, why not. But I didn't think of it in time."

INTRODUCING SOME SUCCESSORS OF SIX HUNDRED SCOUTS! AND ENTERTAINING.
ANGELS UNAWAR'S.....

AS regards the girl and boy scout spies who accompanied Violet, and her sisters into the foe camp to learn who was responsible for the past disasters, every thing was not as it should be, though they were in the camp longer than a week. The child scouts had grown in shrewdness, loveliness and grace, boldness and caution, and to avoid suspicion served in the enemy's gray as Glandelinian child scouts, and Gertrude and Jennie Turner became the model model head of them all. Gertrude employed her scouts at everything possible to learn what she desired with an exception of serving in anything that would be an offense to Abbie's cause, and actually started on a good point. The only set back so far, was Ned's desertion. Violet, and her sisters remembered the day when Gertrude Angelina with shining eyes told them how she had a full chance to capture one of the Glandelinian officers who knew something of the information they were after, they remembered how she was able to tell them six hours after that there were many Glandelinian generals who knew those who ordered the disasters, and how she was planning to capture some of them and bring them to the very Christian lines and before General Hanson who would try to grill them into a confession. Gertrude had set her heart on accomplishing this at all costs.

"It's so near the time that our generals will begin to be greatly worried about us being gone so long," she said. "We must succeed soon so that we can be back to the Christians before we do succeed."

Many a visit did she and her followers make to every Glandelinian officer she could, a task happily easy because she pretended to serve them, and served them as much as allowable without doing wrong to the cause. She came in the morning after Ned's desertion with shining eyes.

"Oh Princess as I've found a general who if he is captured will probably give us the information we want. You know that little one story house of the camp belonging to Company D?"

"Very well Gertrude."

"About fifty generals including Stanley are going into that house to hold a secret meeting or council on tomorrow night, and we can get in there before they come and hide somewhere and listen to what they say. To-morrow morning I'm going to bring Jennie Turner, Gertrude Angelina, and Rhine to see it, and I'm sure she'll make her plans. Then we will come to get you, and nearly all the other girls will be close by to give us aid if we would be suspected by the foe. There is no better chance anywhere else."

But the following morning which had been so full of promise brought its heavy disappointment. The generals suspecting something something had suddenly changed their plans, and held their meeting at an unknown spot. It was Jennie Turner who brought the news and she came with saddened face to tell Violet, and her sisters that the generals had been suspicious, and fooled them all.

"The old story."

"Yes," said the girl scout. "We have all been fooled again. But it is not so bad girls. Michael is getting well enough now to get about again. Gertrude told me and Princesses do you know what?"

"What is it?"

"Can't you guess?"

"Some one bringing good news?"

"No. Fenrod has also unknown to us has been shadowing a with Radcliffe with him. He is afraid to leave us out of his sight for fear something will happen to us. But I'm afraid he is doing a very foolish thing Violet."

"I believe so too. I'm afraid that in entering the camp Fenrod is like a ship heading for the breakers during a storm."

"But he knows how to take care of himself as he is just as good as a ship coming into the harbor. Princesses I believe through him God has sent us help that we need worse of all."

"God bless Fenrod and keep him safe," Violet said.

"Amen," murmured her sisters and Jennie, "and girls too" the latter continued "Fenrod wants to accompany you and all the rest of your quest."

"But why Jennie? Why did he not stay with the Christian lines as where it is safer. The Abbie's officers of our armies as I happen to know are his guardians, he could not get better care anywhere else."

"Yes Princesses he says so himself himself. But you see, he says General Vivian believes you'll need the aid, and also the good general sent the boy himself. He thinks if the aid accompanies you on your mission, he can watch every place you go into and give you aid in case of necessity. But you must relate Princesses that you will need his secret assistance. Everyone thinks if he secretly betrays you and your sisters, and all your followers and keeps you all out of unnecessary danger everything will be all right, for Radcliffe declares that the generals are all worried about you and your sisters. He's very experienced you know and I guess he deserves your company more than any body else....."

"Ah we did not think of that."

After consulting with Gertrude Angelina and assuring themselves that the young deserter was really out of the camp, Gertrude decided to detail a number of her followers to trail him, and if capturing him bring him under arrest to the Christian lines, while a secret messenger was to go off on the fastest horse to the Christian lines and warn all generals that the aid had deserted. Michael Michael himself a day later was brought back to his camp. On his arrival he found out from his lieutenant that he had sent half the number of the boys after the deserter Ned. There was no further talk of listening in on the generals at the same spot. It was the very reason of this unlooked for misfortune that Fenrod again came to the rescue. There also was again with him the boy called the "RATTLEBARK"..... who had accompanied him into the Glandelinian camp. He sent a number of messengers with written accounts of Ned's desertion to various generals within the Christian lines, who would at once take the matter up with an energy which would bring about the deserter's capture into this, no matter where he may be hiding himself. Fenrod knew that well trained members of the general would be sent to look for him inside both the opposing camps, and far and near at side, while Fenrod and Radcliffe themselves came upon Ned one time followers and in language that was very much to the point told them what they thought of them for not knowing the eagle eye on Ned and the boys boys and girls who were said to have deserted with him.

The first few days proved to be the most anxious in the history of the boy and girls of Abbie's cause and it was made certain by the regulations of the Vivian girls concerning the first successes of these scouts. All the little ones from nine years and upwards, even the tiny toddlers of six and seven whose mental development was above the average were to be suffered to do what they too could do on the scout work. Previously to this adventure only those who were fully thirteen were allowed to accompany Violet, and her sisters on their more desperate undertakings. There were many of this age still held from such adventures, and once looking over the child scouts record, Violet, and her sisters found there were to be six hundred children to be prepared.

Fortunately there was a large tent in the center of the camp, and the other on the following morning repaired this army of child scouts. The leading boy and girl scouts ushered them up, and when the Vivian girls arrived on the scene they found themselves facing an array of boys and girls scouts varying in age from six to fifteen years. After a Litany Prayer to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, Violet motioned them and down on the ground at the children's feet. It was a sight beautiful to behold. All were interested, and in earnest for the adventure, especially the older children, from ten to fourteen.

Violet and her sisters were to learn during this hour of council that these little girl and boy scouts were quicker to take in the simple instructions than boy and girl scouts of thirteen. During other times when within the main Christian line as they continually received their religious instructions.

As their white robes of baptism were less spotted, and the world, and the flesh and the devil could not get their unhallowed hands upon their tender souls, and as they took in the great truths of the faith and of the Catholic Church with an ease and simplicity not to be expected naturally from minds so immature they did not fear to go through any adventures. During all of these past days before coming coming within the Glandelinian camps with Violet and her sisters the attention of the slumbering children in everything was perfect. Once in a while it had been necessary for the instructor to say a word of warning to an overgrown boy scout, or a silly self-conscious girl, but the little scouts were perfect. This column of six hundred was so quiet that one inside the tent would find it difficult to imagine that it was filled. To day it was an inspiring scene for a child scout class.

All were in dead earnest for the sake of Abbie's holy cause. The older scouts had since they entered the army had run through a thrilling adventure and contracted the taste for rather the want of it --- which came of loving a Holy Cause, the latter had been led to conceive a stirring opinion of the charms of Abbie's holy cause in the dreadful conflict and spent much of their time in wondering wondering what the different generals thought of them at one of these daring child scouts had been caught or shot yet. and they were as good candidates for Holy Communion and love of God as they were for Abbie's cause. Thanks to the Holiness of Abbie's cause, and the Pope, and the blessed Sacrament their day is done.

Of all these girl and boy scouts however there was one who stood out most.

proximately as leader and that was Angeline Angolinis Arouburg, she lost a word which Violet uttered, who seemed to get the idea immediately. Any difficult question asked would find her small else were puzzled ready to answer. There is no branch taught, and child scouts of all, and of all the Child scout military schools of both sides which serves better while training them to serve the cause to also develop the intelligent, and except in the enemy lines the Christian doctrine. One may suppose it to be properly taught, teach flag and other signals, and all that boy and girl scouts should know, and yet fail to grasp the mental grasp of many such students.

The same may be said of the teaching of success. Full sobbing adventures. The former branch does not in a way appeal to a large percentage of otherwise bright child scout students, the latter owing to its pious and irksome achievements may at first fail to engage the interest of many a girl and boy scout. But with the help of the Grand Old Catholic Faith and Christian Doctrine properly taught while a thing of intense absorbing interest appeals both to reason and imagination and gives them the courage to go on with their scouting work.

Logic, po poetry, exactness also comes in for their share, and any private or military teacher who knows how to be interesting will discover very early in his or her vocation that he, or she cannot judge the intellectual gifts of his, or her pupils, in hearing them and answering questions during the time devoted to the study of this most important branch. Other things being equal the Abbess's child scout studies also Christian doctrine is far better equipped for the military adventures of his or her career, than the boy or girl heroine who would have been trained in a young military career alone.

A rose however is never found without its thorns. At the beginning of the plan to bring boy and girl scouts within the Glandelinian camp, Violet, and her sisters were occupied in relieving visits from puzzled or more or less indignant girl scout or boy scout leaders of other Commands.

"My little girl scout is too young to go on such an expedition," one would explain. "She is only six, and I enlisted as a scout when I was ten."

"Oh so you have? Have you been going on scouting expeditions every day this year?"

"Oh yes."

"And is it possible that you have not heard that we and all our followers went through hundreds of dangerous stunts, and spying expeditions with evident success, and also we don't drag any one with us unless they willingly come? And that we do not ask any one to go to places and expeditions unless we would be afraid to do, and have you not heard our father say anything about the new legislation made by the government as to the age of children going into the army as any how the enemy would massacre them if out?"

"I-----I-----I-----don't think so."

"Then read this please," and Violet, would hand the inquirer a printed document on the subject, and when you read it carefully, and understand what it is all about one back and we'll take it over most intelligently! Good morning he sure to come back....."

However that boy scout failed to appear and "He" stands for that class of boy scout soldier kids who enter the service only for a light sojourn. But there were some who had more serious difficulties, and among those were Gertrude Angolin el Jennie Turner, and Angeline Riches. The child spies had not been in the foe camp quite eight days, when Angeline Arouburg called again on the Vivian girl. Since she first entered the army up to now she had grown into a tall slim girl and was probably within half a year of twelve. Her oval face was a trifle thinner, but lighted with these contrasting features, innocence, bravery, shrewdness and intelligence.

"Violet, tell your sisters that I'm really sorry to trouble them, because besides also you but for our safety as well as yours, Angeline Riches and Jennie Turner have asked me so often to come to you everytime there is a difficulty that I really must."

"About what Gertrude.....?"

"About us girls for making plans to capture those officers or men known by knowing the secret about the originators of the flood. You see there are four of us girl scout leaders in this effort, myself, Jennie Turner, Angeline Riches, and Mildred Maxwell, and she is the only youngest leader. That means we have to do the main part of the work, and also means one is a retainer for each of us. Then there's to be the four of us dressed differently each day. We have already used four different pairs of shoes, six new uniforms, fifteen note books, and rounds of ammunition for our pistols too. Penrod says he is going to fit us out, and Radcliffe is going to assist Riches but he says two of our Princesses, are elected to accompany Mildred or all of us will remain a year in the foe camp and then probably accomplish nothing."

"I'll take care of the situation, and so will my sisters," said Violet. "At least she added 'I'm sure all of my scouts will be glad to do it.'"

"Thank you Violet." I and my followers are so ashamed of the slowness of our efforts to succeed, but since Penrod and Radcliffe came all of us have been working harder most of the time, and there's scarcely any success yet we are still more under suspicion you know how dangerous this work is, and Penrod says this adventure is like hunting tigers in the dark without weapons. He does not see any success for us until heaven reveals it itself. He said we ought to offer two new Recaries a day, five titanes, and a Novena of Rosaries for success. He now about Mildred Maxwell! She wants to try a different plan!"

"Well we can let her wait a while at least!"

"Thank you Violet. My followers will be so glad," she paused a moment then added "But I'm afraid M I M I Mildred won't."

"Indeed."

"Oh Violet for the cause she is the most enthusiastic little girl scout leader you ever saw, both for that and holy Communion, the latter most, she is talking about this more than any of us. Every day she makes me go over what you said in our instructions, and she asks me the most of the instructional questions, and you ought to see her pray. Even in this dangerous camp, so especially at night she fixes up a sort of shrine with a picture of Christ in His Crucifixion and when all is quite quiet and no Glandelinians are around she kneels before it every night with her hands clasped praying for success, and clasped praying for success, and she stays on her knees till we bundle her into bed for fear the Glandelinians will see her."

Violet and her sisters had noticed during that day of the council, little Mildred the most daring yet fragile child scout leader of them all. Her earnest eyes followed every motion of Violet, or her sisters, and her enthusiasm was striking. Answering the prayers for success at night, her voice rang out clear, sweet, redolent of such living faith as is found in adults, and smaller children. And if the Glandelinians did hear her they did not pay any attention.

"By no all means Gertrude we must first see Mildred about this before taking any action. Go get her Gertrude."

"Gertrude left, and half an hour later presently returned with the youngest girl scout leader."

"Good afternoon Mildred."

"Good afternoon Princess Violet."

"I hear you are making unusual plans for our success, and offered your Holy Communion for that intention?"

"Yes Princess."

"How did you expect to succeed?"

"By the help of God."

"How old are you Mildred?"

"Nine."

"Nine! That's rather young, and yet you are as good as the rest of us when you nine!"

"On the 28th of January."

Mildred was standing before Violet, and her sisters, shoulders squared, her head erect and her hands clasped behind her back. She though no relation whatever, bore a remarkable resemblance to Angeline Riches, as Violet and her sisters had first seen her, only Mildred's oval face was paler, her body stouter and her hair decidedly less golden.

"You are certainly great even though you're nine only a few months Mildred. But I and my sisters are getting discouraged, because we have not accomplished anything worth while and therefore we have decided to return to the Christians as soon as possible. We ourselves have been compelled to miss our Holy Communion because we are in the foe camp, and we miss our blessed Lord exceedingly."

Mildred's face changed, the smile suddenly left it and grave inquiry took its place. She looked at Violet and her sisters for some moments, a quiver came over her countenance, and then big silent tears began coursing down her pale cheeks.

"Don't don't cry sweetheart, the situation is not so bad at as all that."

But Mildred did nothing else but cry, and as she burst into sobs she caught Violet by the hand with both others and held on as though she were drowning. In deed as far Violet she felt like a pick pocket caught in the act.

"Say Mildred Violet presently said 'Are you really crying because you really miss your Holy Communion even in this dangerous Glandelinian camp?'"

"-----yes."

"Do you really wish to take the chances of great peril by having a disguised priest administer Holy Communion to you in this Glandelinian camp so far away from the Christian lines?"

"I do. I do. Oh yes I do. O-----o-----oh."

"I know what peril it is but I would take any kind of chances for Jesus Christ who died on the Cross for us all."

There was the sound of galloping hoofs; the jumping of some one to the ground, then the orderly came in and announced that an important personage wished to see Violet and her sisters.

"Yes I believe I and my sisters do. I remember you very well Miss Jennings which was absolutely true. Angelina a Jenn Jones bore the reputation not altogether unusual of running with a net of boy and girl scouts which in the matter of so speaking kept her agents and avocountants, and oth er parties not only off a respectable distance but out of sight altogether. They would lay in ambush for Glendalrhins and shoot them all down without giving quarter, or warn big. In other words she was to the terror of the Glendalrhins the most dangerous girl spy of all also, and successfully helped everyone where they needed information from the enemy. she never had been captured yet.

"That is precisely the situation Miss Jennings."

"Was it your angel that whispered you the suggestion, or the angels of oh 1 children murdered by the enemy or of that little girl over there?" and Violet pointed to Mildred upon whose face still lingered two belated tears.

"The fact in 'Violet' answered" she is. "and when I suggested that we have to I miss Holy Communion, or give up the adventure, Mildred at once became a Niobe, all tears. When you list a man on and your willingness to aid us all "Gladly Princess. Who knows but she is too or will too turnout to be as good as the rest of us."

There were, Violet, and her sisters felt afterwards, angels in the camp, who entertained them unwares, and had not a little to do with their success. Guided by the attentive Angelina Aronburg who took in every word of this

"Angelina Jennings took more than the extended hand, she caught the young child up in her arms, and embraced her. Then while the older scouts soon a little flushed and her eyes blinking out the child down again, she turned

"Here Violet" by sliding her envelope. "It's a message of warning. Read it carefully, and I'm coming to see you again. Pray for me and for your subjects."

"Princess Violet, our little girl scout, fared Maxwell is 1 fear more badly injured than any of us expected."

"Well the fact is, since the phone is disconnected, Mildred insisted on my coming to see you personally before nine o'clock this morning. She does not care a rap of her Very well then," said Violet, looking about cautiously. "If it is necessary to have one, we'll ask our blessed Lord to enable us to have a miracle, and beg the intercession of both His Blessed Mother, and the Little Flower of Jesus to O."

"You sure."

"Just as you say Princesses," said Jennie Turner, with her drybliss smile. "But one thing is certain not one of us are going to get out of this camp alive if we are not careful. It is extremely dangerous as it is. We are among the most dangerous of all blundermenings you know and they are the Mangaboos, and also Mungoobos."

"Five hundred hours per peril, with the usual discount to Glandelinia."

"You have a good opinion of Glandelinia have you not?"
 "I certainly have, since my sister was killed," answered Jennie Turner. "I'm sorry Violet, that I cannot speak that much of Glandelinia, but we people here don't use that kind of language."

And saluting and withdrew.

Having passed through conversation among land and in soldiers, officers and boys found that the forest fires of southern California had gone wild, and spread to the southwestern section of the Mid-Hollister woods, and that a single explosion had devastated many more towns and cities, and also that the Abraham Lincoln was

Now being suspected only to be results of volcanic activity, Violet charged her boy scout, Michael, to call up Gertrude Angelina, and Angelina Rhoads, and let them know that, whatever was being dreadfully devastated, Mildred of course a per, all was getting better, and that was some comfort, and her Holy Communion was forth coming. Michael got Gertrude on the phone by a new line easy enough but when he tried to

"I was not mentioning any feet you bonehead. I want 1918 Company M STREET."

"Company M Street? No, sir this is not. You are calling up general Manley's

Headquarters and this is he on the phone. What do you want? "I want to speak to the Child Scouts headquarters. The operator got me the wrong number."

Well that's all right, sir. What's the number and I'll get it for you."

Let you know. I'm general JOHN HUNLEY and I want that number 1-800-645-1111. I'll connected with the girl scouts headquarters and do it quick or by golly I'll - " Monday got the number and Michael was able to converse to and with Angelina Riches to his heart content. Thanks to Mary Iv.

"appear like?"

"The greatest disaster ever heard of yet."

"What did it appear to be like?"

"An e-arthquake at first."

"Then was it an earthquake?"

"I don't know for sure."

"May you have the cause of hearing more about the disaster?"

"For twelve hours from then, unless every one is very sure about it."

"Are you very sure you don't believe it?"

"I don't know, I can say I don't believe it, and I can't say I don't. It is only what I don't know, I can say I don't know."

"I want to be positively sure before I spread such news around. I think the bad you know and may get us all into trouble, among our own crew, and the costined."

[illegible][illegible]

"We will see that it certainly is" put in Gertrude Angelina. "And Violet if you have no objection, Angelina, Lohse, and Jennings, myself, and the two boys will be here to see that nothing is frustrated."

[illegible]

"Well Mildred," said Violet in answer to her call.
"Princesses may I tell you but that now. I've heard the ~~angel~~ ^{angel} speak of it it so often that I know now it is really true."
"Well Mildred if you like, but it is best to make your thanksgiving first."
A wave of beauty swept over her face as she answered: "I ~~do~~ ^{do} offer my Thanksgiving and I am going to pray for you, and for your sisters." and left.

[illegible][illegible]

Yes, but the time these were going on, the Government had overlooked the forest fires which had been sweeping Southern and Central California for so long. Well, you know this has been an unusually dry season, and added by others this immense fire had spread destruction for months without abatement, and recently struck a mine of explosives or something, but all communication is cut off and is little known. As a result no one can get any communication with Angelina Azachland at the

"Yes, Father. But I've got a to make a different plan. Gertrude Angelina is my adviser. I know every one is praying for our success and actually I can feel it affecting me."

"Well, Princess Violet, any time you, and your sisters want a companion in your work, I will be present daily on "Well, I guess I said it many times you, and your sisters want a companion in your work." So every morning she visited Gills strove harder than ever to obtain the information they were after, while secretly the disguised priest brought the Sacred Host into the house, and every morning either Carlotta, Angelina, or Jennie Turner was eager to see him. "I don't know," she said, "but I think he's got some news about the new disaster. Even she was touched into something finer for the present or the presence of the wounded child. On the sixth day from the news heard everywhere, her two sisters could not but observe that Wilfred was growing good in her efforts to obtain aid at the same time as she was giving her Holy Communion, & the priest heard her Confession at the end of which he asked:

"What do you know of the war, Wilfred?"

"The bad news can be gotten as the fires cut off all communications," she then answered.

"Not so good here!" she answered putting her hand over her heart. "I feel almost lik

"Do you want the disasters to be investigated, so the sorrow of the nation will go away?"

"And Mildred my dear if our Blessed Lord wants our Country to win this war despite all the havoc are you willing to sacrifice everything, even your life for Galvornias redemption from such an enemy? Are you willing to go through or make any sacrifice to see Glendellina brought to her reason?"

"Yes Princess violet."

There was a short pause. Mildred's lips were moving feebly, and then she said in a voice grown a little stronger;
"I have told him."

"I have told him."

The child looked up at the Vivian Girls as she said these words, and smiled. After her communion, while Violet, and her sisters and the others, knelt about her, they

Q. Did you see her faithful communion as they left the tent, I think there is more about the new season, then will ever learn until within the Pass camp. Mildred must know this herself, for just now as we were going she took my hand and said "be careful, Violet and also caution your sisters, not to appear too interested or excited about the news of the disaster, now anything unusual takes place here, it will turn out to be the cause of the disaster."

"All right, Violet, oh how I wish we could obtain that information, now, as I'm sick of this damned wicked glandellian camp."

elated, and as she turned she was not at all surprised to discover Jennie Turner. He had, as Violet and her sisters surmised, ran all the way from her own tent in that light graceful manner, she had observed in her, and also in Angeline Riches so many a time before.

"Princess" she said. "There is something wrong, concerning the meager reports of the news disaster. Mildred received a telegram a mysterious kind and she said it reads that it looks as if Calvarina has taken her turn. The State is like one in The news disaster. Alford received a telegram a mysterious kind and she said it reads that it looks as if California has taken a hard turn. very important from some Angelinian officers in conversation near her tent. The disaster is something awful. One quarter of Angelinia Agathia is wiped out, and "Crotch" Gale is obliterated, and Jessica is annihilated. The floods are terrible down there."

Had Violet and her sisters heard that call, and why had their steps become slower and slower? Why had they even paused and waited? Why had they listened for those foot-falls, and caught them out of all the military noises of a great "Mandelstamian camp,"

They with a feeling of anxiety and misgiving, and even apprehension, and with loudly beating hearts huddled back. Mildred was gasping and breathing laboriously, as she as she excitedly related how she overheard the officers talking of the disaster being as she excitedly related how she overheard the officers tell of the disaster being the greatest on record, and still continuing, that the telegram showed that Angelina Agathin and Dorothy Gale were lost cities, that from all the disasters, the war was

"As good as won by the foe."

"wildred," she cried three times, with pauses between. "Is this all true? Are you not dreaming. Did you really hear and read all this?"

"Good heavens gasped Violet. "A hundred thousand dead in Angelinia Agathia. The city wiped out. Millions between before the forest fire. Why I can't even believe the

A black and white photograph showing a large crowd of people gathered on a street. In the foreground, a sign is visible that reads "GROVER BEAN". The crowd is dense, and the scene appears to be a public gathering or protest. The photograph is oriented horizontally but is placed vertically in the document.

"The officers not knowing I overheard them continued this. They seemed to get the secret anyway. They say the forest fire is responsible for the explosions that raged Abbeism and made this biggest floods of all in the war. and the flood has extended into the State of Angolonia this time, while parts of Abbeism are still under water."

Filled with dire distress, over the facts of such a disaster Violet and her sisters wept for a while to their hearts content, then recovering herself, Violet, set her sister Lebbie on guard outside the tent, and then said to the rest who were assembled about midnight bed.

"Let us all say prayers for the hundreds of thousands, of departing souls of our disaster and war torn country and world, and she first began the Litany for the dying, which she and her sisters know by heart. For fear of the Glandelinians however they said it quietly in a murmur and stood up instead instead of kneeling. With every invocation they became more impressed, and at the end of the Litany they paused to meditate, and then Violet went on reciting the prayer which follows the Litany]

LET US PRAY.

"Depart of ye armies of Christian souls, out of this sinful war torn world and then you stand before the great and glorious throne of God, receive your reward, and enter into the Kingdom of God, and being to a speedy and those awful visitations in the name of God, the Father Almighty, who created us all, in the name of Jesus Christ, who suffered and died for thee, in the name of the Holy Ghost, who sanctified thee, in the name of the Angels, Archangels, Thrones, Dominions, Cherubims, and Seraphim, in the name of the Patriarchs and Prophets, of the Holy Apostles, and Evangelists, of the Holy Martyrs and Confessors, of the Holy Monks and Virgins, and of all the Saints of God, thy servants come to us all, and to our Countrymen soon as possible, or while they abide in Holy Zion, through Christ Our Lord Amen."

And there in that lone and gloomy tent, in a strange hostile camp, with Violet and her sisters, and the rest weeping silently, any one with them could have been filled with the scene of intervisible presences. There was no safety in this camp for them, but of great danger, and yet they took these awful chances. The horror of apparent doom, that hung about the Calvinian country, and her people. Sister States, seemed to Violet and her sisters to reach all over the world, and of it, they and nations loving our Blessed Lord were all partakers, and several invitations unknown to the Vivian Iris were offered by Christian Nations to Abbeism to let them join in intervention and help her crush Glandelinia.

And also hundreds of thousands, nay hundred millions of little children, whom Catholic Priests had baptized, whom they in the name of the Church had adorned saying, "Receive this white garment, which mayest thou carry without stain before the Judgment seat of God, that thou mayest have life everlasting, which the Church had further adorned saying, 'Receive this burning light and keep thy Baptism so as to be without blame, observe the Commandments of God, so that when Our Lord shall come to His Nuptials, thou mayest meet Him together with all the Saints in the Heavenly Court, and mayest have eternal life, and live forever and ever' these little children haying at the bidding of the Church preserved their white garments unstained, and kept their baptism without blame, had by flood and fire and explosion horror departed out of that terrible world, and into their abode in Holy Zion, which if really happening they would have testified against the Glandelinians, before the Tribunal of God. If this story were true, these, also probably among victims of massacre, disasters and dying child slaves would be Chosen Bands to Heaven, so like the Holy Innocents, first flowers of Christ's Coming, yet so different, who would be terrible witnesses against all things recorded against the Glandelinians recorded already in these many volumes so far. The child slaves would have been many of the first, the numbers of the others have grown into the many millions millions scores of millions even. These poor little bands who either in reality, or in this story, followed the Lamb whither soever he goeth would have been made up of our children, and might have died, and after death, been changed into other Christs, by early Communion, and brought by these disasters early to Heaven, to be the Holy War Innocents of the Holy Eucharist, and bring such a downfall of a wicked nation like Glandelinia, that Babylon, Rome or other wicked countries never experienced, and in a way that would flatter against the wild and astonishing all historians, and writers, and all college professors including, the author....

INTRODUCING A BOY SCOUT, AND SHOWING HOW IT SEEMED TO THE ENEMY HE LED A DOUBLE LIFE.....

The strange boy scout called Red cliffs, who had followed Penrod and others into the glendinning camp to also aid Violet, and her sister. In their unusual quest, seemed to be the enemy of the boys. He knew him, so led a new or dubious life. Many rebel of the boys seemed suspicious, and even afraid of him, and when some saw him looking at them they walked away, or mumbled, and mounting their horses rode off. It took Violet and her sister some time to find it out but they did. They were not alone. One morning, and a part of the day, when the boys started making a game of the boys, and Red cliffs away, not slowly but quickly. Like all the other well known boyscouts in the Christian lines, he was also always successful in his missions. He still retained his darkly Aborigine complexioned face, and a high forehead. He had a womanly eye, and dignity, which often led Violet and her sister to think that he would in time qualify, as an exceptional dangerous undertaker. -- For the enemy who he did not keep out of his way. As long as Violet and her sister were in the camp, he was not in a him to note. Under his strangely golden hair which was bobbed long, like that of a girl, he also wore an expression for which apparent vanity in word and deed, was adequate, and make them think fanciful. He was a good looking boy, and could do things with ease, successfully with any boyscout, like any in a boxing match and outdo them in sports.

As we all know he began his service in the army, at the time the story records it, some time before the battle of Imiti. In Fort Totten, but he never was mentioned until sometime after the battle of Badling's junction. He always served independently with a company of well selected boy and girl scouts, and lost a very dear girl friend of his at that time, who was killed while on duty, which from his love of her he still will not forgive. One of his confidants later said he had no sisters, older than her and one younger, one of which was claimed to have been murdered by the enemy and the secretly sought for by the army of which she could not locate as they had no information of her whereabouts. It was said as to look any one.

He was a very brave man, the fiercest of the enemy being afraid of him as if he were a demon. He had killed the Vixen Girl, after they became acquainted with his life, chose him especially, because Porpor, being his constant companion and doctor, would give him help, because he strived to be a good man, and was not content with being a scout, he helped them in their expeditions, and army work, they intended giving him a chance to pursue his studies for improvement as a scout, once upon a time, when they heard, was that Radcliffe constantly thought of them, and was like a terrorizing ghost to him. He was the boy whom I have at times.

Also the fact that Jannie mentioned she had seen Radcliffe in Mummys camp, of the lady mysteriously shadowing and frightening her seemed strange to Violet, and her sisters started they were always watching her secretly. Violet, and her sisters in their claver and cunning way tried to discover in every possible manner, because of any of Quaker, and of what he really was, from day to day they had piled him with the banners Jennie

Q Did he camp there also, didn't even questions as to whether any of his men were A Yes, he would in his desire
 Q Radcliffe, how would you like to be Gertrude's brother?
 A Radcliffe raised his eyes from a map he was studying and made answer:
 Q "Gertrude raised his eyes" but Gertrude do you mean?
 A Gertrude Angelina.
 Q "Gertrude Angelina? Who is she. I never heard of her. Is she in this camp?"
 A "You do not understand. I mean Angelina Arronburg."
 Q "I couldn't see a subject."
 A "Yes, how would you like to be a Mandeliniun who is responsible for these awful disasters?"

disasters!"

"No Princess, I don't care to."

"My note!"

"Because it'd be guilty of all the horror that's going on now."

"Well Audcliffe how would you like to be one of us!"

"The boy scout looked at her in surprise."

"Wiolet, don't think I'd care to."

"My note!"

"It's wrong to be wishing for your position ain't it. Couldn't you accuse me of being full of envy or jealousy?"

"Audcliffe said would you rather be--- a girl or boyscout of the enemy, or one of those responsible for the Abbeclann flood?"

"Wiolet I believe I would rather be what I am."

"Violent, I don't think I'd like to lose my soul. Those disaster makers killed whole nations of people. I therefore don't like the idea of facing our 'passsed lord and have my guardian angel say, 'Master, this wicked one killed all the saintly galverinians.' And I don't think I like to keep good people even in war."

"You'd rather make big forest fires than?"
 "Violet, I wouldn't like that either. Violet, I don't think I'd like to be responsible for anything the glandolinians do, but why the questions?"
 "Just to pass the time away," smiled violet.
 "Just to pass the time away," smiled violet.

him not made life bad won him nickname in an esp excellent manner.

"Radcliffe" Jennie said one day, "You don't happen to have any information as to what's happening at Angelina Agathia do you?"

"No Princeps."

"You never did?"

"No Princesses."

"No I did not Princeps Jernie. I would not even take a look at such filthy stuff without necessity. All they got printed is "Christian Dogs".

"You never did read their paper!"

"Teo Frincoese and I told you the many words used only in Christian dogs. But I think I know a place where they are sold. Do you want to buy one?"

"I might Radcliffe, but also I'm going to send you on a mission to the general. General Munloy is going to give you a lot of money. I'll be there from there. And I thought if you had chance to buy a newspaper you might also have the chance to over hear and bring to me the information I and my sisters are after."

"Frincoese" said Radcliffe. "I think I can even secure general Munloy's uniform if

"Oh very well. We'll see about that when I've written the letter. I also want you to take Gertrude Angeline. But anyhow I think you better leave him the uniform to by compliments. It wouldn't fit me I'm sure."

"Princess, how far did you say it was?"

"Princess, I think I can easily go anywhere you want me, and come back with all the information you desire. If they won't give it to me I'll,---and he flashed his dangerously looking dagger.

"If the enemy boy scouts surprise you by the wayside, or want to know too much, and if they are too many for you to manage alone, signal to some of your followers and I'll send you aid."

"Oh yes Violet, I would," and Radcliffe for the first time in their presence to their friends showed a full and entire smile. Then another he left.

their surprise showed full and entire while. Then saluting he left.

For many weeks after first knowing him, Violet and her sisters had seen sent him on stirring adventures, that were perfectly ridiculous and made him take conspicuous passages, only to cure in surprise upon a boat, that he had been sent to the coast of California, and that he had returned from a glacial region, after his return as with a pocket full. A simple invitation to an expedition had effected what Violet and her sisters thought to be the impossible. To try him he asked him to secure something general money had in his hands the boy came back with the hands the full uniform, and having and was important child dispatches.

best pistols, his spectacles, and two important cipher dispatches. And Manley did not even know where these three things had disappeared to, or who took them, and none of his guards or fellow officers had seen any one enter his tent. During how his first few days in this Gdanskian camp with them, they had caught Radcliffe three different times in the act of "robbing" a Gdanskian officer of some main place in the camp, and he was again to it, and the officer only said word "staring struck" with such suddenness, that all was over. Staring could flash that terrible knife in an instant, and lost the officer writhing either seriously or mortally wounded on the floor when a more higher Gdanskian officer would observe him at something, the lad always checked himself, more than in expression of fear, and the Gdanskian officer was afraid to say a word or make a move, for fear the lad would suddenly be at him with that dangerous looking knife in his hand, which he could use quicker than a pistol, though he was handy enough at any weapon. Violet and her sisters therefore took great interest in Radcliffe. The day following Radcliffe was on his way to Gertrude Angeline with this letter, and with a note that resembled a check for five hundred dollars, and a little suspicious, thinking something unusual about the boys appearance, and thinking from his look the lad could speak only english, and who was able to speak it himself he demanded.

But life could not understand, though he knew the language from the sound, and said loudly in his own language to himself:

"Funny thing this. An Englishman, a Lobsterback, a greenhorn in our armies." Thinking for real he was an englishman, Radcliffe made as if to pass on, but the soldier signalled him; and then said in his own language;
"I'm no greenhorn, Lobsterback, or an Englishman. What have you got there bby SCOTT."

"A girlscout gave it to me for a golden haired girlscout down in company & I believe one of the Virlian Girls dropped it."

"One of the Vivian Girls dropped it! Who is she?"
 "She's a girl of course."
 "Yes I know but what name?"

"Yes I know but what make?"

"It's none of your business, you Inquisitive Complex," cried Macdcliffe. You call me a dumbbell and still try to run you through," and he suddenly flashed his knife.

"Now, now Don't do that. I didn't mean to call you that. Put away your knife boy."
"I won't nuld Radcliffe."
"I didn't mean to call you that. Put away your knife boy."

"Well let me see that paper. I won't keep it."
The soldier looked at it.
"That is it," he demanded.

"That is it?" he demanded.

"Why you gimletton, can't you read it's a check," said Radcliffe.

The man gave it back to the boy and went on rumpling something to himself.

In a few minutes another man stopped him and said:
"What have you got there boy."

"It's a piece of paper,"
The soldier looked at it.
"What's that?"
"Did you think it was a piece of wood, you feeble-minded yoron. Can't you read? My boy it is a check for five dollars in our money on the Grutze Bank."
"That bank. Of a river?"
"No a bank, a house where they keep lots of money."
"Oh is that what it is?"
"Can't you say anything else but 'Oh is that what it is?' you spindle legged polt parrot. Yes and what would you want to be carrying a check, when some christian dog will be stealing the money. Do you expect to go to a bank you spindle legged cat in this camp to have it cashed? And what would that golden haired girl want with the five dollars?"
"I am no spindle legged polt parrot, or a cat," said Radcliffe. And my captain or the sender never told me what it was."
"Oh good night, Goodness Gracious. Are they any idiots in your company besides yourself. The trouble with you sony, is that you never try for anything unless you are told about it. You are I believe a stupid boy scout. When Gerald starting was here, he used to think of things out for himself, and that is the reason General John Manley thought so much of him and got him a fine position in the army as the highest head of the whole unless boy and girl scouts. If you keep on the way you are doing, general Manley will and by sending you as a dummy to the Christian Dogs."
"That girls scout camp is pretty far away, isn't it, and a half or so. You'll be surprised when you bring her the check, and see her face..."
"It's in camp or Division Division number 2, and see her face..."
"One after the other, footsore and spent, dragged themselves by heavily, twenty officers the check and told of his repeated conversation with so many soldiers and officers she was surprised not only at the look on her face, but also with some of the comments she made on the way. Going the two soldiers, and the twenty officers, as for the latter, those distinguished Glendallian officers and two soldiers, kept sedulously out of Gertrude's way for the enmeshing of six days. In the end she was laying for them, and the officers and soldiers, looking for a check, and she was laying for them. It was in this third week of their being in the Glendallian camp already when Violet and her sisters noticed a change, slight it is true, but striking in Radcliffe's humor. On entering her tent the next morning, Radcliffe appeared on horseback dismounted, and saluting said:
"Good morning Violet, I have some news for you."
Up to this time Radcliffe, unless spoken to had never spoken. All he did say when passing them, or they were passing him was Good afternoon, or Good morning, Princesses good evening or goodnight. But this particular morning, Radcliffe visited Violet with a surprise. After dismounting from his horse, he bowed made his customary speech, and then said the words "I have some news for you." Violet, who was standing by her horse, here, for the first time, and staring instantly drew his pistol. A boy scout strange to them suddenly beat it down the road.
"Who was he?" demanded Violet. "Never saw him before till now, but I came with news." "Don't know," said Violet. "I heard about the situation at Angelina Agathia." "I hear suspicious were aroused."
"I did hear news early yesterday morning, that was not good thank you. And now my boy will you be good enough to tell me what it is, and who gave you the news?"
"Yes Violet, Violet, and your sisters too. First I'll tell you the news giver. Princess it was Jennie Turner."
"Indeed," and Angelina Bitches were looking for the same information, and Gertrude came in to see them, and Jan gave me pointers. I went to get the newspapers, but they were all sold out. I was too late."
"Did she tell you to express the hope that Angelina Agathia is safe?"
"No Princess, she told me she's been too telling me that all of Northern Angelina is devastated by an enormous flood, and forest fire together, that the big Abbeism flood still raging is spreading immensely. I tried several times to find out the real details but I just couldn't. I tried one booth after another but all places had sold the last newspaper... I don't think Violet I got the news quite, but I hope to do much better this noon, or this evening, when I can get a paper. One place at which I asked the newsboy said he'd hold a paper for me."
"Well Radcliffe, I'll tell you what, you needn't ask me how much I heard of the news of these three disasters, because I and my sisters generally listen in for every information possible. But we are just now more interested in what Glendallian authority is causing all this ravaging disaster. But if you ever see me or my sisters coming in with flashing eyes, black frown upon our brows, and our fists doubled, there'll be no need to ask the question, for that's a sign I've received bad news."
"There was a pause. Radcliffe looked completely lost."
"Well Radcliffe, why don't you say something?"
"Princesses, you you ever get discouraged, when things go wrong like this?"
"Do you or your sisters, ever lose your temper, when everything goes on like this?"
"No we practice meekness. It won't do to get mad."
"Do you and your sisters ever have foul fits or anger in your eyes?"
"Get wait and see. Anything else?"
"And Princess Violet, and also your sisters, is Glendallian stringing Abbeism, and crucifixes, or beloved Galverina as I hear?"
"I really don't know Radcliffe."
"If she is I'll fix her," said Radcliffe, seriously.
Then he bowed, saluted, mounted his horse and waving a farewell wave off, it was on this very particular day just after Radcliffe had started off that Jennie Turner called Gertrude Angelina on the camp telephone. It was started as "Please give me Gertrude 1876."
"Give me 1876."
"Yes, hurry."
"Is that you Gertrude?"
"Yes, it is. He's calling."
"This is Jennie, Turner. Boy Gertrude come one in your camp has forged my name to a letter of mysterious origin. I don't make it out."

"What. Are you sure?"
"It looks mighty sure. The letter had reads, 'Tent ten, Company L' and the envelope is a military one too, the kind so far we are not allowed to even use. I am mighty suspicious. Could you find out who did it, and for what reason, and where the envelope came from? I'll say to my reckoning, it'll put me and all of us into a terrifying embarrassing situation and position not to say intensely dangerous if we do not cover it up. I'll send or take you the letter at once."
"Very well Jennie, I'll be glad to trace the matter up, if I don't like the looks of it, I'll show it to Violet, and her sisters, and they'll get Radcliffe to investigate it, or maybe they'll do it themselves."
Twenty minutes later, a boy scout dressed in the regalia of a small Garrolyian Kurd appeared with the mysterious document. After looking about him cautiously, he handed the note to her and said:
"Read that Prince and Gertrude."
"Sure enough, the paper and envelope came from Jennie Turner's camp, and it was an identification of the paper and envelope used by the Vivian Girls. The letter ran as follows:-
"To Jennie Francis Vivian, Princesses of Camps."
Dear Jennie, I have heard that you, the Vivian Girl (Princesses, had come to the Glendallian camp this month of August, and that you are going to force some of the enemy to give you very important information concerning the design of the Abbeism flood, and the explosions.
It would give me pleasure to give you all the news you want, I have been compelled to change my tent to Company D. Send Petrol at my tent as soon as you get this letter.
Your true Friend,
Jennie Turner."
This unusual letter, with the including of the signature was as near to Jennie Turner's handwriting as possible.
"Or what do you think of it?" ejaculated the boy scout. "Yesterday afternoon a delegation of thirteen girls, accompanied by your sister Jennie were ushered into Gertrude's tent, where she and Angelina Bitches, with Angelina Jennings and others, were examining a map. They were all smiling."
"Tell Princesses," said Gertrude, smiling and saluting.
"To a 'radio' ship," said one little girl scout smiling, "I'm Mildred Glendalline."
"Oh you are. I'm glad to know you Lizzie. Well Jennie dear that's up!!!!!!"
At this question Jennie looked uneasy.
"I came about that letter Gertrude."
"A letter? What letter?"
"Oh I thought you knew Gertrude. Jennie Turner wrote to me about it. That information she said she and you were obtaining."
"Gertrude I was surprised."
"Oh that letter with you---oh you have. Let's see it."
Gertrude then looked over, and then hastily turned it over to Jennie Turner, and she read it and said, "Jennie, either some one is putting a job on us all or otherwise, if it isn't a joke, some for within this camp who happens to know us had discovered our intention, and is trying to trap us by a ruse."
"Then Princesses, all of the girl scouts ceased to smile, began to look with unwavering eyes in every direction. Are you sure you did not write it," asked asked Jennie.
"I certainly did not Princesses."
"Oh" ejaculated Jennie. "I and my sisters will have to investigate this. Notify all our followers Jennie. And have Gertrude notify my sisters."
It was difficult to see how quickly Jennie Turner, edged her way through that crowd and made for the tent door. The next thing you know after a salute, all the others disappeared for various parts of the camp. We all had a start of two hours, and I hope we'll get through this safe. But didn't Jennie's letter tell you sister tell you this?"
"No," said Violet. "She did not return yet, but evidently, some of the rogues of a mischief some of the rogues of a mischief, got hold of our paper and envelope. I am sure it was wasn't none of my boy or girl scouts, because they are incapable of a joke of this nature, especially at such time and in this place. However I'll inquire of Petrol, or Radcliffe, they may show or discover something. What I learn I'll send you and Gertrude Angelina word."
Accordingly when Radcliffe returned from delivering a message to herself asked:
"Lieutenant Radcliffe do you know if any of our boy or girl scouts who might have used our paper and envelope to write a letter?"
"To write a letter?"
"Yes."
The boy scout looked at her in blank amazement.
"No Princesses I did not."
"I have not looked yet. Did you a low scout by his request have the use of a sheet of our paper and envelope for any special or local purposes?"
"No Princess I did not."
"Radcliffe, and my sisters are puzzled. Somebody's got into our tent, and I think has used our paper for a letter. I'll examine my contents and see if they are gone."

"For heavens sake, please let me see it." and Joyce opened the sheet, for Radcliffe here it is. Do you see this letter?" and the boy grew very pale and then red. He was trembling.

"This is a very serious Princesses. It places us all in danger."
"Are you, ---are you sure?" asked Violet.
"This is no joke girls. We have been doublecrossed. I'm telling you."
"Does this place us in a very grave situation Radcliffe?"
"Does this place us in a very grave situation?"

"How, Princess?"
In answer to his question, Violet and her sisters proceeded to give Radcliffe a little talk on something mysterious, that they believed they knew who the boy was, and of how he should find the boy who wrote the letter, and force him to confess and to tell them and to save him and not betray them, or suffer the consequences.

"Well then bring him to us and we'll give him a little talk on the ethics of our private tent, and the danger in this camp of signing other peoples names."

"Princess if you please I would rather stay here, and I would rather stay here was the boy suspecting something suspicious about it occur."
"John how would you like to be a real Glandelinian boy scout?"
"I don't think I would like it very much Princess, the Glandelinians, are too wicked."

"Look here John," W Jennie said on the fourth occasion. "What's the reason you have so suddenly come to love to sticking around here for guard duty? Do we fascinate you?"

"Princess, they are waiting to ensnare us."

"Who are waiting to ensnare us?"

"The boys are waiting to ensnare us!" and many of the soldiers and the boy scouts.

"How do they know who we are, and why are they also suspecting who we are, and what our intended mission is?" "I...," all the glandelinian compounds. Then I took a famous section to the locality he was staying at, John Manley's camp division, and down that famous road for a week, and came to an end in a place where I had been told there would be a surprise party. The surprise party was a surprise party for me. It was entirely unexpected. But this happened with Radcliffe himself. Radcliffe had not been told anything about it. He was going out that day, being a little tired, and was all alone in the tent of the "Glandelinian" being in the last half hour of his self imposed vigil, and was figuring out what he was doing in the last half hour of his self imposed vigil - he never it

"You see" Radcliffe explained to Gertrude later" the man though dressed in civilian clothes looked queer to me." Back therefore to the tent's entrance, Radcliffe hurried to the boyscout to go back and secretly look into the tent, and see what the man was doing.

clothes looked queer to me." Back therefore to the tents entrance, where he and looking in saw no one in the outer tent or outer section of the tent, where he had left the man seated. At first he thought the man had either, left, or that he

The spy, or thief, or whatever he was, startled by the loud explosion noises of the signal, was still more frightened as the tent opening was suddenly thrust aside by the mysteriously looking "gurgling" explosive" destined as it were to blow him up. He had ripped an opening in the side of the tent, on hearing the signal went and he ripped it much further in a frenzy of desperation at the sight of the "Hold him" screamed padigliffe. "He's a dangerous spy..."

"There's the spy," one of them cried..
"There," cried all the soldiers, two who had seized the man. With men like these unsubduable glandelinian soldiers, and boys like Radcliffe to deal with, the life of a spy, or thief, would be full of unimagined surprises. Later the whole camp was aroused by the news of a boy scout single handed, capturing really not a spy, but a notorious

"Oh have you discovered who the party was who were going to ensnare us?"

"Oh yes, it was Gerald starring alright, and some of his companions, one by the name of Fredrick Dargur or something, and the other whose name I forgot. They know me, and interviewed them. Despite the fact that they know me, and who you are, and your intent "And how about the spy? Are they going to take it out on him?"

"Princess Violet, they did take it out on him last night, after I proved before the Court Marshall why I caused his capture. They gave him a good whipping, after tying of his face, and in a moment he was all attention. As these lieutenants returned to their work, Violet's eyes turned so as to catch the effect on Radcliffe's face of the words of one of the lieutenants. The other Glandelinian generals who noticed while as busy as ever with their secret duties, had their eyes just then on Radcliffe, and seemed by a quick interchange of glances to suspect he was at least eavesdropping. To divert their attention from him, Violet made a paper wad, and unseen by the generals, threw it at the lad.

"They who ever throw that out it out" growled Radcliffe, frowning horribly, and making a mouth, and glancing toward the generals, though evidently he really knew where it came from. Presently two officers passed close to the door speaking in whispers. Violet caught the word flood."

"What's a flood?" cried Radcliffe, talking to the officer as he too heard the word.

"Your dreaming lad. I did not call you a flood."

"Well it sounded like it. My name is Fude."

"Oh, all right. Let's not argue," and the officer walked away. Yet to avoid suspicion on the boy, Violet continued to secretly throw at him, and if looks would kill the room would have been strewn with the corpses of Glandelinian officers.

"I wish you officers would quit throwing."

"We were just throwing," said one of them.

"We were just looking at you," said another.

"Maybe you were throwing your eyes at me," retorted the lad. "What's all these paper wads doing around me then?"

At this the officers smiled.

"Radcliffe," Violet said, when she and her sisters with the boy were back in their own tent. "Radcliffe for ways that are difficult, and astonishing and for tasks that are sometimes in vain, luck for all of us is peculiar. You are an astonishment. No one could fool Glandelinians more than you. What were these Glandelinian generals talking about during the council?"

"Princesses they spoke about floods, and other disasters, but nothing about who caused them. The way they looked at me so often made me think they were onto me," and Radcliffe's face expressed an intense sense of rage and outrage.

"They did!"

"Yes, and that Manly general, that looks so much like a sissy with his glasses on between his central face bugle slipped something into his pocket, that he did not want even think of it princesses any of his other generals to see."

"Ah that sure is suspicious. And Radcliffe do you desire to know the secrets of that something?"

"What else can a fellow do. That one known as general 'gnash-in-the-head' handed to Manly a written piece of something which was examined by all the other generals about three times."

"When?"

"Just before the Council was over."

"How could they have done that without my seeing them. It is terrible that we cannot obtain the information isn't it Radcliffe?"

"Yes Princess, I know it is."

Two days later Radcliffe entered Violet's tent with a bright new uniform. When he was asked how he got it he said that a Glandelinian boy scout on his order to save himself from a row of teeth knocked out, and two black eyes, and a bloody nose, exchanged uniforms with him. Violet and her sisters had also learned that Radcliffe had been secretly shadowing general Manly for these two days with the hope of securing those secret papers him himself but he had not been at all successful. For any career of Radcliffe, outside of once cleaning general Manly's headquarters of all his furniture, this proceeding was unusual, and so Joice expressed herself.

"Yes Princesses assented Radcliffe."

"Why did you do it?"

"Do what?"

"Shadow Manly."

"Princesses Joice I am determined to secure those papers for you. And I'll do it, or get the coat and the whole man one or the other."

Gertrude Angelina it happened, was sent down that morning with a message from Jennie Turner. Upon seeing Radcliffe, extreme delight showed itself plainly upon her features. Then saluting she said, "Good morning everybody. Good morning Radcliffe. Are you Princesses and Radcliffe co-operating together in this unusual or unusual work I hear of."

"Yes," said Violet. "how are you cooperating in this unusual work?"

"Pretty good," Princesses, except I haven't yet tried the stunt I saw you do yesterday. Radcliffe, you could have tripped Manly easily. You was so near. I don't know about the result, yet I thought you tried to slip your hand into his pocket. What ever he was doing, Violet, yet nevertheless his followers and mine are making some guesses. The enemy do know about the disasters. But Radcliffe, what were you doing, I saw you try to slip your hand into Manly's pocket, and only stopped when an officer turned around a corner of the tent."

"He slipped something into his pocket and I'm going to get it."

"Are you and Radcliffe more than good friends?" asked Violet.

"Yes we are, all the girls scouts are very fond of each other."

"Radcliffe," said Violet. "Are you and Gertrude good friends?"

"Yes, Violet, we are."

Sending Radcliffe on an errand, Violet, and her sisters tried to learn what Radcliffe was really attempting to do, when he and his followers shadowed Manly. Without seeing Gertrude was not able to answer the question, though she stated she had seen him shadow Manly every time he had a chance, and not only two days.

"Radcliffe," Jennie Vivian said later that morning, when he had come back, "I had noticed several of Gertrude's girlscouts, handing you and Angelina pictures and there others some slips of paper—have those girls been successful in some exploits?"

"Exploits? My Princesses, they took everything Manly had, at least I got it for them. See that chair I brought in here a moment ago? It belonged to Manly. Here's his coat with that leather in it and a package in his pocket. Here's also his wrist watch and also a new pair of spectacles and his razor razor. I also got here, his photograph and other things. They were successful too."

"My Heavens Radcliffe what will you do next. And what did they do?"

That good little girlscout Angelina Riches secured the drawing of a recently flooded section of Glandelinia. She said as she handed it to me. "Oh what a strange map" and rolled her eyes until she looked cockeyed, and Angelina Jennings wanted to know if I would bring it to you with my own 'resources' and continued Radcliffe his voice becoming excited, "Jennie, turn I want to know whether I'm going to bring general Manly's tent over to you next."

"That is what you might do next," laughed Violet, "and what about Gertrude Radcliffe what did she do?"

"She wants to know if I realize how dangerous it is to shadow Manly, and whether I intend to abandon my purpose. Oh gee, she does not know the half of it."

"And Radcliffe have any of those girls been giving you any assistance in your work?"

"Yes Princesses they have—those Turner girlscouts."

"What did they say?"

"Those under Angelina Riches says 'Oh what a lovely inspiration you got, and yikred axwell wants to know where I'll get clues we are here for,'" continued Radcliffe, "Jennie Turner wants to know whether I won't let her go fifty fifty on it."

"And what about Paired?"

"He is helping me. He wants to know if I'll bring him general Manly's headquarters next."

"On the following day, Violet and her sisters informed Radcliffe, on coming to their tent that they would leave him in charge that afternoon at two o'clock, as they had an engagement with Gertrude Angelina and her followers."

"And Princesses, you're not coming back?"

"No Radcliffe, we are going to a different part of the camp, to try and find out something Gertrude thinks she had discovered, so you can run the tent and drill my boy or girl scouts to suit yourself."

It however happened the party they were to spy on, did not hold the expected meeting owing to a misunderstanding in regard to the number who were supposed to attend, and the day on which it was to be held, and therefore Violet and her sisters, with Gertrude and her followers had nothing for it, but to mount their horses, and go back to their own part of the camp.

"I think," Joice said as she dismounted from her horse near the junction of the company streets, "that if you'll excuse us Angelina, I'll take a look in at my tent. Jennie Turner may have brought us some messages."

The latest clock in some distant stoupe in a town near the camp, was striking the fifteenth hour of the day, since morning, as Violet and her sisters turned the corner of the Company street on which their tent is located. They had scarcely entered the outer portion when from inside the inner tent, a most unusual and astonishing sight caused them to rub their eyes. When Violet and her sisters first entered the tent they had heard the sound of violent sneezing as if from eight girls, sometimes all at once, sometimes in duets, and too trills, and occasionally in solos. On staring Violet and her sisters observed they were eight Glandelinian girl scouts, and all of them sneezing violently, and they were a look of extreme distress.

Whether sneezing or not.

Violet and her sisters recognized at once the girlscouts they wished to avoid more than any as they had also tried to undo everything they tried to accomplish, and though under their command were very unruly, and hostile. Violet and her sisters recognized at once Margaret Bethel, with her black bobbed hair, Alice Jeaton, Lily Janwarus, Lucy Angell, and June Marie her their arch enemies. The other three they could not distinguish. Reaching toward the door way of this section and noticing as they did so, a young boy scout bearing a suspicious resemblance to Radcliffe, with some unknown contrivance in his hand disappearing like a frightened kitten into another tent, Violet tried to pull back the curtain. It was fastened with ropes sewed into it with the door connections. Drawing her hunting knife, Violet slashed the ropes away and drew her pistols. Also these ropes had been fastened to the curtain and tied to the tent pole in such a way that those in side were effectually imprisoned. Yet it was the work of five minutes to unfasten the ropes.

"Girls," cried the Vivian Girls, "What are you doing in our tent, and what's the meaning of all this?"

"Captain Violet," said Jane "It was—etchoo—etchoo—it was Radcliffe—etchoo."

"It was Rad—etchoo" supplemented Emily.

"The little pink tailed—etchoo—skunk—etchoo—etchoo—etchoo" added Lucy.

The whole thing was incredible.

"Do you mean to say," Violet began, "that Richard Radcliffe my com—etchoo—etchoo sneezed?"

"Etchoo, etchoo, etchoo, chimed in the girls, in relays of two and threes.

"That Radcliffe's my best bet boy scout, caught you girls in my tent where you don't belong, and—etchoo—etchoo—etchoo."

"Etchoo—etchoo—etchoo" went the eight.

Just then the most defiant looking lad that ever felt under their observation, stepped as far as the entrance.

"Princesses," said Radcliffe "for it was he, 'I believe you had better come outside, with your sisters. I think there is strong punishment snuff in this tent.'"

"Oh you think—etchoo—etchoo."

"Yes Princesses I think so. I put some of it in here myself."

The girlscouts were already out into the company street.

"What's that you got in your hand?" asked Violet.

"Princesses," said Radcliffe holding it up to the light as they reached the outer room of the tent, and making the statement as though he were telling them of Glandelinian destruction complete. "It's a mouse trap, and it's full of live mice."

It certainly was, there were fifteen field mice, and two rats in it. The girlscouts edged away and in their horror left off sneezing, but the Vivian girls unafraid of locked closer and Violet took the cage, as she and her sisters never were afraid of mice and rats.

"What were you doing with this that?"

"Nothing, just now Princess."

"Nothing," said Violet, "but I was going to. You see Princesses, when I got them through sneezing, I was going to open the tent door, and tell them all to come out."

"Yes."

"And then Princesses, when they got outside I was going to turn these mice and rats loose on them for spying in your tent."

At this solemn declaration, five of the Glandelinian Girl Scouts squealed, while Alice Lucy and Jane looked first and molten lava at the boyscout now their arch enemy too.

"Rudcliffe, how did you trap them in my tent?"

"Violet it was easy! I caught them prying around your papers and those of your sisters and also books. Therefore I told them there were some new codes in your diary that they that you did not want any one to see. And they fell for it, and I trapped them."

"Oh," protested the Glandelinian Girl Scouts when being suspicious of us just love to rubber."

"And they all fell for it princesses. Glandelinian Girl Scouts when being suspicious of us just love to rubber."

"Come with me Rudcliffe" said Violet, and hurrying into the main tent room, Violet shut the tent door, and she and her sisters fairly shrieked and screamed with laughter for fully ten minutes, while Rudcliffe looked on helplessly. Had Violet and her sisters been dying he could not have been graver. He still held the mousetrap full of the mice.

"Rudcliffe" said Jennie at last, tears streaming down her cheeks from laughing, "do you know that you are a joker, a humorist?"

"No Princess I was not aware of it."

"Are you any relation to Charles Chaplin, Tom Sawyer, or Ben Turpin?"

"Indon I don't know princesses, are they in this tent?"

"Are you any cousin to Huckleberry Finn, or any other funny man?"

"No but to night, I'll find out who my relations are."

"Rudcliffe how would you like to be a comedian?"

"I have not the experience Jennie."

"How would you like to be a clown clown?"

RA Rudcliffe smiled.

"I think I would be satisfied Princess."

From that day till their mission was finished, the Glandelinian Girl Scouts treated Violet and her sisters with profound respect, and always obeyed Rudcliffe more than before.

VIOLET, AND HER SISTERS SURVIVE
PERIOD, AND IN CONJUNCTION WITH GERTRUDE ANGELOINE, PRACTICES PRACTICES SOMETHING MORE SURPRISING.....

In the meantime the various spying work at many different points was going on onrday day after day with what appeared to be the most edifying results. The boy and girl scouts of the commands of Violet, and her sisters especially the very small ones were quick and responsive in their efforts. Every day it was a wonderful and touching sight to even see how little tots of seven and eight, both boys and girls attending the seven o'clock secret meetings of their own initiative, and without the supervision of their leaders.

Gertrude Angelina and also Jennie Turner reported the usually marked change for the better, both in efforts, and perseverance, which they observed in the little brave charges.

Among those who could be especially mentioned was Mildred Maxwell. The mantle of holy war saints seemed to have fallen upon her, in our of time she was outstripping her friend Angeline Riches, not only in conduct and attention but also in quickness and grasp, and never..... Two days, before the hope of real success came, came there appeared at the entrance of the camp a and then to the tent of the surprise he proved to be her father. At first Violet and her sisters hearts sank at seeing them. Every morning over a period of a week they had almost been always been annoyed by child scouts from other parts of the camp, that brought anything but good news. Here, thought Violet and her sisters were some more peace.

"Good morning Darlings of the nation," said the little man "My name is Mr. Elnturn, and this is my little girl Gracedelinia."

"How do you do Darlings of the nation?" said little Gracedelinia, a child dainty in uniform, and carriage, and strikingly pretty.

"The pleasure is ours," said Violet herself but not looking just right. "But we don't allow any one to call us Darlings of the nation in this camp, from any one who we don't know, or the Glandelinians will make us think of something more important and serious than just Darlings of the nation. Just call me Captain, and my sisters also."

"Princess Violet" continued Elnturn to turn,--

"I do not know whether for heavens sake" warned Joice, "you may plainly call us by our names and it'll be better."

"Well Violet, I understand that you and your sisters have in this camp lots of boy-scouts and girl scouts looking for the responsibilities of the past flood disasters."

"So you found it out at last!" have you? Jennie said. "So many strangers seem to be just hearing of the existence of such disasters, and of the exploits of our scouts within this camp, which already in efforts for two weeks was getting on the nerves of us who every body here calls Violet, and her sisters, if it is all just for curiosity to do not therefore want to be interviewed by you. Good day."

"But we are not trying anything for curiosity Princess," said Mr Elnturn. And "I just came to this part of the camp yesterday."

"I beg your pardon, my name is not Princess, and do not mention that again. And also all the same it is too late to put your little girl in our scout companies, especially in this camp during work that has been going on, since the beginning of the month."

"Perhaps it is Violet." And the poor man looked very much disappointed, and perhaps you girl scout leaders do not understand. All right then. But without Gracedelinia I'll assure you before heaven you'll have a downfall in this very camp, he knows it all, the Glandelinians are onto you in every way, and they're only waiting for proof and evidence to seize you prisoners and your whole company. If you refuse our help I'm ever sorry. Come grace. I believe we are refused."

"Can't help it," said Violet. "We can take care of ourselves. And if you say what is true, we leave this camp this very night."

"But," interposed Rudcliffe, who was in the tent with them "Violet, have a heart and give them a trial. They look honest."

"Well as you say say Richard." Said Violet beginning to realize she and her sisters might be over cautious, and touched by also the evident dismay, which had come upon Gracedelinia's face. "Perhaps I and my sisters have been hasty. But then I cannot accept her into the girl scout camp under no conditions whatever, without a evident permit from general Vivian as I gave him orders to give no one permits he knew were strangers. He will allow her to assist me in other ways if she so desires, and if she proves her methods I'll see she'll get a permit. Has your daughter any military training?"

"Oh yes, Violet," put in Gracedelinia "yes." I asked your father "interrupted Violet. "Your statement does not pass you. Mr Elnturn has she any military training?"

"Yes Violet Violet. She was prepared in general Concentinian Arronburg army for ten months, and her mama and I had to go away last week, because a big forest fire came upon us last week, and burned our town unexpectedly just ten days before general Arronburg was to resume his advance northward, he and I have a permit secured by general Concentinian Arronburg from Emperor Hansen."

"You have. Now let's see it."

She looked it over.

"What you look so worried for Miss Gracedelinia," asked Violet suspiciously.

"Oh I must call you Princess, Princess Violet, the fire is surely coming here."

"It is what?"

"It is coming here."

"Listen you are telling me a story to scare me and my sisters."

"Cross my heart, and hope to die if I am, and anyhow I'll have it proved to you if you don't believe it. You can see it off from that signal station."

"You don't say?"

"You bet. It's a big one too."

"Rudcliffe" said Violet. "Up that signal station to investigate. If it is report to the first general you see. They are enemies, of course, but I don't want to see any horror from a fire here. Hurry."

As Radcliffe went toward the signal station, Violet said to the other two.

"Come into our tent. We'll have to give you an examination."

"On examining Gracedelina, Violet, and her sisters found that she was well instructed. And Gracedelina told a lot about the usual unusual immensity of the awful conflagration."

"Why Mr. Ellenturn?" Violet said. "This little girl is fit to take up scout work now."

"I knew it," cried Gracedelina, with evident joy. "Papa, I said all along that Violet, and her sisters would let me in her girl scout company."

"Hold on," said Joice, surprised that Radcliffe was not yet returning, "where did you say the forest fire is?"

"Southwest of us, and 100 miles away."

"Where is general Concentration Arronburgs army?"

"Twenty miles west from here. A part of the army fights the fire, but can't stop it."

"Where do you live?"

"Wherever we check our trunks. We have been homeless since the first disaster. We lost all, and my father and mother were drowned. My Grandmother is only living, besides my wife and child."

"Oh, and where are you staying just now?"

"In this camp. It is safe as long as we camp from Manley's main divisions. This is the east of picknells you know."

"Why Mr. Ellenturn?" said Angelina Vivian. "This child scout is fit to do the work now." But she thought to herself, "What is keeping Radcliffe?"

"But," continued Violet, "where did you say you were staying?"

"In this part of the Glandelinian camp."

"Very good. That's our section too. Well, if you stop traveling for about three weeks longer, it will afford me and my sisters great pleasure to have Gracedelina make her first test with my special girl scout commander. As for her relieving her Daily Holy Communion like we do here, well, I provide that is she does."

"Thank you very much, Gracedelina. This will take a weight off my mind. I really had to leave general Concentration Arronburgs army, it was a case of 'forest fire' necessity. The army encountered an enormous forest fire, near a big flood zone, and he fought several good engagements against the fire, but the conflagration keeps driving him back. Many places are threatened by the fire, and also the flood."

"Floods and forest fires both spreading toward this camp?"

"Yes, ahem, not the flood though."

"Say I ask what general Arronburgs engagements are?" Violet echoed. "May I ask what is doing?"

"He has over half the army fighting the blaze, besides a force of rangers and men citizens from towns and villages. But in Gracedelina, we are flood refugees, and now refugees from the fire. Aren't we?"

"And how do you like the experience?" Joice asked Gracedelina, looking at the child with rapt interest.

"Oh, I've been so long going through the experience so often, and so long at it, that I'm tired of it, and its getting on my nerves," she said with a gesture perfectly expressive of great weariness.

"How long have you been going through these experiences?"

"Nearly two years. I've went through forty disasters. I was a participant of the flood at Abbeville. I was at La Polana, and went through all the horrors."

"And how old are you, Gracedelina?"

"I am ten years old, Princess."

"Good heavens!" Violet and her sisters exclaimed.

It was really settled that Gracedelina should call at their tent at ten the next morning on the chance of getting her opportunity during that day of relieving a little private instruction. Violet, and her sisters cautioned the new child scout not to speak to any one else, whom she did not know of her profession, however a caution entirely unnecessary—and finally let her into the other g class of girls, and under the special care of Gertrude Angelina, who was to entertain her, after she received her instructions, and on such other occasions as should arise. So Gertrude Angelina alone of all the girl and boy scouts was confided the secret that was among them, a profession girl of experience. The usual stolid Radcliffe, who had discovered the truth about the girls remark about the fires heading for the camp, and who always was too busy to pay any attention as a rule to visitors or on new comers, was all alive with interest on the occasion of serving the Vivian Girls. Before they retired into the inner tent, Radcliffe had on returning before the ending of the conversation between Violet, and her sisters, and the new girl scout, kept his eyes steadily on Violet, and her sisters. As any one could have observed, there was a great awe upon his features, indicated by a mouth held wide open, and a rigid stare, and then as Violet showed the two visitors out of the tent, he held it open, holding it open, holding it open. He still held his mouth open and his eyes followed with a rare constancy every move of little Gracedelina. Gracedelina caught his stare as she neared the tent door.

"Are you the specially favored aide-de-camp of the Princesses?" she asked smiling into Radcliffe's face. Radcliffe still clinging to the tent door drew back as far as he respectfully as it was physically possible to go, and then replied:

"I'm only an ordinary boy scout leader, Miss Gracedelina."

"My names Grace Delina," said the little girl moving a step nearer to the manifest surprise of the boy scout, who was standing by the opening.

"I'm glad to know you," answered smiling. "You'll be under me to-morrow."

Then as the two went out, Radcliffe instead of closing the door on them, followed them out into the company street, and again allowing his jaw to drop, craned his head forward, and continued to stare to such an extent that to Violet, his eyes seemed in danger of popping out of his head:

"Radcliffe," she called. "Perhaps you'd like to follow those two down the Company Street would you not?"

"Yes Princess," said Radcliffe, re-entering the tent, with one last long—lingering long lingering look. "I would."

"Possibly that little girl scout is the ghost of your dead sister?"

"No Princess," answered Radcliffe in whose face still remained unusual excitement.

"Princesses," he continued with an unconscious sarcasm for murdering my sister, and another one who is younger the enemy will pay. Princess that little girl is an old friend of mine, only she did not recognize me in my disguise. And that little girl is a professional."

"Professional at what?"

"At spying."

"Oh who is a Professional spy is she? And who told you she is a Professional spy?"

"Why I saw her often, and we know each other long."

"Why didn't she recognize you then?"

"Because of my disguise. I once heard her and her father talking about her Vivian daughters, in their plot. I also heard them talking about an engagement they had with Gertrude Angelina at Manley's headquarters, something which he'll risk all to cause or bring about her capture."

"You hear Radcliffe to be singularly interested. Especially in her. What is the matter?"

"Princess I never knew that girl spy to fail once."

"Have you been on an adventure with her?"

"Yes, a hundred times, and she I never lets an opportunity slip once."

"Have you ever failed on an adventure with her?"

"No. And I've been on two very great adventures. I went through the Abbeville flood, as I wrote you and saw the explosion at Jennie Vivian City, and went through three or four other d disasters, and though I was in the thickest thickest of the fighting at the battle of Hendrick Junction on the Cedernine Creek."

"I thought I heard some one say you never had been on an adventure."

"Oh but they don't know me then."

"Indeed. Well Radcliffe I suppose you intend to tell all your boy and girl scouts that you've seen a professional a y spy who is a special friend of yours who does not know you in your disguise."

"I'm not going to tell a thing. I'll tell no one that Gracedelina Ellenturn is a professional spy. She's here to make an effort for us Princess, and surely wants no publicity. I'll tell her nothing, and I'll tell you nothing."

"Good, you are a professional yourself," said Violet. "I see you can keep secrets."

"Yes if necessary Princess. Only when it harms no one then I usually tell. But if I say anything now, and I don't know whether I have christians and glandelinians a mong my friends, I'll tell the biggest blunder of my life, and hurt her and all of us including myself too. None of us would know she is even."

"Good."

Gracedelina was punctual each day. Besides coming to interview Violet, and a her sisters, she and her father were seen daily overstepping on every do con vention unreasonably. Glandelinian soldiers, officers, and every boy and girl scout. One thing surprised Violet and her sisters from the first. Gracedelina was never alone. Whether hidden near Glandelinian officers, or on the company street, in the generals headquarters, or among working child slaves of the army, vigilant vigilant girl and boy scouts were always with her. Her followers practiced what some followers of some leader of girl and boy scouts profess to do, they never left their leader or comrades unattended. As a result their leader was as confident in them and as unsophisticated in her efforts as a girl scout leader in good surroundings, or dangerous situations always is, and her supporters obeyed her as children under the care of a good mother. Although Gracedelina was waiting the pleasure of Violet and her sisters in the interior tent each day from ten to eleven thirty, it was only for a short time, such as from impulsive duties, that either Violet, or her sisters, were able to instruct her. But the time did appear to hang heavily on her hands, she flitted about like some butterfly, or fairy, from one part of the tent to another, alighting to continue the figure, now on the table, where she drew some astonishing codes rather cleverly, now explaining her adventure of the past, then taking a geography where she examined maps and then studying a typewriter.

To the surprise of Violet, and her sisters, she kept Radcliffe in a state of great and perpetual excitement. The young boy scout in her presence, done all he could to help her, not content with giving her pointers, or following her scouting work in a perpetual movement of his own, he smiled on her every now and then, and winked his eye to Violet, and her sisters noticed with mild surprise. As for Gracedelina she made herself quite at home with Radcliffe, chattering with him, making him explain the different parts of the Glandelinian camp, the workings of the typewriter, and then as he offered her his seat, she would take his place and start beating out with grim determination her own code, while Radcliffe stood by with a look as if he should say he was uninteresting another member of angelia and was unaware of it.

So friendly were the two, and so attentive to each other at times, that one of the Vivian Girls seated in a chair, would raise her voice against their almost forgotten duty, all other kinds of duty or duties, Gracedelina was quite different, and all her vivacity was gone, and she was as quiet and as demure as any girl scout, or any girl, and that is saying a good deal could be, and it was doubtful who her whether a single boy or the girl scout of the whole Glandelinian army were aware of her presence, neither did the others, that is the christian girl and boy scouts knew of her addition to their own ranks, and if they did they did not pay any attention attention to it.

Gertrude Angelina quite proud of being delegated by Violet, and her sisters to take care of her was also extremely attentive to the new child scout. Not content with the ordinary duties and civilities toward her, she showed Gracedelina all over all over the camp from one part to the other, explained to her the different grades and divisions, and so improved or impressed Mr. Ellenturn that solicitous father after the first few days was content to stay in some remote part of the camp when and so long as Gracedelina was in the hands of the enthusiastic Gertrude Angelina.

Of course there was a great difference in their respective ages, yet the two had within the first two, to twenty four hours of their acquaintances acquaintance and loved eternal friendship, and Gertrude believed she knew Gracedelina as well as Radcliffe. In such other company they chattered like birds, and having exchanged with each other all the secrets about the enemy which they happened to possess, proceeded to each of them to try and secure new ones, and thus while at their work kept burning the fires of friendship.

Before the third day was passed, they were both wrapped in mystery, every now and Gertrude, said, "If you disturb us again while we are so busy, you'll find yourself without bread and water, in the guard house. Now mind."

On the morning of the last day of this main effort, Violet herself was informed by Madcliff that both Angelina Aronson, and Grace- Dalina were outside, and each had a job to do. Violet girls privately.....They were almost hasty

1. The first step is to identify the problem or question that needs to be answered. This involves understanding the context and the specific requirements of the task.

"YES!"

"And I've been terribly upset this time. I feel as if I am in terrible despair."

"In despair?" Violet asked.

"Yes, and of losing hope of ever winning our cause. The war is as good as won by the enemy already. At the beginning of the war everything wasn't so bad as it is now. And general Grathheart said, 'The more wicked an enemy, the more the good suffer.'"

"I know the situation pretty well, and I don't see that we are either to lose the war or suffer disasters beyond our endurance. A good cause never loses."

"And Princess I've been a terrible failure this time during my whole service." Gertrude went on.

"A fair failure," Violet said.

"Yes, and a very poor one. All other boy and girl scouts are not as near so bad as I am. We've been in this camp so long and we haven't discovered anything yet."

"I know you pretty well Gertrude, and I don't see that you are either a failure or a quitter. If so we all are. I really tried a hundred times harder so to say than you did, and I made no better success. The enemy have outwitted us cleverly. Angelina Riches notified me this morning that she overheard that Manley may have destroyed or covered up all evidences. Gracelinda just now told me the same."

"Ah that's just it Princess. The enemy have fooled you, fooled us all. I'll bet the Glandelinian generals found out secret agents and spies are in their midst and therefore are keeping everything a secret from us, and covering up everything. When I found out the generals were suspicious I kept on the lookout."

"I don't blame you my dear."

"Neither does the other scouts. Everything we are looking for, the enemy does his best not to let us know."

"All christian spies," Violet observed, are not failures, when they cannot always find out everything from the enemy. To spy on the enemy you know is just as hazardous for us, is just as for the wicked to risk the loss of their souls by telling other peoples sins."

"But Princess Violet, no matter where we go, or what we try to do it seems as if the enemy is always doing, so that we wouldn't even know who are responsible for the great flood disasters. Look how determined Angelina Riches and others were in their work, and forever so long we tried also and failed, and then Princess, I'm just worried sick about all the past disasters. Princess I'm beginning to think Calvernia's ruin is a mortal wound to Abbiennia's glister state, and that Abbiennia is as a doctor not being able to save her, is it Princess?"

"Then Violet thought to herself, the nearest thing for a mortal wound for Abbiennia's State Calvernia on all occasions, were not the flood disaster of the past, and present, but the cruel and devastating forest fires, which were consuming vast seas of the country forest."

"No, my dear Gertrude," Violet answered "To begin with, no one can think at the time that the enemy are going to make such big disasters, and then cover it up so as to make it appear as natural volcanic disasters as it was said, in our work here we have to keep dodging so the enemy generals won't know what we are doing. Look how you, Radcliffe, Penrod, Jane, and others went through the Abbienn Flood, and we ourselves are also worried sick by the whole situation. At the time I did not even think the enemy could create such big disasters."

"Princess," broke in Gertrude, "When I and my companions were caught, in that explosion and flood disaster at Abbienn, I really didn't know what to say or do. It's an awful hard thing for a little girl scout to be almost a victim of a double disaster. I'm sure like to get even with the enemy by letting him be exposed exposed for it as I'm certain it is done by the enemy. And then general Vivian told me over and over again that I should do all I can to let the whole world know about it. But that is impossible, as so much communications of all kinds if literally cut off from the very world itself by these horrors."

"It would take the wisdom of an older heart than you had then," said Violet "to get out of such an awful flood situation. Don't bother about that point any more. We'll win yet."

"I'll not Princess, but that's not all. All the time I've been in the service, I've been trying to be successful, and only am once in a while. While working against the enemy I am full of frivolity."

"Good Gracious!" said Violet, for the third time.

"Yes Violet, I like to play dirty tricks on the enemy."

"So do I, and my sisters."

"And I love to torment the Glandelinian generals. I'm a J Katsenjammer kid to them."

"So and my sisters."

"And I do so love to solve the problem. I'd give anything to find out who of the enemy are responsible for these terrible disasters."

"You would."

"Yes, its terrible. I bungled yesterday. Manley still wonders who put that wasp nest in his room."

"Gertrude tell me do you do anything desperate or foolish, or that you think rash, almost at the risk of suicide to gain in anything you set out to do?"

"I think not Princess—that is—I to be safe Princess, I'll say yes. I did yesterday. If general Manley knew I caused that swarm of hornets among him and his officers yesterday he'd kill me like a dog. You ought to see him and his officers. They are a "swell" affair."

"Why did you do it?"

"I got mad mad. Because I dropped an ink bottle he called me a clumsy rat."

"And you showed him you was the "queen of hornets" Gertrude!"

"Yes Princess."

"Instead of trying first to do things rashly my dear, try always to do first what you think will please our blessed Lord, and bring best results and blessing for your undertakings and then you needn't worry. Is there anything else Gertrude?"

"Yes Princess. Now can our government prevent the enemy from making more disasters in the future. I have prayed and prayed and so have every one of our followers, and Angelina Riches, and we never knows what's going to happen to the whole country yet."

"I'm sure afraid the enemy will win the war."

"It's a very sad case Gertrude, Our Government, I'm afraid can't help itself directly. There was a time when it could, but that seems to be past. If Vivian Manley is captured it might help. We all feel the situation keenly. My Father the Emperor on several occasions has written to me and my sisters, telling me that it is impossible for him to find means to stop the disasters. I and my sisters must find a way and that is by trying to locate the cause and responsibility first. I sent Walter Starring to help by spying on Hubeam Manley, and he has not been heard from." Gertrude was weeping.

"Poor Calvernia!" she sobbed. "I'd give my life to morrow, to stop these disasters, and I'm going to offer my Holy Communion for the stricken states, and that ought to count."

"It certainly should," said Violet. "I and my sisters will do the same."

"And to day, this afternoon" Continued Gertrude—growing suddenly radiant—"I'm going to make my general attempt, and when I intend to make a general effort, do you know what I think of?"

"What Gertrude?"

"Of having a lucky chance of securing what we are after. This afternoon I hope I'll be successful."

"I'll pray that you are."

"I have something to ask!"

"What is that?"

"Don't you think something queer of Radcliffe?"

"Yes. There is something unusual about him. What do you suspect?"

"Don't say a word. To any one else, I suspect he is a girl in disguise."

"I and my sisters suspect the same thing."

"I have my suspicions, but I'll not mention it now," said Gertrude. "I'll tell you some other time for he is coming now and I don't want him to know yet. Good bye."

And the famous girls' scout was gone.

"Good gracious," Violet cried for the fourth time, and would fain have lapsed into meditation on the disaster situation, had not Radcliffe come in, and interrupted her with the information that the outer tent was filled with boy and girl scouts, who wished to see her and her sisters privately, and as some put it on important business. As Violet went out, he said to himself:

"So Angelina, Angelina Arronburg knows or suspects I'm a girl in disguise. Will wait later, and she'll have a great surprise. To bad I can't spring it on her now. Her sister indeed, Annie Arronburg."

THE TWO FAMOUS G.I.' SCOUTS HURSE A SECRET.

"So it appears," said John. "Yet that seems impossible, as you've been afraid to betray their masters, knowing the horrible penalty if they are caught. You've been burned at the stake or crucified. The last is possible, but I don't believe it, being disgusted with the whole matter. I'm going to take an adventure, and I and my sisters have made up our minds to give up the whole undertaking and return to the civilized land lines tomorrow, or find our way to some other glandulopian army, where we can believe the information we have heard of. You know we can't wait Starring on the same expedient for weeks. We've had our fun. We want to get out of here. We're going to leave this morning. We are making on the same morning we went off, and you wished him Luck and Darger, and others, but elsewhere have wired general Aronburg to try his luck and have not headquarters. All of his staff were out at the time, but doing night scouting. I heard when he was notified General Manley in getting out of bed decided to make a night investigation and examination, and arranged with guards and soldiers to keep watch outside, while he went within. In no part of the wing could he discover the light, but those who remained outside said they could still see it shining brilliantly through a window. It was then suggested by the general that someone should go into the empty wing, and place a lighted candle in another window for comparison. This was done and sure enough the second light appeared, and was visible next to the other, although on approaching close to the building the mystery light disappeared, while also the candle was mysteriously put out. But out there have been many similarly disturbing incidents. General Manley claims he has heard a peculiar tapping even in broad daylight on the walls of his building. The tapping seems to come from where the tables are situated, and proceeds to go around the interior of the building, and what the origin of this is they cannot tell.

Curious noises also have been heard coming from general Manley's dressing room table in one of his upper rooms. He said the noises are intermittent and quite audible in the day time. As a result of all these strange happenings, he has called expert officers to investigate. After their personal experiences they left convinced that the matter demanded further research. Many other officers are under no delusions regarding the "spy apparitions," and pointed out the spot where they had seen them disappear on swift horses. General Manley, I heard tell officers that he had seen the figures of girl and boy scouts on several occasions recently, and have also observed a very old fashioned house burn to the ground last week. At first Manley was upset and mentioned to the highest general, but he said he was dreaming, but on two other occasions he was positive he could not be mistaken. General Manley said that at nine o'clock last night, that he caught the glimpse of some boy scout, leaning over the gate near his headquarters, from where he was riding past. He saw the scout when he went to his bedroom and looked out of the window, he distinctly saw a party of child scouts ride away. Another time, when riding up the roadway, to his headquarters, he saw the figure of child scouts disappear through a maze of trees.

Manley declared that ever since the last two weeks there has been talk of strange mysterious spies, and that what has been happening inside, and outside the camp was due to what has been going on since the war started. Many soldiers general Manley states, has been distressed on seeing visions and lights, which they believed to be the work of spies that they would not venture within a mile of the building, for fear of being shot at from the windows. A feeling of dread permeates the whole camp, and is not to be wondered at, because it is not difficult to imagine spies in the grounds, which have been and will be the drama of fierce battles, and thousands upon thousands of tremendous tragedies per day all over the country. It would be difficult to imagine a more easily spying place than the interior of this Glandelinian camp. The very atmosphere here is uneasy and as the officers move through passages and corridors they feel the threat of danger. Conversation is suddenly interrupted by a noise or a tapping for which there seems no natural explanation, and as one threads from one room to another the very floor seems to echo with sinister sounds, and mysterious movements have also been heard coming from other portions of the building. This is our doing, so Violet as they might get suspicious we might as well make a last resort, and try the child slaves.

"Angelina Arronburg shake hands. You've solved a question that's given me no end of annoyance and anxiety."

"And so during the three days of special preparation Angelina Richee herself had been among the various slaves, who had been in time for all their duties in the morning regular, in the afternoon, and as Gertrude Angelina had said, viceroyally dominated and held down by the officers and the soldiers. Remembering all this, and knowing the value of child slaves, the Vivian Girls received Angelina Richee who brought one to her on the following morning. And what a transformation in the appearance between them and the child slave. The child slave was slave was tawdriy dressed, dull colored of face and her unkempt long bobbed hair was readily observed on her head. However even her eyes were not bright, her cheeks fully telling of the race, and the manner of her dress discovered to Violet, and her sisters the pathetic beauty of her gypsy like face framed in her raven black long bobbed hair, and wonder of wonders holiness had touched the features of the little child slave, touched them so that she looked like an angel, as innocent and as winsome as any child belonging to a saintly mother, though though she was in a Glandelinian camp.

"I've seen her," said Angelina Richee, "and a peculiarly clever little child slave, come to offer you whatever services, she'll have an opportunity for, and especially if she be allowed to go on with her customary work, so she won't be discovered. She also came to thank you, and your sisters for her kindness in giving her a humble little slave the honor. I've been with her, and the others of her fellow slaves for three days too. Princess, and can you, that a sister, a sister, a girl or boy, as their slaves are I would not, faintly could be found. Oh Princess, if they have the chance, they'll be as good as the best of spies for us. You should have seen them pray morning and night when their masters, or overseers are not watching. Why last evening the poor little slaves, had almost to be forced from their knees. God help them gain their freedom. And help her Princess. Princess, she wants to say something to you and your sisters."

Violet, and her sisters turned their eyes to the child slave. The boldness in her face showed she was able to be trusted though she also had the sweet air of childhood which the Glandelinians had not succeeded in robbing her of. She appeared to be about eight years of age, but was ten.

"Violet," she said, "even her voice was lovely." Since I know you and others with you are Christians fighting for our freedom, and who are here to find out responsible responsible ones for big disasters, I and my companions will do anything to help you succeed. But I want you and all your followers to pray for us, that we'll keep good, and succeed in our work for you. I know the Glandelinians are the cause of the floods, and the big fires, and I'm sorry."

"And with that she went in and Angelina Richee, "what are you going to ask our blessed Lord for when you try to help us?"

"Miss Richee, I'm going to ask him to help me, and then if we are not successful, I'll be a saint if he wills it. You see no matter how long we stay, the Glandelinians cannot put us into the danger of growing up as bad children. All the child slaves no matter where and who they are, live good little girls and boys."

The evident sincerity of the child slave moved Violet, and her sisters so that they could not trust themselves to speak.

"And now Princess, don't fail to say for me and my companions, that we may keep it up for you and succeed."

The unfortunate child slave of the worst possible child slave camp, of the worst Glandelinian army in an absolutely impossible surroundings, who was, worst of all, the child of the worst and most filthy, treacherous, and worst home, and insolent drinking parents brought the tears to the eyes of Violet, and her sisters.

There were many other efforts made that day, by all the followers of Violet, and her sisters, after so secret fervent communications, but while many did all they could and approached Glandelinian officers while in conversation, or looked through their papers and important maps, and documents to find, the clues, and worked hard, with hope and faith, the writer himself did not doubt whether any one did better as the abandoned child slave. It was quite late in the afternoon, when Violet, and her sisters felt very tired, and instead of going down to the other part of the camp to join her sisters at once she rested in her tent. It was half past three in the afternoon before she got ready to join her sisters and just before she started, in entered Gertrude and Grace.

"Why Girls" Violet exclaimed "Haven't you gone to the Mess Hall tent for your dinner yet?"

"No Princess" said Gertrude. "We couldn't go without pushing our work through." "Angelina Richee was coming too," added Gracelindia, "but after working so hard the fasting made her feel sick and faint, and she's waiting for us at the child scouts Mess Hall. Violet, she sent you this," and Gracelindia handed Violet an envelope, containing as she afterwards discovered mysterious chips, which Angelina Richee had taken from a general's table, a general whom she said was general Vivianstone. "And Violet, we want you to help us for helping us and I promise you we are going to do our best, like good brave little girls."

"Thank you girls, but you are not angels yet, and I think you had better rush off and get your dinner, or you will be overdone," said Violet, and she gave the girls a little advice first.

"And Violet," Violet said, "Am I to see the success of our adventure before the coming of next month? It looks as if we shall be here for only two weeks longer. Oh, the hope of Princess. It looks as if we shall be here for only two weeks longer. To have other working every night without the help of the Gemini, who have gone to investigate the whole horizon sky was so glimmeringly red last night, and we have sorted three nights, and Miss Richee secured that envelope, in general New Port headquarters, but the note or letter is signed by general Vivianstone, and I'm coming back here to morrow at noon with Penrod and we'll try and work out that cipher note."

"You will be welcome." "And Violet put in Gertrude "Would you mind our going over in the private part of your tent when the whole camp is asleep to morrow night?"

"That's up now?" "The two girls began to make all manner of facial and manual signals at each other. Gracelindia seemed to propose something to Gertrude, to which she at first strongly objected.

"Violet," said Gertrude at last, "it's a secret, but we'll let you know in good time. I've Violet," said Gertrude, "but we're being saved dropped."

And with this Violet, and her sisters had to be satisfied. The two girls came to bid Violet and her sisters up beautiful fare all farewell both excited with perfect grace the famous elaborate curtsy.

After they were gone Violet and her sisters began to inspect the letter in the huge envelope. It was a huge letter, and it ran as follows:

"Your Excellency general Manley; From the Vivianstone. Your Excellency, It might take a volume with a million sheets to write to you in full the effects the disasters of flood, fire and explosions have upon the people throughout the whole Abbeinnian Empire. The uprising is not general yet, because the news predicts the disasters at Abbeinn to be of volcanic origin and better let them keep thinking so. But it can be graphically explained here. Of course your Excellency, because the catastrophes cut off all direct communications with the whole world, and the devastated states it is a long time before the news reaches the people in Abbeinn, and we are doing what we can to delay it longer, and make more evidence of the disasters being of natural and volcanic origin. If we don't succeed Glandelinia is doomed to defeat. At first Your Excellency the news was only success Glandelinia came more and more until the news papers in every city, and town was full of it. Our city spies have notified me and others of the fact. And Your Excellency the papers sold so readily that they rose in price, but this did not decrease their sale.

On every street corner our secret spies have seen news paper boys and even men women and little girls, shouting and shouting the extras in a deafening uproar and making and sales generally. The spies bought some of the papers and sent them to me, your Excellency. All kinds of books and magazines, and novels were printed to me, your Excellency. The intensity of suffering, the extent of property destruction, the effects they had upon the land, and the plague brought on by them. They could not believe their eyes, to them the news seemed immense and greatly exaggerated all out of proportions. They thought it was impossible. But as each day came and went and the news increased, they began to believe the disaster stories. The people became aroused, they began to strike the disaster was of nature, many had and have friends in new roles regarding them districts, and they stormed the newspaper offices for news regarding them.

And what excited the people most were the many orators who held great open speeches in the streets, halls, public buildings, and so forth, recruiting stations

[illegible]

The state Government copywrited them and sent them to the main National Government who had them published in all books and news papers. The real statements were then forwarded to Emperor Vivian.

The news of the true nature of this disaster was then learned throughout the nation by means of these books, and newspapers, and it aroused the people so that every man was mad for entering the army, and even slight defects of human conditions would not be permitted for exemption, if they are expected exempted for a slight eye trouble, or other mere conditions, they storm and wreck the enlistment or draft board, and now most the members, form proper of their own select commanders and 80 of the nobility, and your yore court, did the time however people of higher classes, of the nobility, and newspapers and various books, and magazines exaggerated, but as had as reported that the they could not believe that the forest fires were as big as they were said to be. They heard that the force of the explosions near Abbiemann, sunk a whole country below the waters of Lake Geneva, thus lowering a part of the city of Abbiemann strong city like Abbiemann with such an enormous population should be wiped out without a trace left. That to them, seemed a thing much too impossible to happen.

Therefore they intended to have these things investigated, to find out all evidence of truth in the matter, and if all were exaggerated as feared, all such publications on these dealers would be stopped before the nation should be aroused to such a high pitch of great excitement for nothing. Those who are to investigate are the best and most reliable men. They know their business, and have gone forth with a hearty good will. It had taken them quite a few months to go over most of the territory by horse and motor car but found everything contrary to their own expectations.

"First... They couldn't find the site of Abbeysan though they knew for all certainty where the city had lately stood. They discovered some portions of the east to north but these were on higher elevation and in ruins beyond repair. Here the lower section of the city had lately stood a vast expanse of swiftly moving water could be observed, water covered with floating debris of all kinds. Soundings showed the water was over three hundred feet deep at the deepest parts, and that there were proven by divers to be remains of houses below the surface. At the spot where the water was not deeper, wreckage floated like immense immense log jams. They also could observe that the newspaper to the true to go to go to go the whole territory affected by the disaster would take many months as they reported only what they had observed.

Imaged for Your Excellency, Abkhazians believe the case and is an aroused nation. The whole world it is claimed says she is perfectly justified, for our country called Landaulina is said to be responsible for all of the terrible disasters of the past, and therefore surely is guilty of this biggest one too, and also the results of the terrible forest fire. The world claims Abkhazians deemed it perfectly justifiable to take long and long time to get out of the forest, and desire the end of the big war. Yet sir it is said that it was a very long time before any member of the Abkhazian government would believe that the disaster was caused by our Landaulin engineers. The authorities continually insist that the disaster happened through the vibrations of air concussions and earthquakes, and the shocks caused the floods. The reason they would not believe was because the disaster seemed too immense floods. But that caused by explosion and explosion, the reason they would not believe is because it was too terrible to have even any foundations for facts. All the reports of the disasters seemed too exaggerated to be anything outside of being caused by natural disturbances, and this was the reason your Excellency so many investigators were sent. The proven statements of the investigators staggered the Government officials, they could not believe the investigations were correct, but the investigators then in the face of very trustworthy clues had been brought back by the investigators, showing that facts remain to claim Landaulina is responsible. Inquiries were then held over the great calamities.

All scientific persons were called, even all kinds of diving engineering engineers throughout the country to join, and even every possible witness that could testify. Every witness told things that were astonishing, especially of explosions, explosions and flood reaching what has been known as the first stage of the explosion. The flood reached a point of evidence, Frank Goodman has been crushed or craved by the flood that ensued. The main thing that was debated on was where did such a tremendous flood come from, what in the world brought forth all this... And where it came from, the source of the flood. The flood came from the river, the river was not responsible, as the flood was too sudden, and the greatest force was in the neighborhood of Abbotsford and further north, and the torrent obliterated many of the greater rivers at once, turning them into raging seas. All that had to be done was to build levees along the river, and the water of the Lake Agassiz. If all the water came from these rivers, and the lake, then they must have been at an awful flood stage. But the river and levee engineers said, Indeed the source of the flood was a mysterious and most tremendous mystery. It seemed, if even so, that the disaster traced the source of the flood. If it did it must have been for us. Probably the flood raised its own source from its own force and volume. But whatever was the cause the investigators could not find the source of the flood unless they believed in the possibility of a flood which would rise from the earth itself. Therefore believe in all probabilities if this enormous disaster had been caused by a natural earthquake, the Abbeisnians might have borne it more meekly, but as we are suspected for it Abbeisnians claim, it is too much. All she just wait for the evidence against us, and then she will strike. We see no other way than to stand up as we stand against us, and then she will strike. We see no other way than to stand up as we stand against us, and then she will strike. We see no other way than to stand up as we stand against us, and then she will strike.

It cannot be possibly describe it from the necessity of demand, many big recruiting many men and women in every city and town, and even then all these had their hands full.

Streets in front of these recruiting stations were covered and jammed with crowds of people demanding their turn for indistene enlistment, and those who were more im-

Should she be alarmed when she learns of... strictly enforced draft or conscription, what if she too is mobilizing her resources... it. How many she is mobilizing is only known to her... but evidently it will only increase the immensity of the task... whatever unless we strike the man who is behind such a mobilization on both sides is equally as alarming and giving vent to a warning of the main fury of this great war.

various Abbelesian armies, such as massacres of the children, and everything that has happened since the first disaster at every disaster that occurred frequently far west August 1915 of this year, and so forth. The number of these awful disasters are immeasurable, there being 10,000,000 of them, and filled up a number of good sized books. The number of victims was uncountable, and the numbers to be taken care of is record breaking. When all this was done by our own side, as it is true, Abbelesian claims are that it is up to her to put a stop to it, whether it would be avenged or not depends upon the situation later. All the population are for making an example of our country before the whole world. They are for not giving quarter to any of our Abbelesian armies.

They are for giving back disaster for disaster, an measure for massacre, blow for blow. Every city, and within, or near the suburbs became the headquarters of and for the numerous mobilization camps spring up. Millions were in the large camps in no time and they are in a desperate hurry to go to the front. It can be said that in a few weeks time thousands of mobilization camps had sprung up all over the country and they are quickly crowded to their limits. Though we Abbelesians know that the disasters would be caused by the Abbelesians, Abbelesians to mobilize so strongly, it is said we have the over confidence that the devastation caused by the disasters would prevent those Abbelesian armies from coming down fast enough against our armies. Especially when so many railroad lines were destroyed, but I've learned that the Abbelesian Government planned to force all Abbelesian prisoners to restore the tracks under guard.

For example they have been made to work in disaster torn cities, though they say it is not meant to enslave them. That they were forced to restore what they destroyed, and it was either work or not eat. Therefore the prisoners also are to be put to work to restore the railroads, and the cost then would only be the material and the food for the prisoners. Now quickly this could be accomplished depends on the number of prisoners secured, and how complete the havoc done by the enemy made disasters.

But nevertheless the number of men entering the army of Abbelesia is intensely immeasurable. They could be formed into hundreds of vast armies, and when marching against us prove a most dangerous foe indeed. How vast the numbers are the Abbelesian Governments keep strictly secret.

No stranger or any one who could not give a satisfactory answer are not permitted any one in any one of the cities for fear they would obtain information. Of course the disasters have upset the Abbelesian Government greatly. Every disaster following so closely has caused a sensation beyond comprehension. The authorities of every state are continually apprehensive, and are sending every means to prevent a report they ever reaching them. It is blow upon blow, and next probably we would. Many times the majority of cities have been in danger of annihilation because they are striving to investigate into the disasters and their causes, and they better look out.

All the highest Christian generals also held some pretty exciting councils every time the news of a new disaster is sent out, and they believe in that the reason why we Abbelesians are able to stand such dire calamities, is because their ability is beyond control of the Angolians, and that unless our Abbelesian armies are driven out of Abbelesia nothing can stop us from continuing the horrors. We'll see that they don't drive us out.

They were glad to learn that so many people throughout the Abbelesian states are mobilizing for the army, and general Vivian believes it would be a great benefit for the nation, and bring a speedy downfall for our country. But general Vivian and many others believe that such mobilization would only cause a great increase in income in the war. Might as well say the latter is right, for it will and quickly too beyond what they even think.

Emperor Vivian himself is sitting copping and headless over the situation. It is a problem which he cannot face alone, even though he is the main head of the crazy Christian nation. After one disaster following another added to the list he feels desperate, especially when it is said he is rendered homeless by the Abbelesian flood swelling the Arrowhead River into a crazy sea, and forced by loss and emotion to join the Refugee Guard line just for experience which he cannot escape. Of course he has been disguised when he joined the bread line, or otherwise every one else would be offering to help him out. The destruction of his palace, and his Imperial city is to him the last straw. After all this, at he does not know what to do. Well he can sit on a tack for all I care, it is said he feels uneasy, dreads dreading that the cause will be lost. Well it is. Act immediately he cannot, because the floods and forest fires cut off all communications with the outside world.

He and his whole Royal Cabinet are cut off with it, and his whole country, at least he is marooned and his whole city. He can get to any one he wants, and they cannot come to him. This is his main problem. It is more than a problem. He feels that he cannot do a thing until the communications have been restored. And besides he does not even believe that the general uprising of the other states will alter the situation at all. He feared that it only would bring fearful and most disastrous battles, causing an immeasurable loss of life, and a more terrible number of those disabled or crippled for life.

And this he does not like. He did not even think the war was going to be so bad. He has even hoped that the war would be over way before this time. But this time he is sadly disappointed for the war disasters only came in like this. However despite the effects of the great flood that devastated his palace, places palaces and other royal buildings, the Emperor has not lost any of his Royal Members, and now he has gathered them together in the house of the city Mayor and has held a council over the most unusual situation. What the Emperor wished to decide upon was how to restore all communications of that he could also act and strike our country a blow from which we will never recover. How he debated over the situation with them, they could not find world for answer.

They do not know what to do themselves. To them it is a tremendous puzzle. On this occasion they are all in a hole as to say which in what directions will be nothing short of. They believe that the restoration of all the communications will be nothing short of a tremendous miracle. What makes the situation worse is that despite all the investigations made, no one could bring any evidence of what powerful explosives were used, how they were stolen and manufactured also and how the explosives were transported to the spot without the slightest detection. If this cannot be accomplished we cannot be stopped from making future disasters. But what causes the greatest difficulty is that the forest fires, and the tremendous floods have destroyed all traces of clues that could have been found, and our troops have been careful to cover up all traces of despair. All the royal courts are now down, might as well as sink almost beyond their depth in the flood of despair with no such thing as reason in sight. He frequently petitions to god, and what is called his pious Mother for him.

The unusual excitement and the immeasurable mobilization of the most population of the Abbelesian States gave no encouragement to Emperor Vivian, and we have heard that he only comfort he has is of knowing that his beloved daughters are safe from the danger of them. Our Excellency. But what gives me some hope however is that nevertheless he is not heart and from them for months.

There is one thing Emperor Vivian desired and that is investigate the cause of the disasters himself but as it is so very difficult and dangerous he is strongly advised against it. To my opinion as is too he a yellow coward to do it and what that Christian Big leader would like to know is what the results of the mobilization will be. The reason he did and does not take heart from it is that he knew we are also mobilizing supplying just as immeasurably and that the issue of the war would be a matter of endurance and last. Well we'll stand the endurance more than they will.

In some measure by himself, for the tremendous disasters, not that he paused long, and its signs of his misgivings and did, but he knows his own confidence in strong strongly believing that nothing short of natural war disasters would make sense. Now when he realized it, it is too late. And on the spies notified us he is in a record breaking violence, and an immeasurable fury.

As he told them, dreadful consequences would happen through this gigantic mobilization, and that the civilized world would protest to the violence of the accompanying. If all communications could be restored he could not. Well we'll see that there will be restoration of communications. And the only hope to our observers was to restore of his own armies, and instead of directing the course and progress of the war from Abbelesia itself, to fight the war through himself and direct all army generals as communications would allow. Because of the great disaster affecting Abbelesia, within the worst Emperor Vivian feels that because of all communications being cut off the very nation was helpless, especially the devastated states of the North and the west... Abbelesia and northern Angolians states are the hardest hit of all, and both as well as Evangelina state are the ones where so much communications are destroyed. This is the greatest difficulty for the Emperor and his Royal Court, for this is the biggest "cross word" puzzle of record. Even hardly anything could be done to stop the floods, and the other disaster situations as most of the stricken regions could not now be reached.

Now, very little aid can reach them, and therefore they have to make the best of it among themselves, until aid comes to them. Emperor Vivian knows the whole mobilization nation is suffering from the effects of the terrible misfortune. There are many that are homeless even now that can not be reached by any rescuers within weeks and no telling how many are ill. Of course it would take a hundred million men to describe the situation as it really is. If it was not so far so much communications being cut off Emperor Vivian would have some hope, because never before in real history was there such a mobilization of troops troops. But the effects of the disasters are going to hinder the movements of those Christian dog armies a great deal, at least we'll see that they do. We'll see to it that they will not be able to move heads headway in the face of such an awful situation, and our side too will call in our powerful all efforts to frustrate the advance of these newly formed buldog armies. The main difficulty these dirty Christian dog troops would have is met with would also be from the ever increasing forest fires which is burning all around in that dire direction, and which we have set by fire bombs. Therefore the difficulties, the results of the floods and force of the explosions made the conditions impossible in many places and other localities flood waters not only still remain but increase, and if the floods can be traversed by boats it would be with great and immeasurable difficulty. Many thousands of railroad lines are wiped out, all other roads are not passable and many parts of forests are burned probably for all time into impassable swamps. How many are mobilized and how many are mobilizing the Emperor is never able to find out. Of what he knows he only learned through major de mayor details that came to him by couriers one swift launch, or brought by aeroplane. But he knows the whole nation is mobilization, and so do we. And we are nation in the wide world has ever mobilized in this fashion.

30,000,000 men are being mobilized in this fashion. In a few weeks we are getting ready for army service. In a few months time there are quite a number of them.

All these are mobilized already and still they are coming faster, and faster. It is a mobilization through and by the whole nation wholeheartedly throughout the whole country such as never seen anywhere before, and yet Emperor Vivian does not take heart. He has not got any, but only a pumping station in his breast. Yet he feels sure.

But the war is in favor of us, for he claims that evidence seems to show it to be a great deal. Our own side he says seem to be in full possession of the devastated states of Abbelesia except in the extreme south. Yet we hear if it had not been for general Richard Kindermine, and General Vivian, we would also be in possession of Angolians and other states. To begin with Emperor Vivian has made up by his own and carefully selected list of every disaster from early 1912 to June 1st, 1913 with the purpose when the opportunity presented itself of having them published throughout the country with the intention of raising the nation as the nation has never been aroused before. Many might have thought that that because of the disasters and their effects that the great Emperor would be very angry and also

But just now it was not so. He was too mortified, too apprehensive, to be angry. He was too sorrowful, too worried to be angry. The situation caused by this awful disaster gave him cause more for alarm and despair than an a for anger. If he would against us who are known as a dreadful foe. But as has been stated before, as far as it seemed every flood had aroused all evidence and clues as to the origin of the frequent explosion like explosions, and therefore we have made investigations, and am still doing it; the Scientists are doing anything however, found no traces of any I could clue to prove who were responsible for the record breaking calamities. We will not deny we did cause the fires and explosions, but will not take blame for the floods, as we had no intentions, we thought of floods to be made, but we did not know we were making gods of the likes of the greatest two gods in the world, and we are making gods of the likes of the greatest two deities known which has on record. His purpose to use them is, to have them kept in the Governmental Records, and to spread them throughout the Country. The list your Excellency are as follows:

Excelsior, are as follows:

The first disaster written against the town of Virginia occurred with the beginning of the first century of the present century, with terrific floods occurring through an unknown cause. For the first greatest disaster much could be written about Highlands County and city, where an enormous loss of life and property was sustained. Beyond comparison, as coming in the beginning of the century, it brought more deaths than from drowning. Though not so unusual in magnitude as the bigger disasters coming afterwards, the cold wave and the blizzard of 1892-93 brought more deaths than any other disaster in the history of the town. No unusual in magnitude as the bigger disasters coming afterwards, the cold wave and the blizzard of 1892-93 brought more deaths than any other disaster in the history of the town. No unusual in magnitude as the bigger disasters coming afterwards, the cold wave and the blizzard of 1892-93 brought more deaths than any other disaster in the history of the town.

The first disaster on record.

It is the most frightful disaster on record.

Of cities and towns destroyed. Nine hundred thousand lives lost.
 4th... November 13th 1912... Devastating fire and explosion destroys Scheldadert and Perryville. Loss of life too great to be estimated. Only six hundred bodies recovered. Floods follow from Lake Solito. One of first most severe breaking disasters, and the most frightful of all disasters combined, because of the intense suffering it caused.

3th, May 1th to September 3th 1918. -- Forest fires from starting point in Watson and Del Norte Counties in southeastern California, downstate three thirds of the state.
Loss in property believed beyond immeasurable figures. Fire still raging. Cedars are wind but has holler and attack. Irregular third burned.

4th June 1913. Date not given. Explosions destroys dam at Arronburgs gun 30 civil reported wiped out, and Angelina Agathia suffers immensely. Probably worst flood in southern California. Never receded as flood continued with rain relieving waters from other loss of life immeasurable but not known. Property loss unestimated but dreadful. Very towns swept away. Part of Jessica destroyed. One third of the city of Big Girl Knoll wiped out.

5th June 1918. Date not given..... Bengall county, and also Bengall, Herdwick, Jackson, Lucille, and Mic-Holleston states of Calaveras. Damage done by the disaster this quarter or more of Calaveras, not including the area swept away by huge flood, Mic-Holleston Sta., and through Jackson Lucille and Bengall county. The raging seas. Abbeville, in Jackson state, wiped out, Heidt Junction, Calaveras Proper and scores of big cities swept away. Mic-Holleston State suffers the worst. The other cities known in the latter states are Vignon, The Dove, El Verde, El Pozo, El Paso, Jackson, and Jackson cities, Santa Antonio, Mandro, Mildred Greenburg, Maruanna, and a Lucille, and Jackson cities. At Santa cities wrecked with terrible loss to property and loss of life. Next to Abbeville, Mildred Greenburg and Angelina Agathia cities and Logn of life. Next to Abbeville, Mildred Greenburg and Angelina Agathia cities. Girl Knool, and Heidt Heidt Junction suffers the most. Heidt Junction, suffering the lead. A record breaking loss of life with Abbeville and Mildred Greenburg. Some of Bengall County also but few bodies recovered. Property of all cities swept off the map. Total population totally wiped out, with Mic-Holleston state ground off the map. Total population of Jackson state wiped out. Heidt Heidt Junction, Angelina, Santa wiped out. Delight's junction near Virian Wickey swept down with the torrent to merge into wreckage into a like expanse of the flood. Three sections of Angelina State wrecked in a flood, which increases the others then still raging. Great flood is increased by September bursting all the dikes of the Arroyos River, and the water is wiping at Angelina Agathia. flood is devastating Angelina junction, Gertrude, Angelina and Maruanna cities.

8th. From June to August the other sufferers from drought, explosion, flood and fire, Tomsall, Matlock counties, northeastern California, Gadsby, Christian and Clallam Counties and John, Inyo, Kern, Los Angeles, Monterey, Plumas, Siskiyou and Kearl and Alameda counties. Also in southwestern California, Kern, Inyo, Mono, and Shasta, Butte, Colusa, Contra Costa, El Dorado, Fresno, Humboldt, Imperial, Mariposa, Mendocino, Merced, Modoc, Nevada, Placer, Plumas, San Bernardino, San Diego, Santa Barbara, Santa Clara, Santa Cruz, Stanislaus, Tehama, Trinity, Tulare, Yuba, and Yavapai counties. Also in northern California, Alameda, Contra Costa, Fresno, Kern, and Los Angeles counties which also suffered immensely. Other places to suffer were Headrick city, Coast line of Angelina state, Mendocino, Plumas, and springs of Monument County, also, Martinique city, and northern Angelina from the increase known loss of life in all the disasters not counting Abbeville, is said to be over 5,275, 1894.

It is probable that Emperor Vivian will profit by publishing the list of these masters throughout the country. The country is so small that it is sure will arouse the nation. Africa, Asia, and it can be secured so when it is printed and illustrated in new newspapers, books, and even magazines, while he studies the papers and their effects, Emperor Vivian cannot understand how they could be so innocent. He knows he would give anything to know the loss of life at the Lake Sebilida flood. He knows the Arronburg Run and Bengali County Country horror. He knows that the loss of life has been dreadful. Of course, big fires, in the flood wreckage created most of his victims and the flood carried the rest to the sea. As the region was and is for some impossible to explore a check up on the missing cannot be taken.

And while, I conclude, conclude Your Excellency, I must warn you that the Vivian Princesses have sent a party known as Sir Walter Starring to explore and investigate the region. I advise you to stop him before it is too late.

Your Assistant Commander.
General Richard Herdrude

SHOWING HOW, AND WITH WHAT RESULTS THE GIRLS GO TO UNDERSTOOD TO MAKE OUT THE CIPHER NOTE.

Are spying work and scouting always as agreeable as some people thing think they are? Are these kind of adventures even far apart. Or do they not in some cases go hand in hand? These questions rose in the minds of Violet, and her sisters full many a time during the days that followed their first entrance into the Glandelinian camp, after the reading of that letter almost disco discouraged them. Nearly all the child scouts, with the aid of the Geminis, and all who had followed them secretly into the camp in their first main attempt greatly to the unmy annoyance of many Glandelinian generals and other officers--were making first within this Glandelinian camp but secretly brave of forts to go to Holy Communion every day, and then to do everything possible to find out all violet, and her sisters were sacrificing for and constantly on if not in any consequence there was more of silvery laughter, more loveliness among them, more happy faces among the child slaves than ever before.

Violet, and her sisters did not think of questioning them. Of course in the matter of this kind of spying work, Violet, and her sisters with Gertrude Angeline, Angelina Riches, Jennie Turner, and Graedelina, appeared to lead all the rest, but the same was true of their shrewdness.

On one morning, which was turning out to be an unusually quiet day, the girls in separate partners, went from general Manley's headquarters to Federal's, from Federal's headquarters back to Manley's and then da capo. A man who did not know who they were, and what they were doing, would suppose they were Glandelinian girls scouts doing their own duty and helping the Glandelinian generals to mediate mischief against the Christ Christian armies, Radcliffe, and Penrod were two disturbed boys for several days. It seemed impossible for them to accomplish which charaxed them during scouting hours an attempt be it said, which completely increased once they were in desperate earnest in which they became known as the doom demon scouts.

Penrod had not yet got rid of his awe for the outcome of a real stirring adventure. The actions, of violet, and her sisters, and their followers, presented to Penrod and Radcliffe all the glory and mystery of mystic adventures. None none of the girl had not been slow to discover the boys point of view in this regard, and Violet and her sisters were prompt to avail themselves of what opportunities it presented. Penrod and Radcliffe belonged to Gertrude's staff, at the time they were really working for Violet, and her sisters.....

On returning from a prolonged visit at a general or a Glandelinian general's headquarters Graedelina, ably assisted by Gertrude Angeline, Violet and her sisters, and Jennie Turner took the strange code in hand with usual vivacity and characteristic energy assisted by the two boys, Angelina Riches who acted as guard was able to follow the proceedings almost completely.

"Penrod" began Violet "What is that of the code you are reading or trying to make out?"

"It's a puzzle of nine intersecting leaves of the tributaries of the Mic-Hollesier Run River," said Penrod raising his head, and then dropping it again. "It seems to be related to that six or seven big page letter you have been reading from general Brinestone or Vivianstainer, Vivianstine, or whatever his name is."

Then he and the girls were interested in this section of the code, there was a good deal of clues leading to something here, in particular of the part of the code he was trying to make out.

"Do you notice," said Gertrude in a very loud whisper. "How Penrod really makes out codes so easily. He guesses himself to find like a boy who understands all codes and cipher dispatches. That's the way my sister Anna used to read out cipher dispatches," she added, as she noticed Radcliffe look at her queerly.

"And just as added Graedelina. "There's something good here that I'd like to make out myself. See how he is concentrating himself, as he is trying to learn its contents. The Professional Professional boyscout finally dropped the code raised his eyes, and finding that the princesses and the girls scouts were considering the code and his work in it with great interest and great record record or great regard, smiled with satisfaction.

"The officer who had this, I can suppose did not even know who took it," continued Graedelina in the same low whisper. "It was a risky effort for Angelina Riches," commented Gertrude. "You'd never think any one would have the nerve to secure it. You'd think the general would be afraid of letting anything remain outside his desk, for fear of Christian spies and other agents. Anyhow I'd think so."

"Perhaps he was careless," Violet, observed.

"The general is so grouchy that he even does not know how to smile," declared Angelina Riches. "Maybe he is afraid of letting himself go for fear he might put big fissures into his face or split into it into all odds of shapes."

"Perhaps it's his early nature," Gertrude observed.

"When he is excited he reddens in the face naturally enough doesn't he?" said Jennie Turner.

"What has his surely nature got to do with it?" Jennie inquired.

"But who is the general?" asked Jennie.

"You know him well enough," said Angelina Riches. "He is very familiar with you, and you are very familiar with him."

"I cannot recall who he is, is he Manley?"

"No."

"Who is he then? Speak up. Don't keep us in suspense suspense please please."

"He's as of the highest generals of all," said Angelina Riches.

"I'll bet he is general Bisknell," said Angelina Vivian.

"No, he is general Raymond Richardson Fer Federal. He has a beard about a foot long his face looks like that of Beelzebub and he wears long hair."

"Oh so you took the nerve to raid his headquarters?"

"Yes, and I was thinking," Angelina Riches made answer "of part of a comic song I and another girl used to sing. It brought a crowd among and around us around us at any a time."

"Sing it."

There was a grouchy old man wearing an old night gown.

Which in color was brilliant in defile.

His face was so painted and a g ugly.

He thought it a secaloge to smile,

He put on a new face (False)

Covered with noodles long tender, and to grace.

He was then afraid to smile even a little,

For fear his face would change to brittle.

He sang like a tea kettle,

Made all his friends rattle

And return to him the old night gown.

And called him the ugliest of all beyond the town.

I saw him coming down the street one day,

They thought him a horse looking for his meal of hay, speaking of him, a acquaintance asked him to smile, smile,

If he did, a frog would have stretched his face a mile,

His name no one would dare to utter,

Unless from laugh laughing so hard, some one would smother,

Yet he was a man of a great big show,

Looking like a big Hippopotamus that looks at you to blow,

And yet he is the mu most meaneest of all men,

To look at him he thinks would be a grievous sin,

To ask him for a single dime,

He would claim all is "Mine."

Suddenly Penrod having discovered something important threw himself back in his chair and looked almost as dazed as he really was.

"Penrod" cried Violet, and her sisters "what did you discover?"

"Please girls take up the code again. Now go on at this point,--no, no--here--no there violet, on here I say, yes, yes that's it."

The girls were almost hypnotized by what he helped them to trace, and by what he explained. He then raised the code about two inches even with his light so that all could see it, and moving his finger indicated something they all understood. The girls gave the code ten minutes of their valuable time pointing out that if ever they could capture the originator of the dispatch, it would stand them in good stead, but after present circumstances it was entirely impossible to apprehend him, showing how difficult it was to bring the subject to a realization. Also Violet herself pointed out that if they were over to be successful the capture of such dispatch codes and the like probably stood them in good stead, but after these present circumstances if they couldn't make better progress than this, their staying in this way so long would be entirely unnecessary showing them how much more dangerous it was and will be to bring the adventure to too slow a termination instead of quickly accomplishing their purpose and along too much blunder to make them withdraw from the camp unsuccessful in their undertaking which as Gertrude candidly remarked "wouldn't help the cause any."

One of the Vivian Girls (Jennie) went into the inner tent, and left the two boys at the rest, as no one could have noticed with no little amusement sedulously endeavoring to make a final success in solving the cipher dispatch. On returning from the inner tent, Jennie, for it was she, took up the dispatch again, first Graedelina uncertain whether it contained anything of the clues of the flood, they were after and relieving favorable indications that it might at that--expressed themselves as being quite satisfied.

"Penrod" she then went on, "Do you know, or do you catch on that and what it reads is?"

"Maybe it says, general you are a Gawkde-awk," said Riches.

"No," said Penrod "with a wink of an eye, and a slight smile." "Do

"Does it mean he is something good to eat?"

Every one smiled at this joke.

"If he is, I'll eat him," said Radcliffe.

"No I don't think he is good to eat," said Angelina Riches decidedly. "Any way a person who might be responsible for these disasters is worse than a rotten fish and not fit for wolves to feast upon."

"What does these words and numbers mean?" "?????" asked Penrod.

"It means that the general who is to receive the long letter Angelina Riches must communicate with general Johnston Manley and his staff as soon as possible. It is certainly a clue about the flood. You made a lucky find that time when, but it had been better if you had not found that letter. Such an insulting correspondence. "Did you read it Riches before you brought it?"

 "Yes. It was beautiful, beautiful words. I'd have like to throw pepper into that man's eyes for such a letter."

Riches then read the other articles which they made out as—

"YOU DON'T STAND RIGHT——YOU DON'T SIT RIGHT, YOU DON'T WALK RIGHT——AND YOU DON'T CARRY YOUR HEAD ON YOUR HAND."

Penrod who had risen smiled for he too appeared to guess the words.

"There you are," exclaimed Gracedelina. "We are in possession of the best code ever secured. And with the most difficult puzzle I ever saw."

"You'd think," apostrophized Gertrude Angeline, "That the writer was insulting the general to whom it was sent. Penrod when you make it all out, let us know but let don't let yourself go too quick."

For thirty three minutes Penrod alone took great patience in his efforts, and Radcliffe helped him. He walked up and down the tent for ten minutes, paying most particular attention to the strange words. Also the girls gave him a few tips, on how to study it out. "Tip!" Violet calmly observed which would clear the mystery of the code, which would keep others from thinking they would give up the adventure, "which to do," she continued, "we certainly are not."

Before he was through Gracedelina marked with little slips of paper some dozen strange words of her own but in English with Violet's help, something in answer which she took from the code, and enjoined Radcliffe to rewrite four copies of each, one for herself, and one for Violet, the other two for Radcliffe, specifying carefully the size of the paper to be used, the color, and the amount of margin and spacing—all this to be done as soon as possible against their return, as they had determined to go out and make a tour. And when they did return after an unusually long time in coming back the rewritten codes down in Radcliffe's best best style were awaiting them. All of the girl scouts were loud in their expressions of delight and thanks, indeed they were so pleased that they must bring them to be approved by Violet, and her sisters.

Of course in the face of such enthusiasm, the Vivian Girls in turn felt bound to examine them with a certain degree of suspicion. In the next tent room, made it in their judgement was worth while prolonging this examination. Their eyes were on the written pages, but their ears and whole attention were absorbed in the speaker without.

"Penrod" came the voice of Gertrude. "Is it true that by discovering this note you and Radcliffe could take the chances to follow general Vivianstien and his staff over to their headquarters and if not observed or detected would conceal yourself in a room to see or find out whether this general knows something about the flood or not?"

"Yes, but I hope we can get the information."

"And could you follow Gracedelina's boyscouts to see whether they really acted suspicious and seem like other soldiers?"

"No, it's futile, no one can ever do it. Those boyscouts would die or kill themselves before telling a thing."

"Many say it can be done."

"No it is not true, it's a lie. It cannot be done without evidence against them." "Don't be too sure Penrod, it's hard enough to stand for further failure. Once you did a thing and was successful, why, didn't you stay so long at Manley's headquarters once, that you learned heaps of information and stayed there acting like a halfwit to throw off suspicion when a lieutenant colonel came in and told you to get out and go home saying to you 'Your Mama wants you Hazel'?"

"Oh gee that was it. And I remember telling that colonel that some one had been stuffing me with bad news. I didn't look to see what general Manley was doing as I had no chance. At that time there were no other officers around, but the soldiers were as watchful as cats."

"Penrod" continued Gertrude. "Was it not also true when general Manley came within with your reach the second time—you took something out of his pocket, which your success in securing was a value to our cause?"

"That's another fact," cried Penrod excitedly. "I never thought such a thing would happen."

"They are certainly well done," Violet said now, "that the dialogue had come to an end," and the copies are copies are very beautiful."

Gracedelina previous to her departure for another part of the camp, waited on Violet, and her sisters.

"Princess would you mind my having the use of your tent to-morrow night from six until near time for taps?"

"I think it can be arranged."

"Oh it is arranged."

"Indeed."

"Yes Gertrude knows all about it, and the others. And Princesses, will you and your sisters come too, Gertrude and I have a surprise for you."

"I and they will be on hand but alone."

"Oh but you and your sisters must not be alone Princesses. My girl scouts will be there, and Jennie Turner, and Angeline Riches, with the rest, and many other boy and girl scouts who helped us so far in our work."

However through some mishap Violet and her sisters were somewhat late, and it was at about five minutes after half past six that they entered the tent, and took their seats between Angeline Riches, and the two boyscouts. There were fully two hundred and fifty nine boy and girlscouts present, all evidently expecting something unusual. Gertrude Angeline and Gracedelina were not to be seen. Scarcely had Violet and her sisters seated themselves, when they realized it might be some sort of a performance. Angeline Riches struck a tune, and then there appeared from behind a curtain, Gertrude and Gracedelina. They wore beautifully and modestly attired in Glandelinian and girl scout uniforms, one could see by their costumes, that they were naturally secured, the two girls all radiant in smiles made the famous cursey Violet say, and in their own language. It was the song of a flood disaster well known of the Yubah River, and was sung with emotion, and a feeling that stirred all who heard it.

It had variations. And yet so grand and thrilling was it withal that it gave hints of the floods really raging. Also it did express the stirring and poetical of flood gotten from books, followed by the old fairies, and innocent dances, other song numbers, cream and cake, allowed the entertainers to change their costumes, and then for fully an hour they held all within the tent spell bound with a good long lecture printed on a white screen, and a moving picture of the war and its devastations. Every one was intensely interested, no so much as Penrod and also Radcliffe. The latter was absorbed. "Gosh" he observed to Violet often. "I wish I could get up a show like this."

"That's now Princesses" cried Gracedelina as the girls at the end rushed out, and Violet hand "How you know why we were always having our secret meeting. We got this show just to please you, and inspire our little followers. Oh Darlings of the Nation were you not pleased?"

"I and my sisters certainly were, and so were my sisters. It was all of it very, very beautiful, very graceful. It was—the dancing especially—on how it fairly flew," that we all intently exclaimed Gracedelina, great delight on her expressive face. "That's what we should act as and live like angels, Grace. You Gertrude ought to be the head angels of the spy series, and you Gracedelina, are the angel of the christian series."

"I cried Angeline Riches "You've given me a capital bit of matter for advertising the cause. Now don't let this be a leading girlscouts, the lightfoot angels of the National Abbiecannon army. There's a inspiration to bring many more scouts to our standard."

"Angeline Riches" said Gertrude "Went over all our work, and we didn't miss anything. And Princesses, Gracedelina, and Jennie Turner, taught me lots of code lessons."

"They were apt pupils," commented Angeline Riches. "I've never seen any girl scout to whom learning comes so natural. For instance, she learned a lower tongue in her first lesson. This is well enough for Gracedelina now, but we must all finish out our mission and get away from the camp before our true identity is discovered. And the forest fire is coming closer you know."

"Say Princesses" said Penrod as they all went out into the Company Street "It was great."

Before going on duty, Gertrude and Gracedelina made much of bidding Violet and her sisters farewell. They were all gratitude and good will, which I the reader may add remained unchanged to this day. Toward eight o'clock of the morning about a day later, Violet alone happened to be passing general Manley's headquarters on her return from some supposed duty when Radcliffe who was coming out of the rear entrance accosted her.

"Princess," he began have you "Have you noticed anything strange about general Manley lately?"

"Beyond the fact that he carries his head high, and walks or rides as if he had the world in his domain I can't say that I have."

"Well come in, but be very careful as you do it, and just take a peep in the council room, but look out for the guards."

First seeing that the way was perfectly clear the two went up the rear steps on tip toes. The darkness of morning, had on account of the thickness of unusual clouds not diminished to twilight, and therefore fortunately they were still in the dark. The council room however was just then illuminated by five large burning kerosene candles which Manley had raided from a church, and which candlesticks stood on a large table.

Radcliffe and Violet could therefore see through the glass aperture in the center of the door without Manley seeing them, and they were so much in the dark, that if a guard passed by they would be unobserved, and strangely there was no guard about. General Manley had placed a large paper on the square table, and was standing in a position which to their untrained gaze gave Violet the impression that he had been working on it all night. There was a comic scene to this however. Holding one hand over the paper in a gesture intended to express that he feared it would slide off the general sat down on the floor. Recently he had placed his coat and some other articles on the back of his chair and it had noiselessly tipped over backwards, without the general's knowledge. Hence the queer accident. Speaking words not found in any prayer book the general arose, and it was easy to tell from the expression on his face, but only from the expression that to let him see you laughing at him was suicide.

Violet and Radcliffe felt perfectly sure also from the recent expression on his face that something very important was to be concerned about that paper. Was it something something of the flood? Violet was determined to secure it at any risk. She gave Radcliffe instructions. The general had changed his position position by this time and whenever on occasion he swung around he looked as ecstatic as a stange girl dancing the highland fling. He wore spectacles, more like the people of the rich do, one of those one eyed kind, which you hold by the hand, and also had a pair over his eyes.

Radcliffe was sneaking into the room from another quarter, but he had thrown a dark gray hood over his head. He changed his hiding place from time to time, and when the general would look around, the lad hid himself behind aavenport. Encouraged by his success, Radcliffe undertook to creep slowly toward the table, in which stood a lamp. He was bound to say he was unusually successful. Radcliffe began to smile. He waited, hiding under the table, until the general would arise again. His opportunity soon came.

The general intoxicated by his success stood up, and Radcliffe from under the table made the chair tip back. The general however stood for nearly ten minutes, studying the map more carefully, then he used a colored crayon to mark something on it. The general then sat suddenly down, flat on his back with a wallop to the floor the crash as he fell shaking the room, and the loud imprecations as well. There should have been a fractured skull but as a matter of fact there was nothing of the sort. Though violet had to stop her ears with her hands to keep out the "beautiful words" Menley was using. Radcliffe, seeing an overcoat hanging near the table had thrown it over Menley's head, and then quickly grasped the paper off the table, and then as the general's general's imprecations and curses broke more from control, Radcliffe turned quickly put out the lights with good blows of his breath, and before the general could arise to his feet, or adjust his eyes to the scene, as it was a little lighter outside now, or to even think of organizing a pursuit, both Radcliffe and Violet were gone.

In the meantime Gertrude Angeline and others remembering experiences of times gone by were warning their followers of where fire storm warnings were issued by some Glandelinian signal stations which said that a forest fire now southeast of the camp may strike anytime without warning. The camps southward were preparing to move but Manley's still remained. Yet the artillery men all along the river action were stretched in their batteries from St Augustine junction to Fort Andrew were ready all their munitions and explosives, sending on their munition wagons, and making away as fast as possible all objects as would be exposed to disaster from any fire that might come.

However no winds of greater than most ordinary velocity were reported, and barometer readings were about normal. From the Evangeline St. Claire district however by wireless through Glandelinian signal stations in the southern camps of Glandelin, and Federal, besides Blairbreadth harryes, came a story of hot winds of gale force sweeping the eastern fringe of the forests there during the morning before, and that a sea of fire was within fifty miles of the city and general. Aivane christian army was moving. Barometer readings were under normal, and fires were reported raging at plu Eleuthera and River Harbor towns.

Wind velocity beyond there was given as fifty six miles an hour. The fire gales rose early however however indicating the fire horror was raging left to the district.

At Titus River near the center of the area, where the signal stations reports said the conflagration might come closest the following morning, the barometer reading was still normal, but evidently showing signs of about to drop. About forty miles of Evangeline St. Claire in the far northern fringe of the threatened territory, the glass rose five points in the early evening, but the region was heavy with a fog of rose fire points in the early evening, but the region was heavy with a fog of smoke and the weather was 114 heat in the shade. Fort Andrew on the southerly edge had made a drop of four points since seven thirty in the evening, but late at night signal station officers said it showed slight indications of rising.

THE FIRST TIME, IN WHICH VIOLET AND HER SISTERS LOSE THEIR TEMPER. WHAT CAME OF THEIR OUTBURST.

Perrod one hot hot sultry morning (temperature unusually high for so late in September and morning mind you 110 in the shade) appearing in the tent entrance of the Vivian Girls looked very sleepy, heavy and downcast as if he was about to be hanged for a very serious crime.

"Why what's the matter Perrod?" Violet inquired, on noticing his condition, and rising to her feet, as she noticed that he still paused at the entrance.

"Violet I did not hardly sleep for three nights. I was even up late last night." "Oh you were? Writing Autumn Autumn poems to Jennie Turner, your first of girls friends?"

"No violet, what I was doing gave me no chance to write poetry. I discovered disappointing news at general Manley's headquarters near Company M Street, and I went down there."

"Were any of your boyscout friends down there with you?"

"Violet, I was there alone, and learned everything. Angelina Agathia is not the center of it, this worst flood on record. Thousands of cities and towns are devastated down there. Your fathers palace is destroyed, and he and your mother are refugees. The situation is more terrible than the statements in that letter Angelina piches took from Manley's headquarters. And this terrible darkness is caused by immense forest fires terrible beyond description, and a million are fighting it in vain. Here's the news that tell all about it."

"The only glanced at the headlines, and then set down on the nearest chair. Angels and main ministers of heavenly Grace defend us," quoted violet, and her sisters in one chorus.

"What's that Princesses?"

"Did you overhear any conversation about it from Manley, and his generals?" asked Jennie.

"No Princess I did not get the chance."

"What did you do?"

"I secretly read a bullet bulletin, while I sang a song."

"You did? What was it?"

"When Johnny comes marching home."

"No, no not the song, I mean what did you read on the bulletin?"

"A short detail of the great disaster."

"Perrod, do you mean to tell me that you had the nerve to appear before a crowd of the highest ranked Glandelinian officers and bawl out to them the song 'When Johnny comes marching home, while you read the astonishing news on the bulletin?'"

"Please, Princess Jennie that's all the further I got."

"What happened? Did you break down, or run from them?" asked Angeline.

"No Princess I did not break down, but the officer known as General Pugnose, (General Raymond Richardson Federal) was there, and he bellowed at me 'Stop that singing through your nose you teakettle' another said 'No he ain't coming back sweetheart', and another officer there whose face looked like a hot water bottle with warts on it, shouted 'Cut it out you saxophone' and things I don't want to say, and then every one of the other officers began to raise a fuss, a laughing, a snickering, and then, and then—"

"Well what then Perrod?"

"Princess I got that newspaper."

"How did it go it?" they all asked at once...

"I bought it, go it?"

"How was it done Perrod?"

"Princess there was a number of soldiers selling newspapers. I bought that from him. But Perrod, what possessed you to take part in such a move. Didn't you know it was very dangerous?"

"I didn't know that Princess princess. To try me Gertrude Angeline dared me. And besides there was so much excitement among the officers I wanted to see what was wrong. Besides there had been rumors of an enormous kind of flood, fire and explosion disaster combined, and as opportunities were offered for the best news, I thought I might read or hear of it. There was a great big fellow in front of me, who had a long walking stick with a golden edged crook at the end. He was uniformed as if he wanted to appear on a dress up stage. He was the one known as general 'mash-in-the-head'."

"But Perrod dear, don't you know that at these times, it is not very nice of you without our knowledge to go on such a dangerous adventure, that we do not ask you to go where we do not dare to go? Don't you know that these Glandelinian generals are very dangerous? Don't you know that your affairs might leak out to these disrespectful generals? Don't you know that you are very likely to be suspected and thrown into a prison tent?"

"Princess I did not know anything about it. But I'll not do it again without your advice."

"I should not like to see any of my best boyscouts going too near those dangerous Glandelinian generals. A wise boy and girl scout keeps out of sight of such generals. We take ourselves. And good a spy as you are Perrod, you are still an amateur you know. Your eyes always come up great worry, and for your safety we did not intend to let you know our purpose so you would not follow us here and yet you found out and came. And respectable boy and girl scouts obey their best friends wisely you know, and do not go anywhere without permission."

"Girls" said Perrod, "Angelina Agathia and poor Dorothy Gale cities was devastated by an expl. explosion and flood, and all aid to them and the whole flood district is totally cut off by the awful forest fires. All the outside states cannot render them any aid. All communication whatever is cut off. The whole nation is jeopardized. There are no news can come from Angelina Agathia. She is isolated entirely. Disaster strikes us all in the face, and the forest fire is fifty miles from here."

"What?" cried the girls jumping to their feet...

"It's true. And from the explosion shocks the cities acted as if they danced the highland fling. Then they got the full brunt of the floods, and Angelina Agathia was the first prize of being the center of the flood horror. And it is reported that the disaster is growing worse every day."

For a moment Violet, and her sisters felt sick and giddy. Had Penrod thrown rocks at them, or struck them in the face with his fists, and then kicked them while they lay prostrate he could not have astonished them more. Angelina Agathia, the Abbeinnian Holy City in the grasp of the worst Abbeinnian flood because of the onemy. Angelina Agathia the city in which they whom they had desecrated, their own home town, and whom they had hoped as the nation's main stronghold, presenting herself the victim of the worst disaster on all record with the greatest destruction of her property, and the sister city with all her mobilization camps Dorothy Gale squally affected affected. And the Emperor's beautiful palace gone, and their own home too. It was incredible.

"Penrod" said Catherine, looking at him as if she thought he was out of his head, "are you sure you know what you are talking about?"

"Yes, indeed. If you doubt me, read the paper."

One did, and so did her sisters. Then a great anger surged through them. "Penrod, get Gertrude Angeline, or any one to come here at once." Saying, which the Vivian Girls entered the inner tent and fell to brooding. Had it been the echo of the past disasters only, Violet, and her sisters could not have been more char chagrined. The past christian successes had raised such high hopes in them, and now by this main disasters they were all dashed to the ground. They had come here to learn the cause of the past disasters, to find out who were responsible for them, the plans of their making and so on, and now they receive the news of this great exceedingly great disaster increasing ten fold in the flood horrors. Appearing to confide in christian successes, the situation of the war had deceived them. It looked indeed as if the enemy had the Four Aces. Honest indignation, grief apprehension, and that pitiful thing we call self love, and fear for the welfare of their nation united w to fill their hearts with what was little less than black rage.

Jennie Turner presently entered. She came in with her usual smile, but on seeing Violet's face, those of her sisters, and the glaring headlines of the newspaper lying on the table, became very grave, she was clearly as frightened as they.

"I see by your looks Jennie dear," Violet said very bitterly "that you now realize yourself without being told, what a wicked thing, what a cowardly, contemptible thing the Glandelinians have done."

"Yes Princess I do," assented Jennie, a look of pitiful dejected deprecation coming on her face.

"There's no need then," continued Violet herself with almost a sneer on her face "for us to enlarge upon the feature upon it. Such actions on the part of ignorant pagan nations in this world—especially any nation that knows not God or civilization—would amaze me and my sisters, to put it mildly very much, but coming from the authorities of a nation like Glandelinia, and in such a shocking manner, when she knows it a crime and not warfare—it's—its intolerable and beyondstanding for it's shocking even to the world and scandalous..." Voice paused. But Jennie said nothing. The child scout impressed greatly was struggling to keep back the tears and so could not speak, but she too was filled with black rage. Her silence of course Violet and her sisters could interpret rightly as the way with all of us when others take our sides when some one offends us. Violet was looking at her, and thought she too looked sullen. Violet's anger grew stronger as she then said:

"I trusted you in everything Jennie, and I know I can depend on you again. I want you to secretly flash news of the disaster to general Vivian, and if any one tries to interfere do your gun play without hesitation. We have been deceived again as to the safety of our southern states, and general Vivian MUST act to stop these disasters and SHALL."

Jennie was now weeping but Violet, and her sisters were too far gone to take notice. "Jennie" said Violet herself "didn't expect anything like that from Glandelinia, and I don't see how our governments can allow such things to go on without hindrance for us again. Now you may go and send the signal to general Vivian, and may you try hard to give all the news possible. Jennie Turner our nation must strike, strike it never did before."

Jennie Turner and gave an appealing glance and waited to hear more, but not so. Any person in a rage is a fool, but in all probabilities, Violet, and her sisters were exceptions.

"You may go now Jennie," Violet said, and Jennie left the Vivian Girls to darkness of heart. It was to be for them a busy morning, they were to leave in the forenoon for a three days stay in a neighboring Glandelinian encampment, and so pulling themselves together and not without difficulty banished from their thoughts the wretched episode the news brought them. Yet throughout all the business of code letter writing which they were to slip to some of their followers leaving camp for the christian lines, and relieving callers there was deep down in their hearts a feeling of utter misery, a sense of grave danger menacing the nation, of wrong and injustice on the part of the Calvinian government for not taking the most drastic measures to put a stop to these disasters of Glandelinia's making.

A few minutes minutes to twelve, Violet, herself happened to raise her eyes, and noticed on a table in front of her a beautiful bouquet of most beautiful large roses. See and her sisters had even seen them, when they first came into their tent, but had been too disturbed over the surprising news to give them any attention. Now for the first time Violet observed a card attached to the vase. Violet herself arose and with languid interest gave it an examination.

Mich.

It was a most dainty card, and the writing was done with exceeding care. Then as she read it, and still remembered the bad news, her heart grew heavy as iron.

"To the Vivian Girl Princesses.

With great and sincere love.

From Jennie Turner. and all the rest..."

The child scouts, facing dangers of every kind, day after day, sometimes ill fed, to whom ten cents was a fortune, had gathered a bouquet of flowers to show Violet, and her sisters their loyalty, love and gratitude, and with these flowers scattering their fragrance over their heads, Violet and her sisters had received bad news, the like of never before. It seemed ill judged, not right, not even just such unmerciful news should ever reach their ears.

"Penrod," Violet called out, "Go at once to Gertrude's camp and tell her I would like to see Angelina Riches at I.P.M."

The boyscout returned presently.

"Princess Violet, Gertrude says Angelina Riches took a squad with her, and is out investigating the news of the flood. Angelina Jennings took sick when she heard the news, and Gertrude sent her to her camp."

Violet, closed the tent door, and she and her sisters settled down, to make an examination of the news. It was to them like an examination of conscience. Being then thoroughly humbled by the news, Violet, and her sisters were able to see the situation on the clear white light of truth. It was plain to them at once that the southern states of Abbeinnia were in the gravest peril. Glandelinia should be called to order by the whole world. It was plain to them at once that Glandelinia was wicked as to her war for the maintenance of child slavery, cowardly as to her mode of waging it. The whole Abbeinnian Government should get a put a stop to it.

Such a way of Glandelinia waging war, was not to be tolerated. How easy it would be for various other Abbeinnian States had they pointed out to every tribunal the danger of these horrible scenes to continue, the shocking results of such unfair and brutal warfare on the part of Glandelinia. After all Calvernia was but like a child in the hands of a cruel stepmother. The frequentation of these awful record breaking war disasters had drawn the shocked attention of the world, and had Abbeinnia been more sophisticated, she would have known that this kind of war had its secret dangers. Who could blame Violet, and her sisters for giving a loose to their anger. Their memory from this point went back to past months, and all other disasters that had occurred.

They could recall ten of these worst floods, but they could not recall a single case in which the disaster had brought to Glandelinia the least good, while in all the results had done the most serious harm and caused the christian nation to mobilize with the purpose to crush her at Calvernia.

Coming to the earlier months of 1913 they brought to memory the astonishing horrors of the flood that all but destroyed Abbeinn. These disasters were all as it happened in Calvernia, Angelina, and her sister states the ones whose influence over Glandelinia had never weakened did not at that time suffer though the closest border borders to her with Angelina Agathia and other cities suffered to some extent every time two different flood disasters had extended beyond the districts of Angelina Agathia as had this as one. The news of the Abbeinn horror had given Violet and her sisters hours of misery. The Big Girl Knool and the Lake Solicia floods had almost brought them to abandon the spying vocation they had cherished from the beginning of their experience in the war, and cause them to flee to northern Abbeinnia. Yet a few words of advice from Evans, and they had thanked him and continued on duty all the better for the interview. Violet reflected it is to find means out to carry out designs to bring an end to Glandelinia's folly, or even to her.

It is easy to call to order, to threaten destruction to her armies, it is very difficult to carry it out, to do it right, and here late in the second year of the war with the north of September drawing to a close, Violet and her sisters studied the news with tearful eyes, to see how unlike the past disasters, this combined forest fire, and flood really was.

"Lord Jesus, be merciful to our millions of homeless.

and dying. Help our Holy Cause," she she gasped, and those words as she then uttered them were as good a petition as ever she made for they came from a heart thoroughly humble, grieved, and resigned.

"When I see or find that operator," she finally said "She'll be operating and no mistake. I don't stand no such nonsense."

[illegible]

Bicknell is not like the others—not so brutal at least, and Vivianette might have gone there, to escape us. And I have little doubt that in the course of a week or two he will discover the originator of these awful disasters. He says he'll do anything you say, and you will say it for the success of your cause and mine. In my way, what he goes there he will be kept closer not only of suspicious disguise readers but practically all the more dangerous of glandelinian generals, and there's a member of the Geminis there known as Gingsore, a special friend of mine, and a rescuer of Jennie, who will take his in hand and see that everything he can do will be done. It is possible that Penrod will do his work well as to regards to this plan—in six or seven days or sooner, but he'll go there, there only if you, and your sisters allow him to do so. I believe this new turn in the disaster needs more investigation than those of the past.

Penrod got the permission.

For the next twenty four hours, Violet, and her sisters and the other girl scout leader, Gertrude, were busily engaged in consultation as to ways and means to keep their other followers on their feet without the enemy getting wise to their plans, to such effect that what at first seemed impossible gradually came to appear entirely feasible. To begin with, Gertrude would go out to clean uniforms for generals, and gettings of better plans being a detail which Gertrude Angeline would see to personally. Radcliffe posing as a dumbbell kid, would bring Aldred Maxwell to the rear of Manleys headquarters to cover for her, if she was discovered, and help her to get away. An Angeline pique would be obliged to leave Manleys camp for another, at an early hour, and return late in the evening Jennie Turner was appointed the head of those who remained. Violet excused other girl and boy scouts from drill much earlier, and so it came to pass that apparently Penrod disappeared from the scene of his many days of activity, and the rest of the child scouts entered upon a new order.

Gertrude Angeline was a skilful professional girlspy and never failed. She acted as a waiter for a number of high general officers, and being skilled at this too (having waited upon many christian generals) earned even great reputation among many unsuspecting glandelinian generals. It was not very handsome work, and often she got bawled out, but she was there to secure what violet and her sisters were after, and she was determined to get it for them. Angeline Jennings moreover saw to it that the special girl scout leaders were provided with proper uniform and better provisions. Jennie Turner taking after Gertrude became the "vulture" and Aldred Maxwell developed wonderfully in her own way. In a word no longer lumbered by interfering glandelinian boyscouts, the christian child scouts were becoming free from worry, were well advanced in their work, free from want, well nourished, well uniformed, and it must be stated loving their thrilling work as they did they were nevertheless far happier in the case of their work.

There were no need of anxious vigils day and night (secret vigils) no glimmers broken by the fantastic antics of sentries not asked for or devised. Gradually the wall of difficulty between and the efforts of their undertaking undertaking grew thinner. Yet to obtain further news of the flood, then raging seemed to be nil in vain they tried their hardest, nothing could be done. Evidently the glandelinians did not know themselves. Their apparent influence upon the officers in the matter of choosing to draw them into conversations on the flood however was without result in vain did they pretend to take the disaster as a joke, their arguments lacked force.

Somehow they could not talk to them on the flood question with any satisfaction to themselves themselves. Strong as their arguments were in themselves, the girl and boyscouts realized again and again that in their presentation to the foe officers they were pitifully weak.

In the meantime Gertrude was attracting a great deal of attention in her own work in a as a result of which she did not draw some suspicion upon herself. Therefore she knew she would have to be exceedingly careful, for even if she could get away, all her plans and those of her friends, would be spoiled if she was detected. Her usual attendance every day upon different glandelinian officers of every rank, brought her into contrast with a number of giddy glandelinian generals whom she was quite acquainted with, and they with her. If they recognized her it was a quick gunfire for her to retain her liberty. Her attendance upon these generals she realized she would be better without.

And though generals as they were they looked like effeminate sissy young jackasses, with ears too big for them, and who would bawl like a baby if you even touched them, and yet despite all that sissy faces they were dangerous, and would rather kill themselves than let an enemy escape. So she had to be careful. Also she was called upon to appear in the headquarters of general Federal and his staff more than ever, and he is the one whose term of identification by S Penrod of the man with the face of a hot water bottle with warts on it, though he left out the one foot beard and long bobbed bobbed hair. And this fierce man she had to attend more frequently than ever and when ever he looked at her she thought his eyes would fill her full of holes.

Gertrude never once invited the Vivian girls, or any of her followers to any of these places she went for fear of it ending in disaster. May more than that, they could see that for their safety she did not want them to come.

The fact in connection with some remarks made by several of their disguised geminis Members upon her work as a professional girlscout and spy tempted Violet, and her sisters to suspect that taking the news of the flood in a manner something wanting fires too seriously, Gertrude was now spying on the enemy in a manner something wanting even in a brave man, and that form of her earlier days, and the suspicion was confirmed by various little changes in the girls ways, of dressing, carriage, and the way of wearing her hair. This girl scout so it appeared to them was working furiously in her desperation to bring results, and they to do anything to save her from the risk she was desiring or running into, desired to take her place, and argued on that point with her for hours, but she refused to tell the places she went to, and so they looked on helplessly and prayed to God that the famous girlscout they knew so beautifully sight in this mysterious work not risk terrible dangers unseen. Violet, was signing the quarterly reports of her leading girl and boy scouts one morning and paused with sorrow and dread over Gertrude. In the first quarter the letter E standing for excellent was credited to all her mysterious work. In the second something better than E took the place. And now for the third quarter the letters, M.V.C.E.D.K.L. told of something puzzling though encouraging, and there was also the word in capitals written by her "V I V I A N S T I E H".

"I must have a talk with Gertrude." Violet soliloquised. "She has gone from one dangerous place to another and now she is acting the part of a rash dare devil. She goes into places where I'd dread to approach brave as I am. Late nights, dangerous works, and no rest, God God—where is it to end. Gertrude Angeline is now doing what I, an I and my sisters never dared think of doing—a way anything but safe and reasonable. If I had only known I would have prevented it."

Her reflections were very remorseful. She blamed herself for much of what Gertrude was doing, thinking of which she we felt to imagining such dark episodes in Gertrude's future that she was obliged to check them as rash judgements. Many a prayer she and her sisters had said for Gertrude as she signed her report, she paused to breathe another. The ink was not dry on the paper when Gertrude came in. Violet, called her account. But her influence upon her in the matter of choosing her calling seemed to be in vain. In vain did she reason with Gertrude, her arguments lacked force. Some how she could not talk her out of the spying question with any satisfaction to her self. Wrong Strong as was her arguments were Violet realized her efforts was nil. Gertrude saw no reason for changing her purpose unless she wanted to be a "Quitter." If so all this must abandon the camp. She brought in a note. Violet opened it and read, "Dear

"Dear Dear Princesses,

The night before last I discovered something of great importance, and Jennie Turner on the advice of Angeline Rhoebe sent me to see Radcliffe, and Penrod this morning. Is it asking too much of you, and your sisters, to come down and see me to-morrow. I do so want to see you, for I am to put it through an examination to-morrow afternoon, and the examination is a serious one. Come, violet, and bring your sisters if you can....

Your friend and

gracedelinia also sent a news paper .She forgot to mention it in the note but it had nevertheless come with it.
This is what she read!!!

REGION OF EVANGELINE SIT CLARE SILENT FOR HOURS. IN FOREST FIRE AREA.
GENERAL ANDREW FULLERS ARMY MOVES OFF.

At the last report the fire storm was eighty miles west and south of Evangeline St. Claire region. Near the city the hot winds are gaining in velocity, but the disturbance was reported to be mysteriously either stationary or slowly moving forward. It is expected to come upon Evangeline St. Claire with a rush when it comes, with the region of Evangeline St. Claire being the lower east and west region of Evangeline St. Claire had little information last night as to the center of the fire horror, which signal stations said must strike or might strike Evangeline St. Claire. The night of the morning. The Transit Telegraph station said last night, stated that the fire is in that direction. Other cities within the location of Evangeline St. Clare, from this latently city and gotm, one hundred and ten miles away are ready to fight the fire reported m/c moving upon the Evangeline St. Clare Stream. Also at this time, the Bureau earnings sent by telegraph, telephone, and by messenger, are also wireless reached every rock and corner and gave all ample opportunity to prepare to fight the fire to save their homes and land. To well have preparations been carried out that if the conflagration proves severe, the cities are hoped that a disaster will be averted. Never before has an area threatened by a severe forest fire prepared so carefully to have its populations of the various cities, to give the conflagration battle. The fire storm is however moving very slow northward, its rage of progressiveness so far having slightly decreased since last night, as a slight breeze of wind is blowing from the northeast.

It was Angelina Riches herself who conducted Violet, and her sisters, to the clean interior of the tent where Gracelandia stood at attention, very pale and with lines telling of secret experiences and suffering from fatigue on her face. The work Angelina Riches explained to the girls, claiming that they had been a most nervous and anxious family, but the child's acute physical condition was so good that there had been every hope of her coming out of the peril successfully, and so commencing the work without fail. On seeing Violet, an usher - and her sisters, Gracelandia showed unmistakable signs of joy in her face. "How long has she done sudden perils during adventures, with restraint and seclusion?" "I urged over weeks of hazardous work and restore the older the simpler the better," she said.

In adventures with perils many brave hearts are revolved.
"P Oh Princess Pa and her uncle come to gether and then were flung out tward Violet, first, "this is so kind of you."
"How are you feeling grace, since your adventure?" Violet, asked catching her hand in hers.

"I feel good now that you are here. I have so much wanted to talk to you and Ben sisters."

"If you'll excuse me Princesses I will leave you and your sisters with your friend," said Angeline Riches. "I know she wants to open her heart to you."

"No STAY." Demanded Violet, and her sisters.....
She did, willing.....

She did, willing.....

"I've been thinking a great deal for the past few days about the effort being made by me. All along, deep down in my heart, I felt that I could be equally successful if I try. It hurt me so the day I too heard of, and read that dreadful news, Jennie Turner and she's going to get even with the enemy."

"And it hurt me and my sistern too much, and still hurts. It was only some days after you had left us, that I and my sistern too heard of it. Perrod told us that you had been shot. I felt as if some one had struck us or spoke cruelly to us."

days after you had left us, that I and my children too heard of it and showed us the paper. I felt as if some one had struck us or spoke of it to us. We were awfully angry but we couldn't help it. This disaster business is going too far."

"No, you never told me that Princess."

10. Journal of the American Medical Association, 2000; 283: 2686-2692.

"No, I suppose not, as usual for us that whole affair concerning the flood news has bled everything. And when I and my sisters heard the news, my dear it also made us understand at once that you and your followers were spending all your time in an endeavor to win out for us that we are after. Then the news came to us, I sent for you at once only to learn that you were busy in your love headquarters....."

"But Princeps, California deserves that punishment for not having the levees guarded, or for being too overconfident."

"Perhaps perhaps Governor did deserve those disasters, Grace, for overconfidence. In fact I am sure he did, and the people suffer, and not the government. Yet if the Government had used proper methods, the disasters probably would not have occurred. But I should have spoken to you to be on the lookout for such news, as I heard it once before. Yet it seemed to me like cruel and unkind words to hear someone of the disaster that happened. Very method seemed wrong. Penrod gave me and my sisters an awful shock. I never thought another such flood would occur."

"But" Handolinia also deserves a worst punishment, "folet," I'll tell you and you others how I heard the news. Then I undertook to appear in Kuniyos headquarters, I really didn't think anything wrong gave a common disaster had happened. Yet an I hid away somewhere somewhere I heard the whole conversation. I didn't know at first

When someone mentioned I heard the word "inflation" I said, "What are you talking about?" Still, I felt it was something about an awful increase in an awful disaster, and though the Igloodinium Generac appeared awed by the news they seemed elated however and talked excitedly about it. There was a lot of fear in me as if something most terrible had happened and I was just crazy to hear what it was all about. Still, I felt it was an increase of a big flood at Abbeville.

what it was all about. Still, I felt it was an increase or a big flood at Anousand, as I remembered the terrible flood there that had occurred so long ago and which was still raging throughout the country, and I shuddered.

I did not know anything worse than that. Still, I believed the news of the increase of the death dealing flood would be important for you and your sisters. I felt you would know that to do. Yet Gertrude at first didn't approve of it. So I went on list-would know what to do. Yet Gertrude at first didn't approve of it. So I went on listening, then I came to a better position with my aide-de-camp, I heard more. There were a lot of cities destroyed according to their conversation, and they were just cozy, cozy with joy about it, and were sure to win the war through the disasters, and I afraid I they were right. This news was more terrible to me than anything I ever heard. I don't remember other things they said which I didn't know or understand at all got before but these other things they said which I didn't know or understand at all got me more worried. When I came into the room after the generals were gone, with Angellee by my side, and my aide-de-camp on the watch, she did not comprehend the news at all or know what the disaster was herself, not comprehending the same one, and, looked at the newspaper on the table. My heart then sank and I felt like and I felt like running away. There were also three or four bulletins there, where the language about the flood, and the people who suffered and lost heavily in the disaster was so common, vulgar as never could be fit for reading.

"I and my sisters should have understood most of this, Gracdelinia, knowing the results of the past disasters as I did, and they should have taken it for granted that our Government would never have allowed a re-occurrence had they realized the nature of the enemy and his plans."

"Oh," said Crandellinia, smiling as though all grief had left her. "You thought if our governments had acted with more sense the enemy would not have been able to make these losses.. Crandellinia deserves a good sound whipping, that would do more good and make a good example of her.. Our armies should have beaten her in every battle."

"Goodness Gracious girl, the glandelinium armies are harder to beat than they even find it one third way to beat us. Now a if we had the cooperation of every christian nation in the world-----"

"Anyhow, Princesses a good whipping will come to her by and bye. I myself would rather get a hundred thousand whippings than see all these disasters happen and yet be compelled to look on so helplessly."

"Well Gracelinda, I can promise you this. I'll see to it myself with the help of my father, mother and uncle and the whole royal Court that no such disasters will happen again. Some others have tried it twice but failed. I'll see to it that this last time will be generally punished."

"Princess, if all the people of Galverinia should be found to be without homes, with winter soon coming! ----"

"If they should, and terrible suffering ensue, I want to think of glandelinia not as a nation at war with Christianity, raging battles by scores, but as a nation mad with all the wanton ravages of the dark infernal regions. Glandelinia and with all the wrongs suffered against us.... Do you remember when the Abbeaux flood reached the city of Mildred Greenburg. ????" There was a little sob in the child's voice, as she was thinking of the horrible days, those days of awful destruction, the terrible and enormous damage that swept here Abbeaux out of devastation by the sudden and enormous deluge, that swept these Aborigines out of existence, that made the blessed days the days of Calverinus happiness and prosperous days, that are no more, and Calverina was still being devastated. I do remember perfectly my dear. And I and my sisters will never forget it....

I do remember perfectly my dear old home and my dear old friends. I and my sisters were very much horrified, that so many other big cities were so near to complete destruction. That flood feeds all the others which did not have time to recede enough."

"Princess, if Calvernia should go to ruin entirely, can you forget Glandolinia, did, when you, and your sisters will see your later days...?" "Gracedolinia, Calvernia won't go to ruin, but ruin or not, and my sisters shall always remember Glandolinia as the most devastating nation that ever existed."

"Yes" said Angelina "Riches." We all remember perfectly, we can think of Calvernia as a little child, whose first saw blessed days,, the days of childhood simplicity and innocence, suddenly struck down by a brutal man, and rendered a cripple all her life, so that she even be bedridden all her life.... well that's the condition Calvernia, and even her sister states are in now."

"I was taking a moment ago about Glandelinia knowing a good while ago. Violet, that thought came to me a few days ago. I was reading a story where a clever spy accomplished his mission, through a clever ruse. There's a description there of the head general of the enemy. The spy being good at disguising his face, kidnaps the head general, taken him to a most secret place, and grills him into confession his plans with threats of awful torture if he refuses to reveal them, and then gives him an awful trouncing and makes him change uniform, and come along to his own camp, so you know Violet, I'm not much of a credit or a critic, but to me that seemed to be a great passage. You don't find that or things like that as a rule occurring for fact facts, except in a good reliable history. Mostly those here stores we read in books, are never the real thing, and even the villain may be the real brave man."

"Gracedelinia, Joice exclaimed, "I believe you are a critic. You have picked out what in my estimation also is a great passage."

"Well read, and reread it. And the more I read it the more it seemed to work on a plan for me."

"A plan for you?"

"Yes, Princess....."

"How come?"

"For since I said I believe the enemy deserves a good whipping. I believe as of us one of us, or all of us could do the same thing. Of course I may be very dangerous, but we can be as careful as possible. I always feel that if our intention is right, that if we have faith in him, our Blessed Lord will enable us to succeed. Maybe we will do some way or other like chastening rod, that he chastens us all in His Love, and through that we might find so much difficulties in our undertakings. I may be doing this to try our faith. Yet all this time I have been waiting for some opportunity to secure for you and your sisters, the information you so urgently desire, and I feel that our success might be near. My past year of spying and scouting work, began to take on an entirely different look. A week ago I began to follow secretly, every high Glandelinian general, came to, and at first they acted so cautious, that I became afraid that we would never succeed. Then on last Sunday afternoon the opportunity probably came. God, and probably His Blessed Mother too, have given me the inspiration. It was a day of awful heat, strange heat, and strange brown darkness, and through it all, followed general John Manley, and at the same time could never get away from the feeling that God just because He is a loving Father was going to help me. And it made me brave to bear and risk the dangers, I faced in doing this. While hidden in Manley's headquarters, the suspense was terrible but I knew that God was showing me His love, and would protect me....."

Yet for a long time the assembly of generals spoke in such low tones that I thought I wouldn't be able to hear a thing. My boy scout, amos, and another girl scout, Francis Elsie were on either side of me, watching every move of the generals, who were doing all sorts of things. I was so quiet myself that for a time they thought I was never or that I was unconscious, but I was not. I was never so conscious in all my life....

For Violet, with the awful thought of the awful death dealing flood, and other disasters of the past, and of this awful flood, and the big forest fires now going on, and of God's terrible presence as if he was one of the victims, I saw the past fifteen or sixteen months of this awful war in all its ugliness. I saw how wrong the governments of the flooded states had been in thinking so little of Glandelin Durgas' advice, I saw how through over confidence, they neglected to use means to prevent the enemy from creating these disasters, how the investigators of other disasters have failed to find clues as to their cause and origin, and of how I devoted most of my time to prayer and become apprehensive and heart broken over the great loss of life reported.

Violet, I was sorry from my heart, and made a good act of contrition to God, asking His help for the stricken states, and then He seemed to be so near to me than I was to myself, and I told him that if I ever had the opportunity I would do all in my power to locate those who decreed the disasters, with His help. The suspense grew greater than ever even after my act of contrition, but believing success would come in the end I did not mind it much, for I felt the love of God was going me round. It was that love of His, which saved me during those five hours from being discovered in my hiding place. I nevertheless saw once how near I however became close to being discovered, and how God in spirit had taken me by the hand, and guided me without my knowing it from the danger I faced....."

"Wonderful" exclaimed Violet, "taken me by the hand, the girl scout marvelous manifestation" then by her power of expression. God knows how to aid us in all our troubles, how to punish and to chide.

"And now Violet, I am going to try to be what, was the day of my first entrance into the Christian Union as a young girl scout, and to begin with I should like to confide my plans to you in a manner as if I was making a general confession to a priest....."

And no brave girl scout made out her plans, simply, sincerely, without the least trace of self-compassion. There was a pretty pathos in her attitude toward the flood situation. She regarded Glandelinia, and her warring armies, as a great impersonation of the "HELLISH INFERNAL BEASTS" that Calvernia was the "VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH", although as the conversation recorded above, Gracedelinia was like as she said to be a good girl scout, and her statement was truthful that Glandelinia was the "REPRESENTATIVE OF THE INFERNAL BEASTS, AND ALL HER ARMIES WERE LEGIONS OF DIMONS AND LOST SOULS ANWAYED TO CRUSH CRUSH CHRISTIANITY OUT OF EXISTANCE. Glandelinia was dangerous....."

"And now Princess Violet," she said after the plans were made known..... "I, I feel happy if we succeed. Manly, that is John Manly is the man to get, I'm sure of it, and vibration too. One or both know everything. Whether Manly or vibration are responsible or not however, that is for us to find out, and then to have Calvernia, we'll catch 'em to find which one of us will put him out of the way. And if God wants us to succeed alright all right, if not I'm perfectly willing to be resigned. But Princess will you permit me again to go to general Manley's headquarters? If you think it is all right?"

"Certainly Gracedelinia."

"And for God what might happen!!!!"

"Do not speak to me of what might happen. You are just the same to me, and my sisters as you always were...."

"Thank you so much Violet, and if I succeed better I'm going to bring you news of success."

Then Violet, blessed her, and left her with the light of happiness shining in her eyes.

On the morning Violet, and her sisters made preparations for a visit to Angeline Manley. Of all boy and girl scouts they were all very dear friends to Violet, and her sisters, friends who held a warm place in their hearts, but on this morning the memory of them was faint. The patient brave girl scouts, whose names are always mentioned in the story, whom Violet, and her sisters had so much confidence in, doing their best work in the face of all perils, resigned when facing failure or even death, ready to go cheerfully through all perilous adventures, ready to receive right willingly life or death in the adventure for the cause, as God should choose, they all alone also stood out clearly in the presence of Christ upon the altar, being Manley and for their sake loving. Toward noon time Joice herself called to call up Gracedelinia's camp. Of course as usual she too had trouble over the phone at the beginning. The conversation is as follows;

"Hello, operator I want Bridgeport 1888."

She got a number.

"Hello operator she called again. "You gave me the wrong number. Listen I'm in a hurry, so don't want Riverview 1888. I want Bridgeport 1888."

Finally like Radcliffe she got Manley's headquarters.

"Is this is Sandern 1888 came the answer. "Who's calling?"

"This is one of the girl scouts" said Joice. "Who is answering?"

"This is general Manley's side-de-camp. Anyone wish to speak to the general?"

"No thank you. I should like to speak to a girl scout. I have the wrong number."

After getting the wrong number about ten times she finally got the right connection, her character and the kind of girl she is kept her from using language that we don't know or wish to hear. It was Angeline Jennings who answered Joice's inquiries. Princess, the efforts of Gracedelinia was most successful from Manley's standpoint. "Thank her standpoint." Joice bawled out with extreme fervor. Joice could hear the slightest laugh, it was re-assuring.

"Understand Princess, you want to know how her success was from her standpoint. Well, she's strong as her sister for that five Glandelinian generals, upon the altar, and vibration are perfectly responsible for all the disasters, but she is more suspicious of vibration. What that? No not vibration, I said vibration. Not wishing to use rash judgment against any one she does not want to say for sure until until she gets proof. So you know that she thinks a lot of you."

"That" answered Joice "is one of the natural mysteries, which I and my sisters, have been compelled to believe, but cannot understand. What I and my sisters have done for Gracedelinia we have done for many a boy and girl scout, and would do again for any boy and girl scout under the same conditions."

"Well she is grateful. While she was returning from general Manley's headquarters with me, she talked a bit about you and your sisters freely, and in language astonishing for a girl scout of her years. All her remarks came to this, 'that the sun rises and sets with you.'"

"Well it don't seem to." Said Joice. "In fact there has been no sunshine for weeks."

"That's true."

"But how is she getting on in her work?"

"Spendily. Everything is in her favor. And no one among the Glandelinians ever suspects."

"Thank you very much Angeline. In two or three days, I shall try to come with my sisters and pay her a visit."

It was not until four days however of the following week, that Violet, and her sisters were able to carry out their intention. They announced themselves at the entrance to the guard, and the guard forgetting himself shouted to Gracedelinia.

"Two guns, and one sandwich."

She came out and saw Violet and her sisters, and invited them in. Gracedelinia had been sitting at her table eating breakfast late, and she had been chatting with Gertrude Angeline, and no doubt Penelope were being, for he was there.

Gertrude Angeline, and no doubt Penelope were being, for he was there. Gertrude had some with some strange looking things, and to be Gracedelinia who was providing the whole drama. Through some reason or other the inside of the tent was rich with flowers and other gifts to entertain, but it seemed to be in the saying is the other way round. It was Gracedelinia who was providing the entertainment. The other child scout was delighted to see Violet and her sisters, everybody who said was no kind to her in helping her out. Gertrude Angeline came every day and the other scouts daily. And for security and beautiful, and for security and beautiful, and for security and beautiful, and Mildred Maxwell had come every day, the girls of her company rendered her "Her hours are too long Princelinesses.."

Evangeline EVANGELINE ST CLARE CITY HIT BY FIRE HURRICANE.

LITTLE EVA ST CLAIRS. SEPTEMBER THE 22TH.
Evangeline St Claire city, and nidi vicinity was struck by a ninety five mile an hour gale on the 22nd, during which the barometer dropped below the lowest point the low, today reading here since the approach of the forest fire was reported off the coast several days ago. All of Evangeline St Claire is thrown into total darkness, when power lines there were blown down. Electric light service also is injured, as serious property damage is being reported, and as the wind is arising from the south it is hoped the fire will not come.

Randall out of danger. Randall, California, September 28th. Ranger Signal stations gave reports this afternoon by the main national observatory, and assured the inhabitants of Randall that so far it could not be visited by the conflagration. The forest fire was 110 miles to the west of it, and burning away from Randall forest regions.

However there local weather conditions remained unchanged this afternoon. Readings were 29.81 with an eighteen mile southwest wind. Skies continued dark with smoke, and smoke squalls were frequent.

VIOLAT and her sisters were sitting, in their tent room at three o'clock in the afternoon on a typical smoky day and a dark hot one too, and the 14 September. The men had come early for the risk of a very hot day, but the smoke cloud of the distant fire, and the rain, was somewhat ugly. Dressed in uniforms of high rank, and in plain facemasks, they almost impatiently waited for some expected visitor, some one waiting, meditated.

As these things have happened since 1941, and her sisters, had entered the landmines section and stepped into that they considered with fervent thanks to God, an ideal position in which for all their long stay, the landmines soldiers, and generals were not recognized or suspected the, them. Little gypsy faced, gypsy haired Angeline legeline kiddo Jennings, had caused general John Manley, to lose as to say or as the saying is, a small but most insignificant looking code dispatch, which she secured by a clever trick. Strictly speaking, she overheard from them that they are looking for a cipher it seemed not to be, but it was the first lead of all of his intelligence since he took command of landmines armies.

He seemed like he might have lost it, or it might have blown out of a window, but outside there was nowhere to be found. He would like to suspect a theft, but there was no clue, and all his guards told him no one had entered his headquarters. The loss was serious. If it had merely been lost, and no one found it, who could read it, he need not worry at all. It is not in the possession of some hidden spy - whom the thought of his blood runs cold.

General John Manley, one of a class of highest of all Glandelinian generals, next to Raymond Richardson Federal had known the important secret of that code, something more important to him than his commission. He would rather lose his commission than have it captured by a Christian spy. And yet he had lost it most mysteriously.

1925 to fear that the Vivian Girls, who in his camp, or had been. He knew that Violet, and her sisters, the leader of a large class of child spies, had secured plans of important papers from him to expose during all the time he commanded the landmines in the result — a very unsuccessful warfare for him. But this time he was failed.

Thanks to the thoughtfulness of general "Furnace" (Raymond Richardson Federal) they had kept the candles guarded as they would guard a bag or jewels in strict turn of rotation for the guards. During councils they had been as watchful as alert with in fear of misfortune or anything untoward, or unusual in terms-- of any phantoms, visions of the dangerous Hooded Terror, or right Riders of the Gemini Coalition, who they venerated their a customary council devotions..

There were no guards or had been no guards placed there from soldiers, except those long known by the Glandelinian generals and their staffs, nevertheless out of the constant dread of Christian spies, and especially the Vivian Girls, and their extremely dangerous air-curtain followers, and out of regard for the safety of their rear headquarters, the Glandelinian generals placed professional spies of the Japs apies there, and they had continually made the rounds, before Manley learning of his Barterings intentions planned to send them to "get their muns". How the Manley generals brought it about no one knows, not even I the author, but somehow after the promise of a heavy reward, they secured the consent of those professional spies to let them find out how that strange dispatch disappeared from Manley's headquarters, and so the Vivian Girls how knew that those dangerous professional spies had been sent to the rear headquarters for their special assignment.

Though of foreign birth, one a Mexican, and the other an Italian, they are the right leaders of a class of most shrewd, clandestine showing and inventing agents, and always have promise to the clandestine class of the Italian Empire as high a position in the army as military dexterity. They generally done this work for good money, enough to make a fortune, but more often they were very willing to do it for nothing, as long as they had a chance of becoming rich, but as to their being christian armies not a good picking in battle, that being their one hearty desire.

Their mix of hard Jeff lectures and size one enabled them to be more successful than otherwise, and usually to gain their end, they enacted "Mutt and Jeff" plays. Jeff however was the head and the brains of the whole business, and very dangerous to cope with. He was honest in all the predictions of what he could do, and would do straight forward to the end. There was no underhanded trickery, no guile, when they tried to bribe and persuade, or to use means, fair or crooked, gentle or brutal, bribery, or force by torture, to win the success of their profession. All other Glandolinian, and Christian epis combined were square pegs in round holes compared to these two. They had been promoted higher several times, and his commission always brought important work to any man who was promoted. There was no occasion in their work where they failed. And that was in their day. In 1938 BAR Bennett, these two started an investigation victories are the most cruel but infants of the war, and added with small and harmless disasters."

"I cannot understand that, neither can I confirm that about the flood disaster, until the evidence is a fact. Of course the population is suffering terribly, immense communities are homeless, millions upon millions are at risk of complications of plague, and dying, tens of billions of dollars of damage has been done, and it will be very years before even the surviving cities will be restored, but the disaster has no effects on our own Abilene and others. Maybe the situation is terribly devastated, as stated, but not as far as rumors are concerned. Totally defeated, losing the war whipped to a finish as far as rumors are concerned, and we anyhow totally, but if that is true, that does not mean the nation is whipped, and we anyhow do not go by rumors. We want evidence. If I had known of such reports I would have investigated them thoroughly. Whatever may be the reports, our armies are closing in on victories, and that is our comfort. And Abilene is continually more on Vivian Wickey Wickey, and ships loaded with supplies down all the big rivers, sending thousands of boats, and transport all who want to come to safer portions of the country. The last disaster still rages in tremendous, greater and far more destructive than all the others combined, flooding six times as many more cities and towns with devastating results, and forest fires of inconceivable destructive fury.
It is adding immensely to the disaster. I have passed through towns on fast moving cars and by runners where burns, crops, and stock have been lost, following a gradual fall during the former nights. I was informed by a local runner, a person of observation, that the forest fire was probably reaching its height at Evangeline St. Claire, and that Evangeline St. Claire, September 28th--The forest fire which has been threatening the city for two weeks, and yet never seeming to move forward, struck Fort Union city and burned all the barracks. At the same time reports were received here that my men had been lost among the soldiers in their flight to stay the forest fire. Many were reported injured, and rushed to hospitals. A main fort thought not armed was run by the wind. After heading for Evangeline St. Claire and threatening the city for three days the forest fire now is moving most rapidly northward through the terrific conflagration indicated. The ridge of Ava Maria as well as the eastern region of Evangeline St. Claire, occupied the full fury of the fire. A fierce wind, but the fire is running up with great speed and nothing now can stop it. Heavy damage was that this will be the last flood disaster or disaster of any kind. Many will be looked to to prevent forest fires in the future."

or he covered his eyes with his hands. The notion thought of what these beautiful little girls were doing, through for the sake of suffering, Giovanni, mamma, him... "How do you know the great Glandelinian leader I used to talk to you about," whispered the radiant Angelina pichon. "He has come to help us now, a good big and strong man with the kindest of hearts."

"And so Angelina he will run remain to the end, I feel sure that from now on he will be more successful every day every day..." "That's what Gertrude says, Violet, and the young boy Scout out there, Penrod is willing to stake his professional scout reputation on the responsible litiges of those made known on the matter of the floods and the other disasters, and on Glandelinian's or said as a desperate monster, and Glandelinian adds that will... Glandelinian is wholly to blame for all these excruciating disasters in the beginning, but our discovery of those responsible and only that will prevent such disasters in the near future."

Joe Jennie Turner who had slipped from the tent, now returned, with Angelina, Penrod, Glandelinian, and Mildred Maxwell, and with them the party was complete. "There," said general Glandelinian after the same exchange of greetings to them.

"Did you not find out that the true spots where the great floods occurred?" "They all joined our regiment," Violet made haste to answer. "And this it is said by me is not all, come to the table general."

They all went in a body to the table, and amidst chatter and laughter and badinage the general was looking at a large map, but a puzzling one. It however was a true map, drawn at, and though simple in its outlines, was in the very best and corrective drawings. A good map, artist or one engraver could not do more.

"I should like to know that artist," ejaculated general Glandelinian.

"There she stands," The Vivian girl, pointed in a body to Gertrude Angelina.

"She made the map to help us trace the true spots where the great floods occurred."

When general Glandelinian heard for the first time how Gertrude at the suggestion of all her followers had come to earn her reputation, he looked pleased. When Violet and her sisters told him at turning the story of Gertrude's success and the efforts of the enemy to dominate Glandelinian, and other things by massacre, flood and fire, he looked

"My hus Glandelinian, been allowed to me make these disasters so easily? We must find out, I'll never leave this camp until we do."

"General," cried Gertrude. "See if you can discover something surprising on this big map."

"This big map here!"

"Yes general, this enormous map. It's got sixteen specially ruined cities on it, but to make the puzzle more complete who but who and over the success of this map no girl ever felt happy, or on the accomplishment of this map than I do right now. Come look at it look at it general."

And she led the general toward the big map. Surprise had been so piled on surprise that one would think that general Glandelinian's power of emotion was exhausted, but the candles on the table, the large map spread out, the magnificent appearance and color coloring of it, forced the general to snap again. Much as artistic taste, color and action, and exceeding care had done to make the map a thing of beauty, the printed map over drawn and colored, all by Gertrude Angelina, and at the end of it by Angelina Richon, and five of Richon's best assistants in military and girl scout work. Two of them blushing and bowing and smiling stood at either end of the table, neat handsomely uniformed and fitted out as typical guards. It was like a general council. Assisted by Angelina pichon, they were to help in explaining about the map, and their own names came to produce evidence of their own work, recall old days, not forgetting you may be sure old time adventures during the early part of the war.

The hours passed happily and then leaving these girls to carry on their designs, Violet, and her sisters, and Glandelinian and Glandelinian, took their leave. Gertrude Angelina was very busy at the time in explaining the map to her friends. As the tent doors closed, on them they were all filled with a sense of thanksgiving that Glandelinian was with them.

THE GREAT TOWER FIRE THREATENED THE Glandelinian CAMP. A BURNING FIRE ON TRAIL OF THE Glandelinian CAMP. A BURNING FIRE ON TRAIL OF THE Glandelinian CAMP.

But then a cheerful military call, caused them to turn around. The tent door was trust and out. The first stood Angelina Richon holding in her hand a book. Behind her they could see the other famous girls, grouped together with arms around each other's shoulders. But by an untold effect the light of some burning candles, being clear for the hot wind had died away, fell fall upon the smiling, happy official face of Gertrude Angelina, and the semi-smoky darkness wrapped her about as in hush. "Look," cried Penrod. "Look. Did you ever see so pretty a picture—that background of light and the face of Angelina pichon, one of the sweetest child girl souls that we have ever seen standing out in all her loveliness, her loveliness and the flickering, half-light a roiling about her. Her rank is perfectly justified."

"The best girl scout of all," said Glandelinian.

Unknown to them, but during Glandelinian's visit to Violet and her sisters and all the girls, Glandelinian, the forest fire which had threatened the Glandelinian camp, and was covered part of Glandelinian St. Claire, apparently away from the camp, as if losing himself, had for a week before changed its course, and during Glandelinian's visit was ending for Glandelinian, camp and he was fast moving off while parts of his army were still to be seen in the distance.

After a week, before Glandelinian's visit a quiet week in which the advance of the forest fire had caused to head for the Glandelinian camp, giving rise to ardent thoughts among Glandelinian generals that all danger was over, the wind changed direction, first southward, a danger direction, and once more threatened Glandelinian's army. It was now a heavy rain, and the wind was blowing from the west, and the rain was falling in a fresh and brightly burning flames coursing over the top of the Glandelinian's forests driving forward before a screaming scorching hot tongue, burning across the Glandelinian and beginning St. Claire rivers, and threatening every other important place, and all that threatened by the reported news already described, were already smouldering green and 100,000 people without homes.

The fire it seemed turned off and missed Glandelinian St. Claire.

Glandelinian's Glandelinian camp of some 110,000,000 soldiers was rumored to be in direct line with the march of the new fire, while Glandelinian was in the midst of its general configuration, and unknown to the general it was coming from the east.

The march of the fire, which suddenly appeared within thirty miles of Glandelinian's camp, was a junction with the main and had turned the valley of Glandelinian into a single corridor, and this part too was moving directly on Glandelinian's camp.

Glandelinian's army however, headed by its general formed in column, a column of men and horses, and there was an excitement as if the Christians were coming back, and the army broke camp, and marched in quick retreat, the artillery and guns and machine guns going first while the general made plans to have it constantly should the "Red Plague" come up.

Instantly on, and observed from a height that the whole country beyond in the east and south was literally on fire, being a volcano of smoke and smoke, and all the country as far as you could reach in every direction to the east and west was Any of the canvas covered wagons motor trucks, carts and wagons arrived to haul away provisions, while the army began to evacuate the threatened region. It was like Second day, October 14th, 1913.

Fire - forest fire burnings on Picknilla retreat camp.
Destruction of tents. Fat of Picknilla camp spoiled by forest forest fire directly.

On the following morning, before daylight, however, of course, there was to be a daylight, a fearful spectacle of fire and destruction within a night, and with a night artillery offensive during the day of World War was being enacted at half past three, about the north stretch of the Creek between Lima, Bernice and Jerry towns, where the terrible force was not at its view, and where Pickens in half of his war was striving to catch up the progress, violent and violent ones were early that morning and going to the high part of the camp, and there for quite a while watching the light and some wondering what was going to happen and if I saw a part of the big forest fires so much talked about. The camp was not yet aroused but the guards were on the alert and waiting for danger to come. I went over this. If any part of the

The main fire storm was documented on this evening as a series of smaller ones joined by conflagration, starting at two o'clock, i.e., and extending the whole night up to Johns Ridge. The fire earlier in the morning had extended as far as the ridge at Johns Ridge. The fire earlier in the morning had extended as far as the ridge at Johns Ridge. On the morning of the May 14th, extent of this "Red Plume" in the formation of it and the direction it was gradually, they realized that the whole of Manley's army would soon have crossed across the wind changed its course. By examining the map carefully, they realized that the Grand-Battle camp was in the path of the front of the most dangerous of the conflagration, and that not far the slowest fire was moving for their camp. Yet, so far as they were concerned, they were not in any danger. The wind was blowing from the south and the Grand-Battle camp was exposed to the point of main danger. The fire in the west was moving toward it sixty miles an hour, should the wind suddenly veer east----- It was indeed not far off when, only the matter of another day before the southern fire near the fire was burning in the sky. The conflagration had struck fully, the two big bomboms and Jerry destroyed them completely and the heat of the flames literally melted the brickwork till they reached the cement sidewalk..... It is the same time, the conflagration began to advance on Glendora, and Junior was piping out around-calls, the latter a more important center of some 1345, 325,000 people, and ordering them all home, and despite the chance of a change of wind, the evidence of a fire was not far off. The fire was spreading, the flames were burning, the conflagration carrying its dreadful menace of the flames flourish, it is also of Brownsville Turm and Dodge whom which too were catching fire. The children's smile with the help of their fire department to save the cities, and the children's curiosity was not far off. The fire was coming like a hurricane, and their curiosity was not far off. The fire was coming like a hurricane.

In August, 1901, twenty million from the Glendale Hotel came in fire destroyed already the majority of the houses involved. A part of place, demolished the rest of benevolence and all the million dollar of such a, I've chd the main section of the city. A new of fire, delivered the inhabitants the way to save their homes before the flames could take a step further. The fire from the Glendale Hotel, which was a new fire, and it got for fifty million almost destroyed all the electric light and gas plants, a hundred million for the great loss. I feel like Chicago would be day if the great Chicago fire, it did not take the people out and was willing to the city also of our. The chief cause of the fire was the Germans. They were burning the city entirely to the ground. The fire for the first time, every single building able to take harm. I am living with them, when they heard the news of the Glendale Hotel, they were so glad. I feel like Chicago was the destruction was even more complete, and the fire was burning on toward Phillips Reichen city.

All the men inhabitants were running out to fight it to save this city. The fire without being false, as in this description however it seemed evidence their prayers were of no avail, as it squarely would now come a tremendous miracle to save the city of the threatened destruction, and their devotion was interrupted suddenly by the cry of confusion among the fleeing refugees in the streets, the booming roar of flames, the crush of falling houses, sounds of terrific explosions, and the roar of the conflagration, as the sea of molten fire burning toward the city, accompanied by a screaming fire that brought smoke through the streets as thick as the morning fog. The people fled in confusion, some to their roofs and verandas and others to the streets flying through the air. Many died in panic with terrific cries while others realized now that their fate was near, what efforts had been overlooked in the previous beginning of the evacuation. The fire in the city however advanced more slowly but remorselessly, consuming all buildings in its path, and molting down all the brick walls, destroyed the houses, and the streets and destroying everything in its way, and came from the terrific heat. One district of the district flooded up to the flames, however reaching immeasurably farther. The air in the city far from the flames was now hot as a furnace, the streets were completely deserted and buildings were catching fire block away from the main fire. Giving way step by step as the mile long wall of fire advanced the inhabitants in haste sought their own houses, the incendiary fire burned up district after district. This was a fearful sight to be the most terrible scene of the destruction of the city. The flames advanced and the more and more the dinomorphs overtook the fire department, who couldn't save the city from fire turn.

The heat of the flames melted down the safe door of diddona, bridge and of other apartment, and as the fire advanced over the inflammable material in flames, and adding to the terror of the fire was the terrific buffeting torrent, of wind, and the shocking air laden with, and numerous terrific explosions. The very day was full of fire over head, some of the inhabitants became crazed because of the disaster.....

...hundred miles from the fire, the smoke made it dark up if a torrade was coming, and the traffic forest fire would beyond all control, and that a million were fighting it, they might as well have tried to put out the fire of the Infernal Regions. Even after all this effort the terrific forest fire down at our fire to be near it and all over the nation millions of petitions and money, and Panes had been offered for ruin. It evidently will be of exceedingly long duration, and everything points to be one of the worst forest fires on record, and the worst of all disasters.

prior to the fall of 1933. The fire, which started on September 1, 1933, near the town of Big Lake, Minnesota, was caused by a lightning strike on a power line. The fire spread rapidly, burning over a large area of land, and caused the death of many people and animals. The fire was one of the worst in the history of the state, and it was a great tragedy for the people of Minnesota. The fire was caused by a lightning strike on a power line, and it spread rapidly, burning over a large area of land. The fire was one of the worst in the history of the state, and it was a great tragedy for the people of Minnesota.

As Ambrose Guller was (sitting) a terrible disaster. He and his troops with hands down, the men and his wife catching fire in a blunder. The fire spread rapidly, and the fire spread and the artillery fire roar of the heavy shells flames sounding in their ears, and the screeching roar of airplanes, the screeching roar of the war, the back, foot, railroad, and away from of convulsion while five hundred the sounds of others at once rushed off to fight the "Red Fire", several Sicilians mobilized his own force, and Ambrose Guller had to retreat for the safety of his whole army. For the first time in history, a whole army of soldiers, no more, no less, were forced to wage a sustained fight, a fight of a thousand men long battle line against the worst forest fire and worst disaster ever known of which they themselves had been responsible for and which was a great loss for the men, cutting, creatures.

But while the work was concluding, a screaming tempest arose, and soon the flames fairly roofed the sky in fire, was born upward, and flaring spheres torn from the burning trees were carried clear across the branch, and the flames also carried carried across the branch by a terrific gale became general and the heat melting the great iron boulders and iron steel bridge over the creek like butter.

The fire fighters barely saved with their lives, and many were hurt in the retreat. They only left way to retreat and they did.

With only a puff of wind the fire could not be checked. As one section of the fire, glowing red and appearing to have choked off, died out, another section of the brush, another branch of the tree, or a bush, would start a new, active "contact" with other branches. One of these being a dead slightly by the branch, though crowning it, began a threatening, swifter or picknell's left flank, and striking a long abandoned munition dump, a single shot caused a terrific eruption of an explosion that detonated for a hundred miles or so and was heard like a thunderclap a hundred miles away. The explosion was like an earthquake, and the shock was felt for miles. The explosion was a great disaster to the army, picknell by this disaster was killed, and a number of his left flank was struck, however a great deal of life would follow. He gave orders to say that all munition stores were removed, if their contents for the use of the army.

THE GREAT FIRE. THE DEATH OF THE

The next morning Violet, a young girl of about fifteen years of age, and a sister of her mother, and all her other family, were in the great fire and that period was not yet over. At this time, as they then also learned that the center of the fire was now burning San Antonio Valley was consuming the main heart of the fire, and a large part of the army, which lay in the path, while then known as Haidis-d-light, a neighboring city to now-been which has been burned also has fallen prey to the raging fire.

The Haidis-d-light, which had been in possession of Haidis-d-light, the first fought the fire for hours, and then fled as the conflagration advanced. Part of the city was already ablaze. Though far away, and yet within sight of smoke army two large mountain ranges, heavily forested, presented an awe inspiring sight as the forest fire struck them.

By floundering in the night, that the entire army was followed of full duration, as the soldiers could go wherever it was more convenient, and watch such it, and comment on it. The worst conditions of all the most violently active volcanoes in the world would be completely insignificant compared to this. The mountains were fully ablaze, and the rolling smoke and ash were seen for the camp as if a big storm was coming.

The man in a convent near the town of Manacillo had refused to leave for a place of safety. During the early morning the convent was dogged, and the man believed to have perished in the flames. The soldiers volunteered to attack and separate bands, but they were turned in this locality. It is to be noted that the soldiers were in the area, perished during the one night from the heat that had been in the air. The soldiers were worth one million dollars, two hundred thousand in configuration for the area. They were worth one million dollars, two hundred thousand dollars. I had heard the Mandanville army at all but being straight forward driving to the north nothing more will be written about the Vivian fire, and their advent I will have to write in general the course of the fort and northwest, and a part of either one army or the other. The wind had changed direction by six o'clock in the morning the forest fire on a ridge known as Pine Mountain appeared as if the flames had disappeared in such a great cloud of smoke that it appeared as if the ridge was covered by gigantic volcanic smoking chimneys. Had the wind not changed the ridge was covered by gigantic volcanic smoking chimneys. However the principal principal of christian army did have it right. The valley had been forced to change its course fire burning here and there forming a series of small fires of general vivian army, and some of them on upward and plunging in the direction of general vivian army, and some of them on unbelievable spot. A statement would dare think of and burned set the fire. Three or four minutes later a deadly stillness reigned over the burning. Like an archer before he looses his arrow, the flames came to the edge of the clearing. Calm there was; but then, without warning and overcome by the terrific, terrific heat and by the smoke and died in a flash, where they lay. The dead pla continued to move, sweep through the valley but was outward now, one part like a red flickering serpent wind; the other, a new mountain slope, and across an open plain, swept past and ground toward another hill leaving no trace of the pile of towns on these slopes. Twenty minutes later it was within half a mile of the center of the southern valley, but even as it was moving northward. It was burning in three directions. In all paths the forest fire and floods, traffic by railroad and otherwise will not be resumed for years, owing to the destruction being done. The raging southern side was completely within thirty miles of the center of the valley. Millions of people were assembled as the result of the progress of the fire, which was now only burning at a rate of forty-five miles to sixty an hour. The aspect of the burning forest is fearful beyond description, infernal, and most terrific and tragic, but also magnificent. An violet, and her sisters continued to watch it, from their point of observation. The smoke and the flames, of the bright rays, glare of the flames.

Upward these painted phantoms stretched the waves of fire, slowly as it seemed from that distance, moving through and up the valley from four directions n/w now. In the distance further away twinkled the morning lights of the big city of St. Agatina, and fearful lest it too shall be visited by catastrophes.

From all points along the flank line, thousands of homeless people had been jumping in front lights vigil watching the work of destruction in mute anguish. They were calm and serene, showing no trace of excitement or panic anywhere. Mostly men, they were dressed in formal evening wear, and in the half light of the night they followed in the wake of the fire. They were not alone. In the half light of the night they were joined also by regular army men, guarding the dangerous places, and assisting the others in the quick evacuation work. Citizens in cages, and carts were being taken along the fire lighted roads, hauling furniture and possessions of all kinds from the homes of far distant fire threatened towns, from where distant fires were being fought.

not that good have been taken. Following the road, hundreds of most expensive wagons, filled with a cream of society including many foreigners, and also fleeing animals of all kinds. This had continued steadily all day, indeed it had all the appearance of a population trying to flee from the terror of the approach of the coming end. The road, however, was not a highway, and the traffic was not organized even now. Now in the village road stopped still, other towns three miles distant gradually taking up the total destruction. They saw buildings collapse in the flames..... As far away as it still was, the hot breath of smoldering air, enough to keep the hair from the neck, enough to make the skin crawl, and the air was so thick with tons of ash or a coal dust, not far from four of their clothing to go smoking. They second weather all a distance away, within four hours time of hard riding, and rushed a new observation point and on the point came to a second clearing.

Just as a dense mass of rolling smoke hung over most of the valley, as the storm clouds came again into the valley at it. As the cloud parted slightly, there was a momentary opening, and then the added volume of the cloud rose upward, in a sort of pulsative movement. In the low valley was a billow of fire, swamping the hill and spreading in various directions. The fire ate entirely and all about there as about the same direction but not the same size.

It should be remembered that the main heat of the forest fire is not in this valley, it is at the point N. of track at Violet, where first rain had started the fire and all of the fire in this forested valley is burning. It can intensify it with single lightning.

"Why is my plan opposed? The flies are not only threatening our armies, but and droved another army. I am not against the flies. I am against the men, and the flies is to originate in the half-brothering row, while the hellish flames are turning their way toward a fourth town, Miltoria, which by to night will be in grave peril. We it alone ought to be the duty of the army to stop this Red Plague somehow. The wind has died down and my plan may work. My plan was that when the wind changes direction we could make a counter fire, and to fight that one. That one is the main thing. We must be ready to know when a counter fire comes, and turn out. We do it now. I have my plan!"

"Because" said general Blalerlinia, "if the wind would again change, the carrier fire would change direction and form another enormous one. Then the disaster would be larger."

During his council the ever-aching monitor of Red Death was burning forward with great rapidity. Inside the fearful crimson pump and its nozzles, that were hung around the city Monday, the flames were rising and the soldiers looking the fate of Glendale, which by evening would be wiped out, and was menacing Evansville St. Claire more than ever. Lucille Hickson was imperiled, and the city and entire population of men was fighting it. It was also a matter of hours before Anna follows, and Hicksonville, and Glendale were burning.

On the morning of the 2nd of April a general, vigorous army entered on the battle work. A direct fire hurricane hurricane from driving past the main army was futile. Work drew an light as the thick smoke would let it, General Vivian went out to negotiate with a party of officers, for he was worried exceedingly, hearing the hiss of Evansville St. Claire was doomed. But views the advancing force for some time of distance and the men of the army were still in the air. For a few minutes on reached the weather, but the fire still yet like an African Desert, and windy.

They watched the conflagration as it raged south on the road to Chudatone, and Lenin-ski, in the middle of the first of his moments of lucidity, launched a tactical large tank. Cragoarska, before she fled to safety above General Cragoarska were water work, but the fire was coming with a speed that was probably no one could turn on her back. She then saw a man named a soldier to Chudatone, where the two fingers the conflagration was still forming a single convex or desert, the front of which was moving forward past the town at the rate of probably sixty, ninety, and a was a serious case of fire. Leninskiy and a human soul.

Looking further still, the general observed the horrible fire sea crossing a part of a wide stratum, another section was following the course of the stream, and ending to diverge to the right and left, hell bent for his encamped army. There it is, thought he, that gives me some satisfaction," mused General Vivian. "I am forced to give up before this fire, so will Manley have to retreat. The right wing of it is heading for his camp, through the Immense forest on my right." "But did you say your Excellency?" asked a Colonel, thinking the general spoke to him in a lone tone.

"I said this fire will make Manley retire at an early hour," he said. "The reason why he wishes to observe it, is because he has been forewarned by the Government officials, of its approach. It is the most serious in which it was moving, and toward where it was heading, it is a matter of time. The weather was always uncomfortably warm for over this time of the year. Through the little of the big floods, he had heard plenty of details about them, the awful magnitude of the explosions, their result, how the situation stood with the enemy, the country danger and so on. He couldn't conclude how the forest fires could be so much smoke as to have the country in such an enormous distance as dark and gloomy. The fire was still fifty miles away, but to him it appeared to be an enemy on half a mile or less. The panorama before him was indeed awe inspiring. It appeared as if the whole burning region had burst into violent volcanic activity, activity of the Mt. Pelée type. The sky over the burning region was as black as ink with smoke rolling upward to an unbelievable height, and bulging in great curling billows, cauliflower and mushroom shapes.

Over and upon it was placed by flames leaping to a prodigious height. It looked as if the whole world was on fire, preparatory to the coming of it, and on the final judgment day. Though terrible it is a scene of most grandeur and sublimity and most thrilling. The left wing of it is moving now toward Manley's army, and will hit them faster than General Vivian will. And General Vivian believed it would hit Manley's army first.

His generals who were with him were filled with misgivings however. They knew it was a terrible conflagration and believed they would see their camp struck first. In the meantime far to the right long walls of rolling white smoke, in a new direction toward the upper arch of the conflagration, and the longest section of it was rolling high along the north side of the Hic-culaster Run River, and with his glasses the general watched it rush forward at great speed, he believed to be more than fifty feet a second. He could actually see the wall of smoke gradually closing in on a sort of small clearing. By this time the conflagration was within three hundred yards of Sound Bend and a city of over a million. This city surely would be struck, there was no escape. But nevertheless if this disaster or breaks the conflagration in half, his army would not need to retreat and Manley's too would be safe. If it remained as now and enormous, the main army would have to break camp, and go pell-mell. General Vivian continued to watch this new progress of the fire toward the Sound. Hundreds of thousands of people in huge crowds were fleeing from the city, and had gathered some distance from it watching if the fire would strike the city or not, while here also the men folk went out to fight while fire departments all over the city went down to the danger zone to fight if necessary.

Children were crying. A tempest was roaring over the city. Wagons and buses rattled down the roads hailing refugees to some point of safety. Soldiers were dynamiting wooden bridges across the river to prevent them from catching, and the men began trying to increase the length and the width of the clearing. Others were tearing down telegraph and telephone lines and saving the cables and wires, trees on the opposite side of the city were being dynamited to and cut down to make an extra wide and long bridge in an effort to save the city. If possible. All the way to the city were helping. Other soldiers began moving people back from the burning line of fire, the scene, where General Vivian moved further up the hillside to get a better view of the scene, where many of his own soldiers were still working desperately against their own part of the fire line.

And all along the edge of the newly made clearing, the general saw images and crucifixes planted by the religious. People like buried wire before the trenches in the world war. And he also discerned indistinctly about ten priests singing High Mass with many people attending with the hope that Our blessed Lord could answer the holy sacrifice of the Mass and keep back the Red Demon. General Vivian saw where a good chance was lost. If it was not for the distance he could have thrown in all his fire fighters, and his whole army to fight the fire at this spot and save the city and had it off, even a proper portion of his army working hard enough could have prevented the fire from crossing.

He knew this would have been possible if he could get the battle directed against the fire quick enough. But that spot was forty miles away. The fire would cross before the soldiers went one half of the way, even by train. If the fire moved slow there was then would be a chance. He felt sure that the town was big enough to house over one million five hundred thousand people. It was several large convents, many schools, hundreds of factories, many orphan asylums, court buildings, and general Post Offices, besides many branch post offices. At far from there General Vivian stood was a big city side shrine, with large candles ready to be lighted before it which by to-morrow will be reached by the fire.

After he had been watching it for a minute an involuntary movement of the fire swept up a new mountain side, which the stretching a part of the fire swept the mountain side, and one started from the heat of the parent, and named the two fire outward. Then this unit with another, and a second fire named the two fire outward to units and apparently split out in a roundish blotch.

Two minutes later the Red Plague was reaching the river edge, and burned both the station and the high railroad bridge. A wind was blowing so furiously that the fiery branches were carried across the river like a thick snowstorm, and it was without the fire was going to cross no matter how madly the scores of thousands were fighting to hold it back.

"If I could have only gotten a large force to go before the fire reached the river or at Sound Bend," cried General Vivian. "But of all words I wish I had to be too far away when I first observed this. Of all bad luck this is the worst! It'll hit us as sure as gun fire. I'll have to move my camp, you see. And if the fire don't divide, they won't escape. And every minute a million will be burned to death. Heaven help them! It'll be the most horrible tragedy on record."

Though his officers seemed anxious to go, General Vivian decided to remain, even though his observation post was in the line of approach. He decided to watch this all day, and spent only a third of his active time before reaching the station. He found that the force of the fire since its first outbreak was a very small one. He found it a more terrible tragedy unless rain came soon. This was soon it seemed going to be a useful day for the inhabitants of Sound Bend, for this large city was soon going to join the rest in this sea of fire. The other towns had been lost within sight of general Vivian's line, and the inexorable avalanche of fire was poking its nose toward Sound Bend, which is in danger of being attacked. General Vivian decided that if there had been no wind the fire would not have been able to leap across the river at this point, but the advance of the fire was being preceded by a terrific storm, which was blowing furiously across the Sound, driving great clouds of sparks smoke and blazing embers across the river. At the location of the city, but across the river the fire was clear to the goodby sized neighboring towns about a mile away and they were burning. The fiery sea gave more impetus to its speed along the river banks and in the darkness of the smoke the whole spectacle looked like a gigantic sea of dancing balls.

While the right wing of the great conflagration concentrated its fury toward other points, the whole population of this region was still soon spending the horrible day in prayer and religious procession, ordained by the Bishop and Cardinal of the threatened city. The Arch Bishop's proclamation urged all to pray for the providential miracle. General Vivian again took a look through his glasses at the threatened city, and saw crowds of those remaining file in and out of churches within his sight for special prayers. He doubt a thousand candles burned in offering to Our Blessed Lord and special singing, and all of the churches, while in the Cathedral and outside of it, there was a picture of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, a sacred article which often was said to have been effective in days of national calamity as the people believed.

Hundreds of people knelt down in adoration before the picture. There was also a big procession of little children outside the Cathedral and outside the town for the same intention. So far however the efforts of the fire fighters was progressive, they had secured the formation of a long wide clearing beyond and around the bend, and fighting small fires that had started among the bushes.

The heat from the distant fire was becoming awful, the wind was growing strong, and the flames were coming closer to the city. Very soon, General Vivian concluded at the fair and conduct of the people whose city was threatened, and himself fell on his knees and prayed to God that he would sustain the fire, and prevent it by his Divine Power from crossing the Bend. His officers followed suit.

Thousands of others from near by towns were singled with the crowds of fire fighters doing all they can to give the way no chance to leap the gap. Isolated houses, in the path of the fire hurricane seemed to be awaiting certain destiny and offering themselves as a useless holocaust. And it seemed unbelievable that this big fire has been raging since July 1912, torturing millions with the greatest engines of the most terrible destruction could not have acted with more cruelty or caused more damage than this forest fire. Yet it is strangely and unusually methodical, while two tentacles of flaming movements are thrown out, the center masses high in heaven reaching flames, and spreads forward at terrifying speed, and yet now moving slightly away, and now going east, and not threatening the town. Areas of fire seas form, die out and reform according to conformation of forests and clearings encountered by the conflagration.

Through heat and smoke and dust the Mayor of the city as General Vivian could see sent back and forth among the refugees, and aid and weeping. Many refugees were coming from seemingly nowhere. General Vivian saw Sound Bend was safe. The fire had changed its course, but the fire was now heading toward another place, its neighbor called Sound Junction, a city still bigger. It was apparently on a high spot protruding like a large lighthouse tower not yet reached by the flames but looking like an island in the sea of fire. It was doomed for sure however. The fire moved further and further away from Sound Bend. In fact the disaster became more terrible, because the flames are undiminished and progress though somewhat slower is unimpeded. Without meaning to move the population of Sound Bend, and other towns are waiting before looking entirely to flight, hoping for an act of Providence to intervene.

General Vivian constantly prayed for the unfortunate people, as he saw the arch Bishop ceaseless in his ministrations, toiling the front, and blessing the fugitives, cheering the small people that are children who are fearless of the awful spectacle, though not ignorant of the overwhelming catastrophe, as they be. One of general Vivian's staff officers who had seen numerous forest fires in his day said to him hyperbolically:

"This big forest fire came within our view without warning. It'll last for months unless rain comes. It'll burn half, or all of the forests of the Galvianian Province. And if it crosses the river at this spot the big and massive tar and turpentine forests will be caught. The city seems to be safe, but the danger I mention is past, and if the fire crosses there will be some fire."

His speech seemed good, as good as another. Yet General Vivian looked at the fire in a manner as if his eyes were to go out of his head. He wondered what was going on, and looked in the same direction. They were spell bound with horror at what they saw. On the opposite side of the river, of the side it tried to cross, but over the river they hoped it would not be, while the main fire had reached down to the waters edge, and the river was rooted in a stretching sea of flames. A roaring, seething hell was coming like the wind straight for General Vivian and his officers.

They were in the path of the eastern wing of the main parent fire, coming from the south east. The wind had changed southward. Only a terrible hurricane of hot wind blew, raising huge waves on the river, increasing the shower of burning debris with flying debris of blazing limbs and leaves, increasing the shower of burning debris with flying debris of blazing limbs and leaves. General Vivian bent a hasty retreat with his followers to a large clearing, which they found was two miles wide where the flames could not leap across.

Though the fire apparently changed direction to not hurt them, a wind had struck

he city of Sound Bend. In the city where many people still remained hoping the fire would not cross, the wind blew open the doors of houses, stores and restaurants, carrying inmates and customers afoot, while tables were swept clear of dishes and table clothes. Windows were broken by thousands for every gust, and thousands of signs were blown down. In the court house and hotel doors were suddenly burst open or blown off their hinges, and the wind lifted the huge carpets off the floor, and turned tables, and chairs, spilled coffee, tea, and wine on the diners, and the food and clothing of the guests. Windows of many houses were smashed in, and the hotel page boys were hurled down the corridors, and ornaments were swept across the rooms, and palms went careening along the passageways.

The roof of a big building was lifted clean off, chimney stacks, crumpled through the streets, and the streets buffeted by the roaring hot gusts. In confusion every one fled to the streets, and the streets, as every one began to flee for safety. One man on a motorcycle was lifted bodily and set down one thousand yards beyond. Belongings that fugitives carried were torn from their hands, and sent flying down the streets. The fugitives as they raced down the streets were pelted by flying wreckage, imperiled by falling wires, and building glass. Then for a moment that terrific explosion witnessed by the Vivian Girls, and with the crash of that explosion still ringing in his ears, the critical moment, a tense anxious moment for general Vivian had arrived.

Will the fire leap Sound Bend? The question was asked, but for the reason only that again the fire was swirling toward the city, and Sound Junction before raging hell fire of its own on its outskirts. He surveyed the immense forest before and beyond him. He turned to an officer.

"Test the sap of that tree, 2."

The officer did as directed.

He came back in a few minutes, holding some of the fluid which was somewhat liquid in a little hollow piece of wood. The general smiled at it and said the single word:

"Turpentine."

Now general Vivian did look worried. He glanced about the forest. He sized up the trees carefully, the cloud thickness of their leaves, and the nature of their bark. Then he looked over the ground. In the forest, the floor was vine and dry moss hung like clouds from the leaves and limbs and the forest floor of the forest was impenetrable with thickly leaved dry weeds, briars and brush and the young pine. For all his arm, to make a sufficient fire break on time was simply impossible. The trees were so close together that it would be dark even when the sun was shining overhead. He knew positively if the fire crossed at the bend, and reaches the Turpentine forest the fire will be intensified to a most terrible degree and the Turpentine forest will stand before it, and his own army will have to make a race for life.

He watched proceedings at the Bend. Still it had not crossed. This slackening of the fire danger however was due to the spreading out of the conflagration well along the shore of the stream as it reached the water front. The volume of fire burning elsewhere was coming forth as profusely as ever, but apparently now not threatening the city. The fire that threatened him from the southeast, and passed on to his safety, the clearing being wide enough to turn it off its course. Yet general Vivian could see that the slackening of the danger brought a specious tale. In false interlude to the distressed refugees who were now lulled by the hope that their prayers were being answered, terrific clouds of smoke hung over the scene, indeed the whole district now and such was the smoke obscuring that for a very short space fires in the valleys and on the mountains became again invisible for a very short space of time. So sudden was the increase of the smoke, that at first one could have thought that that torrential rain became to fall on the fires. But all this smoke was caused by deep masses of forest debris smouldering in and beyond the zone of the main fires, and far in front.

The fire apparently checked after all across Sound Bend, and though the conflagration seemed and was spreading along the opposite shore at break neck speed, leaping across a portion of the river at another section, yet nevertheless because of the terrific heat, a new fire had formed a distance in the rear of Sound Bend, and this was the fire that had almost surprised general Vivian and his staff, and also this one was becoming the most frightful of them within his near view. It was spreading at a speed that would seem an exaggeration to say. Trees blazing like millions of torches fell like straws into the river with big splashes, and a searing his observation observation post was going to be enveloped in a short time as already a good portion of it was enveloped in a raging inferno. He again ordered a retreat, as a portion of it would not be of no help either, as they would roast in the heat. This the clearing would not be of no help either, as they would roast in the heat. This scene gave him no assurance that the fire won't burn at Sound Bend because it was between two fires, and if the wind should change against his own. Red Perce would strike the city from the rear. There was positive escape without any doubt from the fire checked at the opposite side of the river, but no escape at all from this one in the rear. God help the city if the wind changes again.

It took him three hours and a half to reach another high rise of ground which this time fortunately he found pretty clear of forests on the summit and gave a full view. From here he watched the work of the main conflagration on his own side and did not much attention of the first one still striving to cross at Sound Bend. The main hope was that he held against coming destruction in his own district in that the fire will continue spreading along the bank instead of reaching across the bend, and he hoped the other fire would continue its own course.

In some other portion of the town a group of people who still stayed when others left were now leaving. Still in a smaller town people who also stayed, when others became scared and fled were miraculously saved. During the night one of them suddenly and saw a stretch of flames higher than the trees rushing toward the village at lightning speed. To his sight millions of trees seemed to catch at one flame, he heard the others and they seemed in the nick of time. As soon as they were out of the village it was enveloped in the fire. The whole conflagration was now a more infernal sight. He still saw smoke hung in rolling wreaths in the valley below burning all but the night fire which painted crimson and pink shadows over the scene. Sensible to the tragedy the people of other near by towns who had opened their doors to refugees, living whole-hearted hospitality to women and children, while men fled out to fight the fire, and also refuge to the babies and aged, fearing the near approach of the fire were preparing to flee. Much dismay dimly in also expressed in the country in general, when it is feared the war disaster will ruin the foreign tourist season.

Three towns have been ruined in general Vivian's sight. Two railroads are destroyed and all traffic suspended. Apparently baffled by the wideness of the river and the Bend, and the long breach made on the opposite side of it, and opposed by an easterly wind the fire seemed defeated in its efforts to cross from its infernal source.

Yet the fiery attack continued relentlessly all along the line, it sweeping over the river at another section. Here it was spreading with terrific fury to join the one that passed general Vivian, ranging between the cities of Frontier and Drowsabella from which a large horde of women and children were fleeing, while the men strove to hold it in check. It swept with the roar of artillery over the roadway between the towns over which the refugees were being transported by wagon, and auto. Most of general Vivian's officers declared that they surely believed that the fire was checked at the bend, for this they implicated by it being stationary at the opposite side, but there was danger from the new fire that crossed. The people of Sound Bend and Sound Junction were breathing easier now. But general Vivian was not so sure. The two fires which had crossed the river elsewhere could flank the two towns and close on Sound Bend. The view of the forest fire while crossing the river was superb.

While more than ever the enormous cloud welled up the sea of flames flooded the long stretches of forest below marred only by colored smoke which increased all the time. Colored smoke seas from other sections of the conflagration also increased. General Vivian, and his officers still watched the tremendous spectacle. He had again resumed his climb up the mountain side for four hours. He wanted to give some precision to the exact nature of the forest fire and the topography of the fire wall along the river shore.

Leaving his first point of observation he set off for the upper part two thousand feet high so he could view the center of the heart of the big fire. A rocky road of boulders over which a horse could not walk lay over the sides and covered with disintegrated rock in which short bushes and bushes grow. Pushing through stone braced vineyards, and dense forests of pine trees, they halted for a moment and took a look at the fire again, on his side of the river. It was growing immensely, spreading unusually fast. Plunging upward for another half hour they stopped again and observed where a stretch of fire, like liquid molten, and red in the twilight darkness, smouldered as most people would imagine a molten planet would appear. The stretch of fire here six hundred yards from Drowsabella contrasted with the different colored smoke. The flames from that distance made a crackling, sizzling noise like a hundred million cooks frying bacon and pots potatoes in a cauldron of liquid grease.

The main sea of flames was now visible once more and it made a weird unearthly light, and then gradually disappeared amid the smoke once more. The whole surrounding landscape like the setting of a bad dream. Two new forested hills were vomiting flames, and general Vivian's former observation hill, was a half mountain of fire. In the middle of the eerie smoky scene the thrill was intense as they observed the monster which was causing all the destruction below, and so far below through the flames they could see indistinctly two towns in the danger zone, but here the fire seemed to move in no directions and away from them. The general sat down on a fallen tree to write notes of the progressive movements of the fire. One of the officers came up and told the general, that he and they had better hurry away fearing another fire would threaten their new observation post as smoke from an opposite direction was appearing in immense rolls. He obeyed obeyed, while descending he noticed that bits of smoke was issuing from the town of Sound Bend, and that the fire on its rear had hit.

One fire of this conflagration forked to the left and still another and a larger to the right. It was rushing on and above an undestroyed section of the woods, where it broke apart, then began to flank the city, while it spread up the river which forms the northern section followed toward Sound Bend and taking a sharp turn to the left making a new smoking flaming sinister path of destruction. The direction of wind was coming to do with it either. It was the way the fire was spreading now in three directions.

terrible hissing noise. Near as I think I was in the middle of the houses mostly wooden cutting like punk. Junction was a box. The districts of grinding terrific explosions shook the air. Within fifteen yards of this city a number of fire fighters lost their lives. I was trapped tragically in the flames. They had not realized the danger. I was very hungry, could not leap the gaps and continued the fight. I was that moment announced that the city was burning. I heard the shouting of the people in horror watched the tremendous force of the flames and the fire hurricane as they swept block after block and the main center of destruction. The force of the fire hurricane was so great that the whole city was a long row of fire. The next instant the whole section was ablaze.

General VII vivian watched the draw drama he for two hours. Then turning to his orderly he bellowed;

As the orderly the general and the other officers, clouds of flame flicked not smoke, raced off to a saved for their destination. One officer raced off to another directing him to be quickly overtaken by the conflagration and his only safety was to throw himself into a deep ravine. The fire was coming like the wind. Two lieutenant captains despite the peril remained to watch the conflagration in its progress. The soldiers were terrified at what they observed. The confusion of the men was so great that it had evidently smoldered for some time. The soldiers were running and yelling for safety but the fire was coming on cutting those miles of trees seemingly picked by the scene of tragedy of a whole and innocent population being destroyed with no excuse, and facing a sea of hundreds of the murder of women and children had perished the soldiers hastily left the spot like some weather vane, leaving a hole on explosion and a trail of fire, smoke and blood and fire, and a portion of the city went up in flames. The soldiers returned to the lower levels than they could hear the ringing of the bells, the fire, the fire, and three times more came came earth reeling explosions, the last the most terrific of all. General Smith before he was out of sight of the conflagration, had also been a witness of the awful tragedy. He saw large numbers of people while in flight overtaken and overwhelmed by the fire, women and children and all it was coming so far from any, or other all perished he knew not. He saw a woman and a child, a man, a child when he saw large stretch of the Japanese forces in flames with an explosive shooting machine touched his lines in a short, but in a short time, and around his feet.

"One with you was free to come ahead, and I told you I did. He started. 'I'll send a large force of men. We must hit the fire off from the Turpentine first if possible, so as to starting to catch ahead, if we don't that'll be no excuse for all of us. The fire is coming sixty miles an hour or more.'"

"Without his knowledge it was coming one hundred and forty miles an hour. He plans to save the Turpentine Forest was to be of no avail."

The officers had hopes that the fire was far enough to enable them to make an extensive and effective charge, but it was the appearance of the forest fire that guards and the appearance of the fire stations and signal Corps also, then time to accomplish their task, for otherwise they would have to give time no time to escape, and face the fate of the population of the two cities. They were also to signal that the final course would be later on. Though just now the army in three sectors was fifty miles off from the conflagration, it could be heard.

"Why! It's crossing the Bend over there," cried Jennie. "General Viviana is in for it sure. Even the city of Grand Junction is burning fast. Look sisters, see the fire in---- What the-----"

Her voice was drowned in a fearful thundering roar that immediately ensued, resulting from an unknown cause of the forest near Second Junction was hurled in one great mass of air and fire, more than the first big explosion high into the air for above their heads a vast column of black and white cloud, earth, clouds of fire fragments, mud, black water, dense clouds of rocks of all kinds, accompanied by a tremendous flash simultaneously with the blast of a million skyrocket and that thundering roar of a world of cannon firing like one rolling volley, a burst of white cloud quickly extinguished and enveloped the upward rushing mass. The sudden explosion was awe inspiring, grand beyond all comparison to violet, and her sisters were thrown off their feet by the concussion, indeed no more appealing, yet fascinating spectacle could have so suddenly appeared before their view. They had never expected to with witness such a great phenomena in all their lives at such close range, yet still came throre other terrific creations, for worse than the other, two at the location of Second Junction, and the third, worse than the three others combined was the explosion, here a whole mountain had been blown to pieces at the instant it took place, and with the horror of the scene. These outbursts whatever the cause had taken place in the face of the two mind and most immediately they were filled with mud, broken fragments of trees, mud, small stones, and the exploded mass that came all over the territory causing violet and her sisters to take shelter in the bigger woods near by, and even there smaller objects aimed down along the tree trunk, noise like rain and still hail.

This was a combined attack detonated by the Vivian Girls. Since the news of so many violent disasters, and the appalling disaster at Abbeville altered the face of the whole country, leaving in the minds of the people a gloom and terror, the unknown numbers of people, destruction of cities and towns and villages, and the washing of acres of cities, and hundreds of millions of cultivated fields, violet, and her sister sisters did not expect any more terrific explosions.

For a moment it seemed to Violet and her companions as if without warning the very face of the north were laid flat to the air by this series of most tremendous explosions they had ever witnessed. For nearly an hour violet, and her companions were in the air, and the explosion of the bombs was heard in the air. The explosion of both cities were laid flat to the air with enormous quantities of flying debris, huge rocks and clouds, and there was not the slightest doubt that the unfortunate refugees were caught in flight by the conflagration were caught by the explosion of the exploding hot river over the land and sea by the concussion of the explosion. The explosion of the bombs was heard in the air and the explosion from which their bodies were later rescued. It was a terrible accident, and a terrible accident.

During all the while they had been in the glandelinian camp it had taken the average duration some time to realize that from the erratic and wholly unmanageable character of the fire and the fact that the burning region, just at all times be attended with the greatest personal risks for although the mysterious explosions were soon found to come at average periods of six hours, irregular explosions were of frequent occurrence and took place without warning, and at a place least expected. All questions as to the magnitude of the risk, and the possibility of the danger of the fire rising the forests to not least could be dispensed with, the fact that the West was not that forest fire should cause terrific and mysterious explosions right close to two cities, when the remainder of the population were barely making their escape.

As for Violet, and her sisters: I fully realized at the time the greatness of the task, I myself doubt if they would have allowed General Vivian to place his hands in the burning territories. As the fire was approaching closer and closer I became acutely aware of the fact that the air, thick with smoke, was for the most part invisible. I felt that the fire was approaching closer and closer, and that the heat was becoming more and more unbearable.

I knowen to violent, and her intense terrific heat of the conflagration created and had occurred. The fire was by the time sawing parts where there were immense piles of logs, and at the time, which from the results of the great heat of the fire, days after the passage coming down the river and boil, and which like porridge in a caldron, the floor burning, where boiling mud and scalding hot lakes of water, steam which would take on the very steel, and rub the eyes to be sure that such a great condition existed.

and rode off at full gallop. His officers knew something mysterious was on his mind. They urged on their columns at faster speed. The air was growing as glaring as white hot iron in a vat, and now the distant roar of the flames, could be easily heard, and there was a fierce sound of sound, a humming, a terrible crackling, hissing and an an and a strange booming snapping and flapping sound, and a noise like a world of skyrocket going off at once, and elsewhere to the extreme northwest and partly over the city and they were turning as black as night, and rolling smoke shot overhead, and the wind was growing stronger and roared, hummed and thundered, the fire grew bigger, a frightful tumult. A terrific desert heat pervaded the atmosphere and all the officer's generals feared now that the fire was going to overtake the army.

to hasten, while others scouted ahead,

Orders were issued to every commando to hasten, while others scouted ahead, to see if there were deep ravines, a large clearing or a lake, which in either case would be the only refuge. If they could not reach Mumsfield or Mansfields creeks they could easily form in a good line of defense, for those creeks were wide, and they could easily turn the fire the other way as those rivers ran the course up along the fire wall but those rivers were a long way off.

The situation for the army was growing acute. The fire was catching up with the army with high speed, and now the wind was blowing a buffeting tempest and the air was full of flying leaves and smoke and branches, and the heat was growing far worse. At the moment of the conflagration sounded far louder. General Vlasov grew desperate. If the fire won the race and caught up with his army, there was no possibility of escape. He decided to make a last ditch effort. He ordered the army to be placed under an immeasurable disaster... If his army could not break through the flames, he decided to plunge them then it was necessary for him to die. In a terrible way he quickly decided upon desperate progress. The plans were as follows:

1. To lead the army suddenly

1. "To mine a big breach in the forest along the two streams which the army suddenly came upon unexpectedly.
2. To throw every available man into the work of fighting back the fire from the mine made clearing.
3. To use all the available artillery as thought of before.
4. To use the trench against the fire.

8. If necessary to trench against the fire.
4.. He immediately called his nearest officers. He told them his plans, and it was followed. A real battle was fought. I saw a trench front on both sides of Mansfield. The clearing was accomplished and the artillery brought down all trees not blown down by lightning. The work of nearly a million men working with all their strength was accomplished as fast as possible, to the other side of the breach and all retreated as fast as possible, to the other side of the breach like mad to the breach also. This was their only hope. If they failed all would be lost, and the army would have to retreat for its life. The losses of these streams were blasted by army would have been flooded and engulfed. The fire came up a roaring inferno miles long, and would even then had crossed the breach and was starting to, to their horror, when without warning, the wind suddenly veered northeast and blew strongly. That gave the fire at last by this flood luck just in time was checked, it did still spread across in some parts, beyond the breach in spite of the check, but it became of the fierce heat, but the fighters easily overcame every small fire started, and won the battle entirely by evening.

The fire spread around the other sections but went far beyond the original area but unknown to the generals was running wild, and hell bent for gunley's army from both the east, north, and northeast.

General Vivian breathed easier.

It still took time to know it going the other way.

General Vivian breathed easier.
His army was saved, but the fight went on still to keep it going the other way.
General Vivian was not in knowledge that it was heading for Manly's. He would have still worried, for Violet, and her sisters were there.

THE FLEET CATCHED MANLEY'S ARMY UNPREPARED FOR ITS APPROACH.
A TERRIBLE CALAMITY ENSUES. THE TERRIFIC EXPLOSIONS.

IT seemed impossible that general Hanley's vast army could have been taken unaware by the immense conflagration with so many guards posted outside the camp at every spot, but when the Glendinningian generals saw the fire cross and destroy Grand and amid a series of awful explosions, and move northeastward in a wild ocean of flames, and force general Viviane's army on a retreat, that gave them the overconfidence of believing that this move of the fire would save the camp, never expecting the fire to trick them and come from the most unexpected of directions. They forgot the devious capriciousness of wind, and they forgot about the fierce conflagration in the Sacred Valley which had been started by the Glendinningians.

Of course the fire that crossed the Imperial valley was immeasurable in size, and they did not even think that the conflagration spreading through the valley was the head of the main forest fire, even though immeasurable as the fire crossing the Sound & Spread was.

With the change of the wind, general Vivian checked his own part of the fire, and it was now moving northward, ready to join hands with the Imperial Valley horror, which was also racing eastward. Each of the two armies was now in the hands of the wind. Violet and her sisters, being apprehensive made up their minds not to sleep that night, and had earned all their followers to stay close by their side. Bright stars shined down from the landings, and also they were gliding that dark evening did not light up the night sky, but the glare in the whole eastern and south to northeastern sky, and a glare also appeared hundred times more brighter in the straight northeast. That they knew was the

From that direction there was a strange volume of sound, which though cannot be described would put a person in mind of being close to the uttermost depths of hell. Issued Violet, and her sisters did not forget the once beautiful Impr Imperial Valley and its now terrific inferno, and neither did all their followers. Very one was too excited to sleep. The very stillness and dreadful surroundings in the air was a kind of music and the liberally infused air overcast with the glow of the distant distant conflagration, revealing easily enough within sight above the strange formation of the smoke clouds.

To rest themselves they lay down on their cots, and let not the reader think that they were fast asleep. They had not asleep in spite of the peril, for it was as if they could not sleep if they wanted to. And also there was a strange hissing and crackling noises in the distance, and a strange moaning sound mingled with a roar like that of a coming hurricane or tornado, and the air atmosphere was smoke laden.

Violent, and her sister, knowing no one would be aroused, said the Bessy and Lily and she knew not how to get out of their room, and they hid under their beds, and then used every dock of the ten hall war Mary in an extra series of prayers such as O Mary Concealed without sin, and others.

It must be said as the reader readers well may know that before that they began to fight, the great fire had been burning for some time and had become very intense. The fire, however, had not been seen by the girls until they had first encountered what was a portion of this. Indeed they were right, and knowing how they were spreading they had a good reason to be apprehensive. Later that night when the surprising wind died again down and the quietness was unusually great, the girls, under the guidance of their Scoutmaster and Scoutmaster and other girl scout leaders came to the tent of the Princesses. All the girls were nervous and restless, and for fear of unseen danger had assembled all their boy servants and restless, and for fear of unseen danger had assembled all their boy and girl children about the camp. "We are all restless," Violet couldn't help but come here. "I'm afraid the fire is coming very soon, it's all over and beyond the Imperial valley, an and smouldering tea and burning and striking the mountains." "We all feel the same," said Violet. "We observed the fire this afternoon and saw after spreading far to the north-east it has changed course and is striking striking for here. Though none of the Glandelinians know I feel a fear of the fire, and I am sure the loss of the camp will be a great loss to the Glandelinians. But I have not intended to abandon it, and will leave the camp only temporarily until the confusion ensuing because the fire strikes subsides."

"till the confusion ensuing because the fire strikes subsides." "But will we have time?" asked Gertrude. "I hope so. Why?" "You know a forest fire like this travels with terrible speed." "Yes, said violet," but if we run off we will be in two dangers. We'll draw suspicion. Anyhow we know where to go." "We don't like to lose at in our work after being here so long," said paleo Mc-Hollister. "Yes, still be the worst blow we have ever struck. I wish it would ruin and pu pou

"This has been the driest year I ever saw," said Grucedelina. "It's been playing havoc with the crops. The whole late spring and summer has been without rain. The dry nights happen every year in this section, but this year was one so severe. And you know it snowed so much last winter! My butt but it is warm. I'm sweating like a Turkish Bath."

"It's the forest fire that makes it so hot," said Jennie vivian.
 Joyce looked at the Thermometer.
 "Why its a hundred and twenty five in the shade " she cried.

"It's strange how far the fire is, and yet it throws a radiance of heat way over to here it must be such a blaze that it is enough to cause the very government to worry."

For a long while the girls remained silent keeping the interior of the tent in darkest darkness. It was as quiet as a grave yard outside, but at an unusual ruddy distance or direction a red ruddy glow could be observed. It was more hotter outside than usual, almost like an oven, the air laden with smoke, and the sky overhead was as black as ink. Gertrude laid down and tried to get some sleep. Yet no one could sleep because of heat and excitement, and it was growing warmer and warmer and more smoky and sometimes they felt as if they had to cough. Violet got up and looked again to see what the temperature was. It had risen ten degrees and one half. It was one hundred and thirty five degrees and a half. That they themselves could stand this heat was a miracle. The suspense was awful. Three times Jennie Turner scouted outside to see how near the fire was coming, coming, but evidence of the fire coming was apparently a false alarm. The reader however may know if he has read in other books of forest fires and their nature that the real proof of their coming would be of the wind, or rather that the wind the fire is moving off. If the wind comes the fire strikes. If there is no wind the fire is moving off. It was now eight o'clock eight o'clock but it was still calm. Finally Gertrude said:

"I firmly believe the fire will miss the camp's long past due, and yet it hasn't hit us."

"as, but a fire is treacherous," said Joice. "When you least expect it it strikes. A calm precedes a forest fire, and you know too that the wind is north-east. The main fire has traveled far to the north, and I fear because of the north-east wind."

Jennie Vivian decided to go a long way off to see it and see how the fire is coming, but because of the danger her sisters opposed the idea. They dreaded the consequences if she went out too far, especially if she was too far away, and the fire would come unexpectedly.

"But then we might be caught unaware," said Jennie. "If we don't know which way the fire is coming, and if it is coming fast, and would be spreading like a fury as if our own country would be in the uttermost depths of the bottomless pit then however help us. Then even our own escape would be cut off. This suspense is awful, and Jennie was determined more than ever to go. She would have anyhow, but Violet said:

"If something will happen to you, and Glandelinian sentries will suspect you also when you seem too interested in the forest fire and will place you under arrest. And you know too Jennie dear, that we are all supposed to be asleep. Asleep instead of out in the Company street. And as we know the laws of the very Glandelinian camps, and the military discipline here, it is strictly against the law."

Yet the argument seemed to work, violet, and her sisters began to believe, but only slightly that the fire would not hit the camp, and therefore after a time they all laid down and tried to sleep. The next day the forest again in order to induce sleep a weather finally they had become semi-conscious despite the awful warmth, they were suddenly aroused to their senses by a terrific howling roar, among the forest, outside, a wind that usually precedes a thunderstorm, and they thought a thunderstorm had risen.

In fact indeed, Violet, hoping it was a squall of a good and welcomed thunderstorm, stepped outside, and a terrific hot windstorm was raging, and raging crazily, and racing on toward the camp in a fury that nothing can describe, came the conflagration.

"Heaven help us," shrieked Violet. "It is the fire hurricane. My God have mercy on us. The fire is coming like a racing sea wave."

Just as she spoke the camp was lighted up with a most red glare, and suddenly within easy sight, an extensive wall of fire stretching as far as you could see in the glare, dark as ink before, suddenly burst into flames, with a hissing roar. It was only a few minutes, and the whole camp was in uproar and confusion.

At once all the tents nearest the flaming forests burst into flames. The conflagration of a struck the army ammunition camp, and the explosion was like a terrific volcanic blast, and the shock immeasurable. Everywhere else soldiers started frantically to pull down tents, while the whole region was becoming an inferno. If the whole camp had not been in a wide clearing, the whole army would have faced destruction.

Officers shouted commands, immense crowds of soldiers seeking tools of every description, strong looking men like madmen to stay the red plague, but they might as well have tried to stop the fury of hell. Every portion of the forest dark before, no matter how far the darkness extended, even far for miles burst into mountains of fire, one section after another, whole districts of tents caught fire, hundreds of explosions too severe to describe here occurred, the sky might as well be on fire, and in the midst of confusion the Glandelinians began to retreat, as fast as it was possible.

The generals mustered large portions, that saved many of the tents, but the rest were left to burn. The main army either in scattered divisions strove to check the conflagration, or retreated. The army was so large, and the camps covered such enormous space, that many sections could not retreat as fast as they wished, and the wildest confusion prevailed, as they read out in battle lines, and fought the forest fire with all their strength, and energy to save their lives.

An enormous army was arrayed against the forest fire, mainly fighting for safety, using every available means, and every available tool to combat it. Yet the situation was so fierce along the line, forcing them all to retreat. Indeed by two o'clock most of the army was on the retreat, being forced in their haste to abandon many pieces of artillery, indeed very big guns, munition depots, and the caissons, and high piles of shells behind and the scene became either like the explosions of huge volcanoes or like many volcanic eruptions. Many men, many men were killed or hurt. Indeed general Munloy and his staff had a narrow escape with their lives, as their headquarters tent caught fire while they slept, and they had an exciting time getting out. Violet, and all her sisters and all the other girls, attended the whole scene, the terrific explosions, and the conflagration swift progress.

They did not follow the retreating soldiers during the wild confusion that was ensuing, and remained inside the tent, which fortunately was a some great distance from the awful fire. Many of the soldiers in the face of all the deadly peril were working like beavers pulling down tents, while horses pulling ammunition wagons were galloping past at full speed, urged on by their drivers.

Violet and her sisters jumped at the sound of the great explosions, and felt the ground shake under their feet.

The sound outside, and the exciting scene was more thrilling than a retreat drum, after a disasterous battle, indeed the scene of panic, and confusion was worse than that observed, by the French army after their defeat at Waterloo.

Violet, and her sisters heard great outcries, from many, now distant, nor near, the rattling roar of explosions, and a tumult of other sounds.

Hearing, or nearest to the conflagration, they saw or rather observed, the destruction of all the tents within view, and swarms of soldiers attempting to save others in vain. The blaze was spreading with the rush and speed of an approaching thunderstorm, and the fire wind was blowing a roaring thunder, thundering like big hurricanes, throwing a blizzard of sparks over good portions of the doomed camp. If it had not been in this clearing, none of the soldiers would have escaped with their lives, and violet, and her sisters, and their followers would, have all perished with them.

Whole rows of tents at once, would literally burn down, or be torn away by the force of the striking gale, the Glandelinian soldiers while at work saving their property, were literally pelted by blazing embers, and big tree branches wrenched from the trees, and the confusion was beyond words.

A number of hotbeds of officers on horseback dashed up, and halted near their tent.

"The fire is coming fast," said one of them. "We won't be able to save much of the camp. Call up all the men and try and have them make an effort to head the fire off, while the army retreats."

One spoke to dashed off to obey. As he rode off a number of other officers came dashing up excitedly. Two of them rode on, the other halted and said:

"The fire is turning all before it. We have tens of thousands fighting madly to stop it, at the southwest of the camp where the conflagration is least in its fury, but they cannot, for the heat is so intense from it sets fire to anything. A good quarter of the army is retreating in panic."

"Some sentries, they were indeed, allowing the camp to be surprised," said the one who came first. "But toward, where is the fire spreading?"

"To the left sir. It'll strike us soon. All the woods are ablaze."

"Well got your commands going quick," and with the order, he galloped and dashed off. All the while exciting commands could be heard shouted, and thundered everywhere, and confusion of sounds, while flames welled up from the forest spreading like two wings on each side of the camp. To make a bluff at it, it had only taken two seconds, for violet, and her sisters, with the help of the other Glandelinians, to take down their own tents, while fifty blazed up a few paces from theirs.

As the heat grew more intense, and the flames began to reach clear across the sky, and the camp became clouded by wind driven smoke, violet, backed, by her her sisters, and to forward, and Angeline richards picked up said:

"It is time for us to vacate before all escape by the fire is cut off. We are going, but we want you two to go first and scout the country far north of us, and find out where the fire is, for if you two know the country far north of us, we can be sure you two can locate him, but avoid the valley of death. The fire is sweeping through there."

"Do you want us to have him come back?"

"All right, well, and with their words of "God Bless your efforts" from the Vivian girls still ringing in their ears, they were off on swift horses, taking a road which they knew would lead them out of the path of the conflagration though they had to almost overrun their horses to do so. Then violet, and her sisters followed the same road, urged by unheeded by the excited Glandelinians, and they knew which way general Vivian's army was moving, and they decided to keep in within view, and only as far as they had no intention to allow even the fire to frustrate their work. They would not allow themselves to fall on account of the fire in their mission, even though they declared it was up to us to starting to succeed in his own efforts, for if they or he failed, nothing would be done to seek redress for the disaster still raging, as well as all as well as those those which had occurred in the past.

They felt better about it, or at least I mean better about it, but they bore their disappointment bravely. The course they took gradually led them out of the path of the most dangerous part of the forest fire, and after traveling a long night, and day, with little time taken for resting between, and keeping a single eye on the view as much as possible, they came in sight of general Vivian's army still moving, and coming upon it were relieved most joyfully.

General Vivian was glad to see them, and welcomed them as if they had been his own own lost daughters. They told him and all his commands of their efforts in the forest, and how the fire came and spoiled everything he had unconsciously they told of sending starting to try the same thing, and coming he had unconsciously run into the center of the forest fire, and he knew the country more than he did, to locate him if possible and to guide him out of the fire zone. As he told them, his army had since then they started the day before, been over on the retreat, some parts occasionally standing at bay to fight the fire. General Vivian said it

"I great a general as I, I take myself to be absolutely do not know how to draw my armies out of the dangerous fire zone. I cannot rest my army a minute. We have been traveling without a single halt all night and the advancing fire keeps presiding us on. I don't understand how you and your followers ever found us. If I dare stop the army, a moment, the fire will catch up. But I am heartily happy that you, your sisters and your companions have returned without the loss of a single one of them. It's too bad the fire had to hit general Manley's army and spoil your plan for it is a hard blow to us all, but you can continue it when everything quiets down, for it would never do for you and your sisters to give it up. It might be a success for starting, and we'll all pray for his success, as well as yours. There is nothing like the power of prayer if it's a worthy reason. I know you strongly desire his success, in case you fail, but it would be better if you won yourselves. But what we should all worry about just now, is how to get our armies out of the path of the fires. If the wind would change direction more properly, it would be a great help but it doesn't."

"There's one, the way we came but we'd crash into Manley's retreating army and we don't want to risk a battle in such an awful situation even if we would win, for we'd be compelled to abandon the wounded to the mercy of the fires. His army was in a terrible flight when we left. That's why we escaped so easily." Said Violet...

"It would mean disaster and a frightful loss of life to us both if our army and his would meet in this 'Valley of Death' said general Vivian. 'If we'd collide something would happen that would enable the fire to overwhelm us both with the most frightful loss of life.'"

After this conversation Violet, and her sisters went to their own respective part of the army. As they were busy, busy getting their girl and girl scouts to safely pass of the army, a foreigner soldier, English by nationality, and seeing them the first time in his life, and not knowing his identity, and not being able to speak good in Abbieannian yet spoke to me of them in English.

"A little girl scout, this is a terrible fire, what in the world my child is the army enemy doing burning up the world, trying to make an end of the world before the proper time. When I was in the western part of the United States, in 1911, I saw fires, and you ought to have seen the big forest fires there burning for weeks. They were enormous. Great numbers of fires in Canada too. I saw disastrous floods caused by rivers. I've seen awful storms, been in them, and witnessed the havoc they did. I've read of great earthquakes. Do you think this forest fire here will burn up all the forest in our country?"

"I do not know," said Violet, answering in good English. "Our fires are awful big. And the floods too. Do you think your disasters were worse."

At that question he laughed.
"Worse. How you question me. Why the biggest fire was a spark compared to this. And our fires I do not believe were caused by fire bugs. If they were and we caught them, we gave them the neck tie party. You know what that is. Yes. Good.
Your forest fires are done by the enemy. It is more enormous than I can measure.
I first my child entered the Angelinian army, just to see the war, for adventure, but now I hate the enemy. For such a good country. I don't see how I can stand all this so long and nothing be done. If another big flood like that of Abbieann happens again, I tell you my child things will all go to the dogs. General Vivian told me through an interpreter that the Vivian Girl Princesses have tried to learn who were responsible for the flood. Thank heaven I feel they'll find it out soon. They can't fail. They never did."

Violet and her sisters without revealing their identity saluted and rode away. They believed it was true. While they were saluting, served the conversation rode up and said after saluting,
"May my man do see know whom with see yes was she talking too?"

"No sir I don't sir. It was I know though a girl scout. Little heroines like followers, six were very pretty children. I wish I had seen those."

"Ahem. You were talking to see Vivian Girl Princesses, and see no know est."
The man was astonished, and being flabbergasted, he walked off, the officer swilling to himself, as he said "That's one Englishman I know, from what I hear that Manley would give a $100,000,000 to capture. He's dangerous to the enemy.

disasters like these. As wonderful as they were, the effects of the disasters made them very nervous. They were scared. They felt almost responsible though they knew not why. They also felt sure the whole Galverinia government was responsible, by carelessness and over confidence. Over confidence was the cause of the capture of Vivian, the capture of the enemy. Something must be done to find out whether both Glandolinia and Abbieannia, the latter through carelessness was responsible. Of course no one knew that Glandolinia could secure explosives, and the explosive materials to make the disasters, and if they were responsible for the Abbieann horror, how long were they in the preparation for it. The powerful kinds of explosives were mysterious. Where the Glandolinians secured the explosives must be known for it is sure a fact that they did not manufacture them.

However just now the frightful spread of the forest fires was terribly alarming to them. One third of the immense forested region of Galverinia had been wiped out, and the fire was raging most furiously. Trains struck by floods could not come to rescue the refugees. Towns struck by the floods also were the only ones untouched by the fire, and only for the region was devoid of forests, and these were far away from forests, except extreme southern towns. Maroucian had been wiped out by the conflagration. And even Angelinia state was partially destroyed, and Angelinia Agathia wholly devastated by flood and fire, and their own good father, the emperor forced to join the broad line. Of course with that city cut off from all communication they did not know that, and thank heaven they didn't and would never know. Indeed it was best that they didn't or maybe they would have become discouraged. They must have known, or maybe they couldn't stand it. It was enough to make them go crazy. And if they did hear the news maybe they would.

The greatest disaster ever known to their knowledge was that which occurred and took so many chapters to describe, a full volume almost, and obliterated Abbieann from the map of Galverinia, and demolished the cities and towns of as one quarter of the country.

This they had ceased their father to have investigated, but the fury of the disaster had erased all clues, and the investigation proved of no avail, and now they hardly believed Starring would succeed either. This made Violet, and her sisters discouraged, sometimes they were tempted to give up the whole undertaking, and go home, for sometimes they felt it was of no use. They now felt more discouraged because they had failed in finding out who were responsible among the Glandolinians for the calamities. There had just been a hope for success, or the opportunity had just been within their grasp, when the blaze suddenly struck the Glandolinian camp and snatched success from them. This was the first time they had ever met failure. They wondered why. Had they been too slow? Or were the Glandolinian officers too wise? Or did they suspect that the Christian generals would send professional spies within their camps to find out who ordered the disasters to be made?
Were all the Glandolinians on their guard and therefore not speaking about the disasters, even? Or did the Glandolinians really know knowing, anyway the fire frustrated their plans to find out. Since they didn't succeed, they greatly feared that Father Starring would also fail, and therefore made up their minds determined ly not to give up and try again.

They even dreaded that he would go into more danger than was good for his health, and the route he was taking was in the path of the main forest fires still further east, and he could face many other dangers too. Once or twice they had been tempted to recall those who went with him with the order to bring them him back with them before anything happened. Probably they would be sorry afterwards, if they did recall them. He might succeed. And they had sent Radcliffe, Angeline Rhoshe, and Jennie Turner to guide him to or from the Red Plague country. The fire is more dangerous than the enemy at all times. Violet, and her sisters were greatly worried indeed, but they decided to wait a few more days, and try to attempt it again.

than its parent, and spreading toward the parents; in

By April the 26th the baby fire was no more. It was the general of all the fires burning forty miles an hour. Soon in many sections of the regions described was an immense zone marked by the most largest raging forest fire on all of recent record which followed the line of the river in the valley, the left wing bounding east and the right wing, Mexican and Angolan in Arathia, and sweeping for gloriolus.

Of the last blaze it traveled slow, but it became the worse of them all, and raged madly to join the other big fire and in a day burned over more acres than belated and also was beyond control. The river running through Lucille Rickman was scalding hot.

nothing could stop it from in the territory of San Salvador River fire, new fire was up and on. Honduras Creek which was formerly a "child fire" now bigger than any was not free of the flames. The fire was sweeping across Nicaragua, a terrific tempest of fire.
Honduras Creek was in its path. If it crossed Gracia was doomed. The forest along this creek contained small light medium, and five large burning was small, while two while in the region of its branch from the Gracia River. The fire was three wide bands new large and narrow. Only the northern path - part were three wide bands in Honduras Creek.

Two of these were in the San Salvador Junction district, the third near Hica Nigua Run. Of the former extending about thirty three thousand yards in length, was composed of one thousand more yards in four hours time by thousands of the desperate desperadoes. In four days time the work had cleared almost all the brush and timber widened and bent lengthened when they were alarmed by the rising sun along with which continued to increase in strength until the rangers and helpers could not continue their work, and far beyond it seemed as if the earth had been covered with seven miles from the clearings sending out all the howling of hell accompanied by fire and smoke. A fierce battle thus began between the men and the fire from crowding the clearing, the work went on continuously and most desperately, every means being used to put out and clear fires started by flying arrows, and heat, and even a breastwork was built up at the foot of the clearing. An effort also was made to blast the fire down Honduras Creek and flood the forest, but a sudden onrush of the fire prevented this, and almost trapped those trying it so that their only safety was to leap into the stream and swim to the opposite side.

JAMES W. COOK

the Nicaragua, Costa Rica and the San Salvador. During the Elko fight only the fire was somewhat successful as it was not handled properly that was not swinging on, but it helped the clearings just the same, but was being held under control on here there was no wind. But the forces in the Honduras clearings had more difficulty as the fires had flanked and covered the clearings, and was burning across the creeks, sending the thousands of fighters in a retreat in the silent confusion and such haste that many abandoned even their arms and tools.

The fire however also had reached the Three Bands, and though crossing westward in the wildest ocean of fire, simultaneously divided into three conflagrations far running wild the central one being the largest and most dangerous. All hope was lost chain of the Vivian hills. The west wing of the fire was heading for the ridge to the south of the high plateau of Ushanka, are many micor smoking forest fires, now burning and on the west watches a diends toward the grand Mic-Hollerster Run, but they find numerous smaller fires started by flying embers of the big one scattered about at intervals near the main forests. Further off extensive fields of forests occupy the plateau on the western side of the Mic-Hollerster Run and according to the Ranger leaders, the great sheets of advancing flames,,, which are threatening many hundred square miles of forests have been checked off in small fires just described. Growing to the north of the Mic-Hollerster Run we find other combination combination fires burning over the country's forests at intervals but still outvailed by the main conflagrations which threatens,, the city of Whalan of 12, 656 people with destruction and moving in a way to overlap and cut them all off from escape. The hills in this district are now covered with tall summits and flanks of smoke and fire. The hills are now covered with flames and smoke and their length and wide witness as the fire leaps ten thousand feet. This statement however was not investigated as the heat kills ten miles

At first the men inhabitants of Irenetown noticing the maximum size on the "Red Plague" had thought of bursting a levee to flood the forest, but then too the torrent would damage the town without stopping the fire, even when the waters reached its margin and large streams of water were pouring into it. Terrible seas of fire

There have been periods of most tremendous forest fire scenes when instead of moving forward at a race train speed, the fire ruts more slowly destroying immemorial trees within a short time covering the sky with smoke overtaking over thousands of miles. The general suggestion of forest fire events throughout the region of southeastern gulvinia appears to have been somewhat as follows:

The earliest part of the forest fire broke out about the 22 Th of May and were continued into the succeeding months. These consisted of what appeared to be stationary fires, at the start moderate burning and were grouped into sections. Those that succeeded during the succeeding months still were in forest configurations, consisting of immense areas of ground, crown and considerable quantities of timber. Then came a period of moderate progress, during which the flames just described were greatly increased, came the great spread of the conflagration like a flood, deluging the world, burning through the rain forest, swamps, and gulches, and continuing fiercely falling trees, the flames sweeping from ravines and gulches, and continuing fiercely until the present day, certainly up to now.

Thus this forest fire history of Southeastern Calaverinia corresponds remarkably to that of other disaster zones with which we have previously dealt both as regards the successions of the various fires, and the time of their outbreak, and the other tremendous flood and explosion disasters.

The explosions and the forest fires and the floods of the galvulinian, Angelina penguin and other stages of the Angelina Vine are special manifestations, of the enormous fiery power and force of action, generally, at any stage of the tremendous forest fires in September of 1913 heading for the Evangeline St. Clair region while Violet, and her sisters were in the Lundellian camp looking for the evidence of the flood disasters, spread on grand scale, the breaking out of new fires produced by the heat, are frequent and the flames are projected into the air to a height of over ten thousand feet.

Most of the timber fires are intermittent, like the remarkable one known called the "Baby Fire" in the Calaverita Hills that swung around from the August and struck around and past Cedronine Creek wiping out every trace of forest there, and the famous battlefield, destroyed Hardick Junction, the Kingsburg, and the fire described at Collyer and Stanok cities which burned 10,000,000 acres look like "ascars of Chicago" fires in one, was passed on burned Cedronine Creek, and hit Cedronine city during it from the map. The heat of this fire was felt as nobly for six hundred miles when the wind was from that direction.

This is the section of the fire front that in 1913 September was ravaging the dense forests in the western part of the St. George territory. The many towns far from this fire front had to be in its path hold large quantities of fire extinguishers and other materials in readiness, for owing to the high temperature and intense smoke conditions, the darkness from such smoke could easily threaten their towns next. In the Great Mc-Hollister Run country the fire has been burning since August 10, 1913, and it is feared that some day the region the fire may be referred to two classes, distinguished by the thickness of the layer of the leaping flames, and the rolling clouds of smoke which are so thick. The latter class as a general rule will be more dangerous than the former.

The great fire storm of the fiercest intensity, the results of the density of the forests, and others which have been described above, are chiefly general throughout the high rising configurations of the St. George fires regions.

The Mariana region constitutes a sort of turpentine forest, consisting of a dense woods of pines, tar and rosen, especially toward their north, which is parallel to that of the Marie and Osborne Woods, whereas the McAllister Forest gum for the most part so far a distance away from the peril of the dreaded "Red Plague."

General Jager the great Gemini leader also gave a narrative of a tour through the endangered forested region, a most detailed account of his view of the active configuration nearing Evangelina St. Claire. The forested hilly plain over which their way led to their mountain observation post was through a thick dark impenetrable primeval forest which he thus describes.

[illegible]

If the fire got here it would go like hudo. I'm sorry to say my dear sir that it did. But thank n hester n wile we were here. About ten AM A.M the top of the hill suddenly burst into our view. We reached it partly clear of trees. We expected to see a coniferous side with a broad sea of beautiful wavy forests as they could be seen from rolling hills composed of natural God Given beauty. The bird eye view would have presented a most beautiful panorama of a beautiful Californian forest.

[illegible]

One hundred and fifty one stretches of fires of varied form and size, rose and surged forward from different parts under the clouds, or from the surface of the water and all of these at the same time created such other and larger surges, and the existence of those series led us to conclude that the clouds in streams. Most dangerous conflagrations before we did it form other than the mass sea of fire only placed the smoke at places where it was thinner and that the great columns of smoke did a good deal to make it appear as a number of fires, but it was all in one appearance of the forests before us altogether before us, although composed of different kinds of trees were thicker than usual and the fire was heading toward us; it was evident that the lumbermen had been recently checked by some clearing on the left so far up to the center of this mountain range and had by meeting some strong natural opposition burned on over the other forests.

The gray clouds, and in some places the thick forested slopes before us, the immense smudges which intersected the forests before which we were standing, the long mountainous banks of rolling wreathed sulphur colored smoke on the opposite side of the valley, the vigorous actions of the flames, the dense columns of rolling black and white smoke together with the fumes, and the heat waves, presented an immense Xish panorama the effects of which was greatly augmented by the constant roaring arising of the vast furnace below."

It seemed indeed as if the world of Calavernia was girdled by a wave of forest fire, then Inn Calavernia burning on so many mountain slopes made it appear as if perfect chain of tremendous Volcanoes were in simultaneous violent eruption, far worse than a Krakatoan type, with other hills appearing in a state of greater or less intense activity, as scene as if the molten matter in a state of high pressure beneath the hills finds way of escape, and thus the forests of Calavernia in danger of total destruction.

that of the Gederline horror which took a terrible toll of fire victims, raging through the greenery, Caloyer, and Stanok, through the St Vincente Forests Territory, at Lucia, Marston, Gussow, and St. Eustace forests is a remarkable and frightful example of the simultaneous spread and the simultaneous termination of fires. In tracing these waves of fire on a map of Calaveria it could be observed that the fires are other strings of simultaneous fire, or rage in proximity to the forested hills and slopes and hence the view was naturally observed and entertained by some of the forest rangers that the same manner of fires, or at any rate all of the conflagrations was proved to be caused by the same cause. It was not until this view seems to receive further corroboration from the belief that the fire in the forests such as the extensive Mc-Holleston Woods are of

It is also very significant in this connection that many sections of the forest fires now threatening Evangeline St. Claire City, or at least the territory, appear to be in proximity to where a fire occurred. Thus the old conflagrations of the Huron forests east of the Evangeline St. Claire City appear to have consumed all vestige of trees when the valley was filled with smoke to such an extent that the smoke sea of smoke clouds over the whole country but which has now diminished and shrunk back to the present limits of the valley. Again at the time when the tremendous fires of the Kauffmann forests were increasing, elsewhere an extensive sea of fire overspread the tract of forests lying to the east of Evangeline St. Claire threatening the city from the west, while the former threatened it from the

Yet such instances are too insignificant to allow us to doubt that battles in the form is very generally connected with the cause of these fires, particularly if we came after the battle of Guderline, it struck two weeks after, but it is not for now that it was necessary to the original formation of the combination. It is, whether it is a result of the battle or not, it is a very inflammable. It has caused one as the battle raged close to the margin of a very inflammable. The Guderline blast one the "baby" now as of the main centers of this great. The conflagration raged no less than one hundred and fifty miles from the original point of the battle, the battle, and it was not until early August that the fire came to Guderline and the Guderline is nearly twice as extensive, and there the fire now str. gk.

Now, and where the fire never struck. Do, daylight's junction the scene of the wars first most frightful battle of the plains in the Vivian Wickey Territory is 1600 miles from any forest fires, and the flames among forests occurred. Such facts as these tend to show that although a lightning strike was said to be some accessory of forest fires it is not in any way essential and I am obliged therefore to recourse to some other variety of forest fire sources differing from that which would attribute the cause of the flames or to the escape of highly heated matter that escaped from the crust of the earth.

where is an instance of one battle however that started a forest fire. Battle is not named here, but it was speedily overcome. The view of Hendro Dargur considered that the great waves of fire above referred to rise along the forests along both sides of the immense Rave Ravine, as if from hell's fissures opening in the earth's crust is one which is inherent inherently probable and is in keeping with observatio and that the Country of alverinia in Bengall tats in to a remark-remarkable. Recent fissured and torn in all directions for over five hundred miles by the force of terrific terrific explosions is a f war phenomena unfamiliar to all field geologists. Volcanic experts contradicted the reports that the horror was from volcanic eruptions from the ground, as first reports told. Such rents and fissures are said by the shocks of the explosions to have been strangely accompanied by displacements of the strata owing to which the crust has been rationally elevated on one side and lowered on the other and such a displacement caused the shore section of Abbeville city to sink into the lake to a depth of eight hundred feet. It is probably the only occasion he ever to that such fractures fractures are produced by any tremendous explosions. To make the statements still more puzzling, some reported that that if the horror were explosions, the fires started the explosions, and others say the explosions started the fires in the region. Starring stated the fires never started there, and what is more where the explosions occurred, there were no forests afire at the time, and the conflagration was yet then two hundred miles away.

But to go back to the fires. In the southwest of Evangeline St. Claire in the forest region which stretches across the country for many hundreds of miles often cut across by enormous deep ravines and small clearings and are great pine and evergreen forests.
 Nevertheless it can be scarcely a question that the grand wave of fire which stretched almost continuously along the southern forests and orth through daylight's County has piled up the smoke like a million volcanic eruptions. Far worse than the Krakatau eruption. In that as awful section and which has extended along the line a system of cloud seas unusual in sight.

The location of these combination fires for example are eminently suggestive of terrific blazes along the eastern northern Curve of the Arronburgs Run river also though not coincident therewith therewith.

As shown by Gingigore the forest fire waves are disposed in two parallel waves which though separate run side by side for a distance of hundreds of miles north ward into the Mic-Holleston Woods territory toward the city of Columbia and inclosing between them the high forested plains of Quico-Anna and the Quico-Anna Rivers...

Along the eastern territory are the great towns of El Alter with a population of 110,380 people and surrounded by an immense forest, and covered with moss and creeping vines. Then Coto Pariti, with 16,394 people, then Guamaniti and Cama Maya each with 19000 people, each apiece, huge towns in the probable path of the fire.
 The western territory contains even more inflammable forests. Here we find the Chiboranion creek a big deep stream whose territory is a vast sea of forests with a forest city of 15,888 people near a railroad running through the forest, a town called Atobazo and near by a small forest hamlet called Chirihuisa and Pincho both with a population of 30,320 each is the western territory, remarkable for its forest, the towns being planted in one grand procession from east to west. This arrangement of the western territory only more conspicuous than the eastern is very suggestive of a good feed for the forest fires.

And then we contemplate the prodigious quantity of flames raging within the margin of these enormous forest territory territories and their environments all of which were consumed all before them, we gain some idea of the manner in which the conflagration is spreading. Before Between the forest territories of Quico-Anna and Perula there is a hopeful intervening space of fourteen miles. This is occupied by farms. But from this clearing we find a new series of dense forest fire clouds continued northward till the river shore town of Jansao of 19,977 people is reached, then further north the more or less abandoned town of Jansao of a former population of 22,999 is reached forming an almost continuous range of towns facing the forest fire peril. Through the immense fire swept and endangered territory we find some clearing appearing at intervals and still more to the northward it is doubtless connected with the smaller forest towns of Coniapatia, Magell, and Fugo. Dargur considers that this great territory of forests lying north and south corresponds to the Mic-Holleston Woods lying somewhat to the east of the territory. A similar statement in all probability probably applies to the territories of forests of the Arronburgs, Mic-Whirther, and Marie Osborne Forests. Nor can it ever be reasonably doubted that the Mic-Holleston Run Valley has to a great extent been determined or marked out by greater and denser forests still, for as Dargur has shown by his investigations, the whole Mic-Holleston River Valley, for a distance of between two thousand and three thousand miles are densely forested, and when all this was catching fire there was evidence coming that all of alverinia, and Abyssinkile and other northern Abbevillean states would have no winter this coming year.

This stretch may also be cited in evidence of forest fire infernos along the ravines. It connects the forest blazes of the Arronburgs Run with those of the greater Evangeline St. Claire territory and the main danger started above is apparent.
 In the former region Dargur counted no fewer than thirteen mountain slopes looking like volcanoes in full eruption. In the Evangeline St. Claire territory Gingigore said it looked as if the country had sunk to the bottom of the infernal regions. The fire here is not burning so fast as those of the Arronburgs Run region but on the other hand they are more severe and destructive. According to the view of Dargur these forests are fast becoming a thing of the past.

Besides these immense fires ranging in lines of which we have treated above there are a large number which appear to not only be burning in groups or sporadically distributed over various portions of the forests but are spreading so fast as to seem to later join into one immense fire. I say appear to be, because this sporadic distribution may, really, be resolvable at least in some cases into linear distribution for short distances.

Then the population forest fires which might at first seem to be raging somewhere in the Mic-Holleston St. Claire as a center really resolve itself into a fire wave like a long line of active volcanoes ranging across the streams for many hundreds of miles.
 Again the smaller fires of Central Turne County which appear to be isolated indicate again the smaller fires of Central Turne County which appear to be isolated indicate then viewed in detail a general formation ranging from west to east. Another region over which the fire is distributed extend along the banks of the Arronburgs Run above Kautan and the Fallisumun creek, a fourth in Alungo, a fifth in Lake paleburg. These are all dangerous fires and the strange distribution is apparent. By far the most extensive regions with terrifically raging forest fires are those which are covered by flames as thick as the waters of the Ocean where the smoke mists in from under mountains of piles. These are to be found covering the like storm clouds, the end of the world. As Dargur and Schaefer have stated out, all the forest fires of southeastern alverinia are of alverinia's kind and the flames rise in great heights that is to say from 10,000 to twenty thousand feet. It is necessary here to attempt to exaggerate the height of these flames which can be seen rising in great grandeur at a great distance from the burning forests, or at least two hundred miles even on level ground. Like the scenes of great volcanic activity in the Atlantic County this first section first claims notice owing to the magnitude and number of its fierce forest fires and the variety variety of the accompanying phenomena, especially the far reaching heat waves felt for thousands of miles.

As Dargur has observed with the exception of the explosion, and flood disasters the most complete alverinian authorities records a series of tremendous disasters which continued during the whole war and which got to show that since the beginning of the war there has never been an interval of more than five days without either a fire, an eruptive explosion, flood, or a horrid massacre, or a great battle about a catastrophe for one side or the other.

So intense is the care energy in alverinia, and the desperate efforts, to be even by four means that some of the massacres have lasted six months without cessation. Explosion made earthquakes, have often shaken the whole immense State at once causing great changes in the interior, such as caused by great floods, the sliding down of the sides of hills, the rending of hills and mountains and the deserting of rivers off their channels, and the appearance of new lakes in the intervals between of disasters. Innumerable fires afford vent to the rages and insane madness of the immeasurable war.

It is all probabilities the gigantic southeastern alverinia forest fire are the worst of all disasters on all record. Gertrude Angelica early in 1912 saw the sections of two immense waves of fire one she believed a hundred and forty miles and the other six hundred miles in length, and fifty miles in width from the great height of at least five thousand feet above the level of the ground, and which according to the estimates of this girl scout raged and burned in enough territory to surpass in magnitude the seething hell itself. She took a good note of the enormous conflagration and watched the movements of both.

One of these fire seas the one not the longest, was racing ahead of the biggest and burned p onto the edge of a large lake and crossing the St. Josephs Creek ranged on both sides of it and while the heat completely dried up the stream, the size of the lake had no influence on the conflagration, and she could not believe by any means when she saw the flames surge into a new fire on the opposite side.
 He watched this great wave of fire rush on with a noise as she said, like a million tons of green being fired in a sawmill as wide as the burning area.
 He said the fire headed her way so fast that she put as she calls it a tail spin in her horse and escaped after a hard race.

It must be supposed however that the war will be more energetic than at present.
 The highest fury so far ended at Evangeline St. Claire, but this great battle is slightly surpassed by the conflict at Mic-Whirther which raged a day longer. Yet this great forest fire surging across the land its waves of fire rushing on like a wild fire, its smoke clouds often protruding far above vapor clouds must be an object of much interest and height when seen from a height after dark.
 The central conflagration with the flames rising up if from a vast hall makes a greater sight. Dargur who during a prolonged and dangerous visit to this forest made a careful observation of its extent and speed shows that the great fire is back grounded by mountainous clouds of rolling smoke, the leaping flames which are and then break through the clouds and rise high in rolling surges. Indeed this great cloud is penetrated by numerous flames.

At the left flank we find a convex surface or a "smudge plain" surrounded toward its eastern end by clouds of smoke extending probably 120,000 feet high, or probably more. The Slona County which contain a part of this great fire possesses by the banks of Fugo River a vary large Forest Ranger station. Near the Station is a block long shed filled with explosives. The rangers are working like mad to haul to east all this away as it is in the path of the fire. 170,000 tons of dynamite, and an equal amount of T.M.T.. If all this would explode—but let us hope they save it all, not of that the explosion may do but because without their explosives they are helpless helpless to fight the fire...

Hundreds of rangers fought around this shed, putting out small fires, and other things, while the rest hurried most of the explosives away as fast as they was possible. The fire was coming nearer, and nearer but nevertheless they were successful. And the fire only burned the shed.

The fire is going forth onward now past beyond North Bend as we left off in the adventures of Starring. The most extraordinary circumstances of the forest fire was why it had remained only in eastern alverinia, and did not spread west in a straight east, but while of course burning sometimes in that direction by spreading outward, always moved northward, or northward. The money loss is all this timber, including the cities and towns ruined by the flames is huge it probably can never be figured for years to come. The conflagration is usually being combated, by standing armies, forest rangers, citizens of towns and others, day and night, but it over advances on.

Now it so often a question, each, partially touched Evangeline St. Claire city is a mystery when that city was absolutely in its path. For most parts underlines never appeared to be in its path and yet was struck and utterly consumed.

It would seem that a million or more men would be able to stop the fire if the fire is so extended that nothing can stop it.

Prayers were offered by millions every day, and not only, know the number of masses offered, and also novenas, and litany and Rosaries, and no forth, and yet the fire so ardently prayed for, seemed not to come. Many would think of scoffing at the idea of praying for this, as it would indeed be a tremendous miracle, and survey another thing can be said; why is that that people in such a country, people that live up to their religion as they should do not receive an answer to their prayers. This question may seem extraordinary indeed, for when we come to the knowledge of millions of prayers answered every day, and these usually petitions of a kind which do not seem much account, it does seem almost unfair that the people in the country of Calavernia, in danger of losing their homes, their all and being refugees, should be unheeded when their prayers are sent up for the staying of the immense conflagration. But nevertheless would not there be a reason for that? And who were responsible for the fire? Glandelinus first of course. It seems even to the author that if this horror was a real fact, a thing going on in real life, what would be the response if prayers were offered for the destruction of the forest fire in this situation.

General Pargur was asked by his followers on one occasion: "Can you tell me sir, why it is that, as you know every offering, every kind of prayer is offered to heaven in vain and the horror goes on? You see it seems as if prayer is of no use, and won't it make the people be discouraged, of their faith be shaken?"

"I don't think so" said the general after thinking the matter over. "But this may be my opinion. The enemy are responsible for the conflagration, and the people know it. God you know has His own intentions, His own ways, and we know best. I would not doubt one bit, that Our blessed Lord, finds Glandelinus doing beyond His own endurance and that His refusal to answer the prayers just now from the unfortunate victims of Glandelinus has a way, a purpose. I think it might be that. The people are aroused against Glandelinus. Should he answer the prayers too soon, or at all, and stay the conflagration, would not the anger of the country cool down, and cause us a further disaster. You know He knows all, He knows and sees the future, and therefore He knows best how to act. It is a terrible thing indeed, this conflagration, and the other many awful disasters, but nevertheless I must say though you might be surprised at my saying, that I enjoyed their occurrence."

"And why pray my sir?"

"Because through these disasters, I see Glandelinus doomed."

"Doomed?"

"Yes. If you believe it not, you'll see when the time comes."

There were many who believed these predictions. For as it was written before the immense mobilizations were going on in northern Calavernia, Abbeinnia and others of the states. How far the conflagration might have reached since its start might be easily estimated, and would be indeed immeasurable. If it really occurred, it's starting point to compare distance, let's say, it started in Florida of the United States, in May 1912. When a September 1913 came, it had traveled all the way up to British Columbia in Canada, embracing if possible the whole United States all the way up not leaving a forest untouched, and threatening with total destruction of all the forests of southern Canada. Well that is the progress so far of the enormous forest fire. It seems impossible to calculate such a loss for figuring, and yet this is to be added by the losses caused by destruction of so many cities and towns from floods, other fires and explosions.

It is hard telling what would happen here, in the United States if such disasters came us such awful visitations. That situation would be no lone of the world across the water face. Such a situation is up to the reader to guess. But nevertheless the horror is enormous, the Abbeinnian Government is unyielding, and the whole nation is unyielding beyond endurance. It may be a long time yet, for the disasters will for a long time bar all advance of armies from the north, but Glandelinus really and surely is not doomed, but facing for her own side the most dreadful disaster on record, a disaster that will make that haughty nation fall down on her knees and implore for mercy and pardon, of which if she gets, she will be unusually lucky, though for a rebel nation Abbeinnia usually is savage, and gives no quarter.

MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE FROM THE RAFT.

OTHER ATTEMPTS TO SOLVE THE MYSTERY ABOUT THE DISAPPEARANCE OF ABBEINNA, FIRST OF THE LOSS, SOMETHING OF UNUSUAL.

It was by this time that all the others of Gertrude's boy and girl scout followers who had been in the plan to help in the work had arrived, with the army being close, and who had found their way to the big cabin on the same lumber raft that has been used with the trip down the flood, and now during this expedition down the Homa Run.

Jean had brought the tin box containing the very important papers of the Abbeinnian territory which Gertrude had recovered recently and she brought them to the cabin on the raft. Before retiring that night however, Gertrude placed the box with these important papers in a safe, and placed the safe on a square topped dresser close to her bedside close to a window. To have was all she had left the window locked up on a pin about five or six inches or more. At the advice of Starrling, Jean, and others far from Glandelinus spies within even her own force Gertrude pulled down the shade, and before going to bed barricaded herself in her room, left the lamp light burning, and slept with a pistol under her head, and a rifle in her arms for she would take no chances on its being stolen. During this time Jean, children, Jack Saunders and others were crowded about Starrling and had asked him how he and the Princess and others had fared in the adventure so far.

"We have had no of the slight best success so far," answered sleepily as he was sitting on his cot. "Before I was sent out I told Gertrude and Angelina Riche the outcome of the mission would be a failure."

"But what was the explosion?" asked Jean. "Explosions or something else?"

"We have found no evidence that they were no explosions," answered Starrling. "The explosions were some sort of munition blasts, but whether it was the enemy, or whether it was accidental I do not know. Only one third of Abbeinnia was untouched by the flood and that was the higher northern section. We have found every kind of evidence that the disaster was not of any volcanic upheaval whatever but nothing more."

The children were sadly disappointed at this, and at first thought Starrling had just said this either to try them, or because he was discouraged, but his statement was agreed by Jean, and her sisters Jeanie who said to children:

"We have found no clues whatever. We only know there was no volcanic eruption. Something exploded and that is all we know. Who was to blame, or whether it was an accident, or through some ones carelessness it is hard to find. The flood had covered the neighborhood where the craters are now, and left no trace of anything when it receded. So we are at a loss. And so far, regardless of what Pargur has told us, we have not in the least been misled. But—there are the tons. It's time for us all to turn in. We had every one."

This command was obeyed, but hardly any of the others could hardly sleep that night thinking of it. During the night too there was no noise of any kind, and having heard too that the Princess had been in general Manile's lines trying to learn something, and had failed because of the flood, they were still more discouraged, even though Jean and her sisters were not so, and were determined not to give up unless it was positive there was no clue. They had decided to go back to Manile's lines even to pretend to serve a till they got some secrets, but the others were taken in on their quest. However the plans of Jeanie, and her sisters were to be thrown to the dust, "exploded" as it were. Gertrude woke up in the morning, and the first thing she did was to take a look at the dresser top. She received a shock. The window shade was up, and the safe and the box with the plans were gone.

"What she cried. "Can I be one of them? That's all right. I was."

She hastily got up, almost throwing her gown to the floor.

"My heavens!" she exclaimed. "The most important plans with the safe gone."

For a full fifteen minutes she stood there as if she had been nailed to the floor. She looked around the room, and saw everywhere everything in it as she had left it, the door was closed and locked and the key was in the door. How did the spy get in? And where? Was it a plumbing boy, or a scout or a messenger soldier very slick and shrewd? Had he hid in the room on the floor? But if he had how could he have gotten out? These were the questions she should ask herself. In fact she was beside herself. The great and most important plans---GON V. How, and where?

"I wonder who pulled that shade up!" she demanded to herself as she slowly and with difficulty managed to rise the low dresser. "I am sure I pulled it down before I went to bed. It couldn't have gone up itself, for it would have made a noise if it did."

She glanced quickly around the room, and with a pistol in her hand pulled up the overhanging bed covers and glanced under bed but no one was there.

"How did they do it?" she thought to herself. "The room is exactly as I left it,---not a single thing has been disturbed. I am sure I looked in the closet before I retired and locked it,---it is still locked and the key is in the door the way I left it---the window is down a few inches from the top---but it is locked from the inside by an old-fashioned iron peg---and no one is thin enough to have crawled through it, not even a baby---besides there were some subways in it, and they are still there---the other door is heavily locked and positively no other entrance to the room, and the window itself is forty feet above the ground, and twenty feet above the raft floor. So I wonder how,---could something tell me how they got that safe?"

She went to the window and looked out without disturbing it hoping to see foot prints on the ground beyond the raft, but not even a trace of that. She removed the bar of the entrance door, and sounded the alarm by firing her pistol five times. About an hour later the whole army knew of Gertrude's mysterious loss. It was the puzzle of the age. Everybody wondered how the spy stole the safe with the important plans in it.

"Violet said: 'How could he take it from Gertrude's cabin room on that raft when the door was barricaded, closet locked, window locked from the inside, and no other means of entry. And all the while Gertrude had been guarding it with her rifle. It seems a strange phenomenon to me. I'm thinking he might have snatched some how through that open window but how?'"

"It is unusually strange," said Catherine. "If I hadn't seen her put it there, I would have believed she had dropped it of the whole thing. But it is gone. There is one thing I do know, and that is the spy, or thief got it somehow by that window. And I'm going to have the experts come and examine it. Fast I'll call up Angelina when by our army wireless and notify her of the loss."

She went to the telephone in general Aronhurns room and and it wasn't long before Angelina's voice in answer to the inquiry on the phone was from first to Violet, and her sisters, and then with them to the big cabin on the raft.

"Is Gertrude here yet?" she asked of George Zimmerman the new boy scout captain who was on the raft.

"Yes," he answered, "she lost---"

"I know she did," interrupted George A. Angelina Richman. "We wished to find out the details. We have four Gemini members with us who wish to find out the details. We'll be right there."

"How could he do that?" she asked George.

"We don't know," put in one of the Gemini members. "We don't know any other way, the way she had the door barricaded her bedded. I am sure he got it through the open top window."

They entered the cabin and found Gertrude almost weeping over her loss. This was the second time she had lost the important papers.

"The window is just as I left it," she said. "And you see the subways are still there, and its locked from the inside."

This time the Gemini members were with the party, and the famous boy scout Adelfoh his son also and after they looked at the window they wondered how it could have been so easily taken. Violet's sister said that the spy could have climbed through that open window if the lock was broken.

"I think you are mistaken Princess," said Adelfoh. "No one could climb through that open window if it is too small. And if he could he couldn't get down without jumping, and making a lot of noise, and if he did it would have woken Miss Aronhurn and she would have had him at her mercy."

"He must have done it from the outside," exclaimed Jennie.

"H. James" and Adelfoh his son also and after they looked at the window they wondered how it could have been so easily taken. Violet's sister said that the spy could have climbed through that open window if the lock was broken.

Getting a step ladder Adelfoh climbed to the top and with a strong "detective's" magnifying glass looked over every inch of the window casing, floor, and even the curtain, and still and finally remarked:

"I'm positive it is not done from the inside. There isn't a crack in the floor, not a finger print of any kind to be found. But why is this curtain in its place so heavy? Miss Aronhurn he asked."

"I don't know," she answered, "I didn't know it was heavy."

She felt of it but couldn't understand. She took a knife and cut it from the string, and said to Angelina's Richman "Cut it open if you can and see what's inside."

"Then said George Zimmerman that German boy scout. "Oh Gertrude what do these mean? What are they for?"

"What for?" she asked.

"Then under the window sill."

"What?" she asked. "Are there pegs under the sill. There were none yesterday."

And she looked, and saw there were two pegs, and then she picked up a small square slab of still lying on the floor beneath the window sill, a string and a rope attached to something on the floor.

At this moment the other boy came in and said to Violet "You are wanted outside Princess."

Everyone was outside.

"The only clue so far," said the Gemini members. "It's very strange though. On the floor nearby boards of the raft in some footprints of sand which outside the window."

They all took a good look and saw it was true.

"How that seems absurd," said Angelina's Richman. "Why it's the print of a one armed man with a left foot."

"But there is no mark of a wooden leg or a crutch," said Jennie.

"If he was a cripple how could he reach up there without climbing a rope, and besides he couldn't walk without a crutch or cane."

"I'm positive there's something wrong," said Gertrude. "He was a man with two left shoes. Here was the footprints to the side of the raft where they were lost. He came here by a boat no doubt."

The others were examining the tall about the pole that stood about eight feet away from the cabin window, which was also twenty feet above the raft floor. Being shrewd girls they began to almost right away solve the mystery.

"What's it was an inside job," said Jennie.

"Inside job was said Angelina's Richman. "Why the only people in the world who were in the safe was I, the Princess and Gertrude, and also one of the officers Colonel Gruntlemore."

"Exactly Miss Richman," exclaimed Jean. "You and Gertrude, and the Princess were at the army headquarters before this night of the strange robbery. Well I don't need a paper and pencil to finger a finger right from ten I have two."

"But, how utterly ridiculous. The Colonel couldn't get in the place through that little opening in the window."

"Well I didn't noticed anyone saying they don't miss him this morning from the ranks Angelina. Of course too little," she continued. "I ain't succeeding the colonel of anything, but personally if I wanted to keep a cat out of the house, I'd never learn it how to open a milk bottle."

"You said something that time," Jean said Angelina's Richman. "So the Colonel is missing. She turned to one of the men. "Miss Aronhurn's Adventure of Violet, that Colonel Gruntlemore is missing, and there they give orders not to let any one out of the lines until a strict search has been made. Capture any one with a square shouldered package."

The general was notified by telephone.

Then Gertrude called up Radcliffe who was in the army headquarters. "What's the news?" she said. "Isn't it dreadful. The safe and the plan a stolen. Of course according to Violet, and her sisters everything about the investigation about Adelfoh will have to be postponed, until we find it and the spy who stole it. Of course we couldn't think of going on with the work without following those plans. It would be impossible."

"What's the sudden news from Radcliffe. I'll be over as soon as possible," said Jennie.

In the meantime poor Gertrude was beside herself, and every one else too were greatly worried. The most important thing was, right had not only lost the most precious plans ever in her possession, but with the loss there was no chance of continuing the investigations around Abilene. These plans were necessary, without them all work would have to be postponed. Right had hoped to see this date set for the next morning as success of all scouts in history. Now it was apparent that the work would not be able to continue. And Calverlin, poor Calverlin, Heaven help Calverlin now.

She murmured to herself: "We build our statues of snow, and when to see them melt. Noon time came and yet there was no sign of good luck or any news of the plans. Gertrude was beside herself, she felt she not only lost them but—plans were ever known but a couple of weeks. At that time Radcliffe came in, and after a few words, said:

"You told me yesterday that an officer by the name of Colonel Grail Gruntlemore was the last person in the room the night of the robbery before you closed up. Will you repeat the words he said again to you just before he left?"

"He said," answered Gertrude, "but I believe he was joking. What foolishness it was for me to keep such plans, and that if I didn't hide it he might sneak in and steal it."

"I see," said Radcliffe, looking up at the widow window. "Was that window open this morning?"

"Yes," she answered.

"Well, Gertrude, you must have done a foolish thing, in leaving a safe on a table near an open window. Why did you open it for?"

"But the funny thing is," she exclaimed, "was that I did not know it was even open till this morning. I never opened it."

"Never?"

"Yes."

"Wasn't it open during the day the yesterday?"

"Certainly not. Before going to bed last night I did open another window at the top over there but only for a few minutes and then closed it. I never touched this one, only pulled the shade down all the way. I was half dead before."

"I'm positively sure Gruntlemore or Gruntlemore whatever his name is is the thief," said Radcliffe. He will be captured soon if he didn't leave the lines."

"And indeed he didn't. He did not have the chance for before he could get as far as the entry lines General Aramburg had sent in all orders to arrest anyone carrying any package as long as it was a square one or an oblong one, and not to let them go until the package was examined. This was done with Gruntlemore, and the safe was found in his possession."

"So Mr Gruntlemore," the guard said with a grin. "You're the money want."

"Who me?"

"Yes you. And Heaven help you. You'll look like a lamb when you face that dangerous girl scout leader and the Princesses. You are a spy are you not?"

"No I'm a former Englishman."

"Have any connections with Glandelin?"

"With who?"

"You'll find out. Here John. To another soldier. Get your squad. I've got the thief."

"You have?"

"Yes."

The man rode up and looked at the safe. Gertrude's name was on it.

The squad was called, and the man was forced to walk all the distance while he was under guard, the soldier who had found the safe accompanying him. "Are you a workman?" Demanded the soldier whose name was John.

"Yes."

"Say YES. You dumbell not YES. What's your occupation. I'm a Christian dog."

"You are, Mr Gruntlemore. Well that's good. Do you like it?"

"No sir."

"What's your first name?"

"George."

"For who did you steal that safe?"

"I needed the money."

"You did. How did you know there was money in it?"

"Gertrude told me so."

"Gertrude did not," retorted the soldier. "You're a professional thief that is what you are. There are plans in that safe and you know it. You are either a thief, or a spy. You're luckier if you intended that just for spying purposes. But if you are a thief you will find out something worse. We don't even condemn unsuccessful plans to death, that is not our method but a thief thief always gets a neck the party."

"A what?"

"You'll find out."

It was some hours before the fellow was brought into the right part of the lines and thence to the river.

"Get in that boat," said the soldier, "and be quick about it."

The man obeyed as to resist was useless, and he was rowed over to the raft in short order. Then he was brought before Gertrude and the Princesses who were with her this time and Radcliffe, and Peared too was there.

"Here's the spy or thief," said the guard showing him up into the cabin. "He had the safe."

"You alone know the combination Gertrude," said John. "Open it and see if it is still there."

Gertrude did, but to her great dismay it was empty.

"So this is the way you spies work it out," said John. "What did you do with the papers?"

"There was no papers in the safe," said the spy with a successful gleam in his eyes. "I knew I couldn't get away, and I duplicated this one for the one I took. It's in the hands of the foe. You are in for it now. You will not succeed in your work."

"So this is the way you put it over on me," he said furiously. After that he made all these preparations and wait all this time for our chances to arrive, you dirty good for nothing workman who have no business being here at all side with the enemy of our own country, and make a fool of me before the whole world. You call yourself a successful spy. If plans and papers mean more to you and the wicked country you workman serve—you can have this Geography too," and she threw the book as swiftly as she could, and the end of it took him right in the eye with such force as to know knock him sprawling. The end of the book literally put his eye out.

"That ends it," she screamed wildly. "But what's to become of us. I've been patient—and I've been square with all the Christian world. And now I'm like a girl left at the altar owing my husband millions of dollars money which I stole from him. That's how I feel. What in the world shall I do. Plans gone, and everything."

The man with his face covered with blood was lifted onto a chair and his face cleaned and bandaged.

Of all the scouts Gertrude was the most sure. She realized for once in her life a spy had gotten the best of her. If it had been an ordinary Glandelinian she would not have taken it so much to heart. But he was a former Englishman. Trying to calm herself at last she said:

"I suppose your country is the same like Glandelin, equally as wicked. You are robber of us children, you child scouts who have gone through suffering, and made us four our own Goun try. A man of your kind should know what kind of a nation Glandelin is. Tell me how you get that safe out of this room, or I'll have you face the firing squad even in your condition as you are. I won't show no mercy to a former who do us wrongs us, and in our own uniforms."

The secret indeed was out. The mystery solved. The one known as Colonel Gruntlemore was the spy thief. He answered:

"I had information that you would keep the papers in the safe."

"How came you the information?" Demanded Gertrude in the safe."

"I don't know who they were, but they were also former," she answered. "They looked like the person in the White and Jeff King line. Oh my eyes."

"How did you work the scheme to get the safe up through that window from the outside?" asked Radcliffe.

"Knowing the first thing that Gertrude would do before getting out would be to pull down the shade of this window I had a carpenter secretly secure above the rib on the shade pull down a wire did as much as to make a hole in the window sill. A rope at the end of the wire was fastened to the top of the shade and a steel bolt through the rope, a rope was tied to the top of her safe, the other end of the rope tied to the top of the safe or I mean tied to a strong piece of upholstery which was tied to the piece of steel when Gertrude pulled down the shade the magnet touched the steel and gave it to it. Then all I had to do that "I don't care what any of you say here," said Angella, a Jesuit. "I'm sure the enemy is trying to hide something. He is guilty of. First at the beginning of the expedition, Gertrude, you being deceived through some fraud letter as you showed us recently fired upon Starling thinking he was one of those Professional spies trying to shoot you. Then they themselves, that is the spies, attacked Starling on the cliffs. Then the forest fire followed us up here, and general Aronburg's army almost was lost, and the general badly burned himself in trying to rescue others. Starring, whether his rescuer, think of it a boy. Then then Hildebrand forced retreat, and general Jivens threw battle against the flames rushing on his army through the Red Riding Hood Woods in an unlikely manner. Then this robbery of Gertrude's plane. This does put Glendolinda absolutely under suspicion. If she is not guilty of the destruction of Abbeville, and the explosion, why is she doing all this?"

If one could answer a single word, but looked at her sternly at the wall.

It seemed when they came to give green the situation that it did look strangely queer. Every attempt which others had not noticed but Gertrude had, had been made to frustrate them in their work. At first they did not see it in that light, and had believed that all that was done just for the military purposes of the Glendolinda's armies. Now everything seemed clear. The Glendolindians were trying to prevent something from being discovered, something that might still be traced to the explosion scenes or elsewhere. "Obviously," he said, "in his and Jean's hands were right. As long as these two child scouts had been known, it had been found they were the one surest and brightest of them all. However they had soldier spoken off always come out to be true."

"But that is something to be looked into," said Jean. "You three girls are right. At first we didn't pay any attention to these things. But anyhow whatever it is we have to keep our eyes open. That loss of Gertrude's plane should make us more suspicious than ever. Of course those planes would as you may say not really fulfill the enemy any because to the enemy they are mere scraps of paper of no account, but to Gertrude and us they were a great help to our work. The loss tops us a lot. It all, and ought to make us suspicious. But you must remember too, that just being suspicious does not bring any results. Our loss, and the queer tricks on us, and of Gertrude's soundings starring by mistake, through that fraud letter does not give any evidence of the kind that can enable us to prove Glendolinda did it. The evidence must be found around Abbeville, or in the Abbeville or-----"

"The world will still continue to think that the d's sister was of volcanic origin," said Jean. "And histories then will be published about the 'GREATST VOLCANIC ERECTION IN THE WORLD', and Abbeville then can do nothing to Glendolinda about it."

"They nearly believe that now," said Gladys. "I too read a magazine which had a written story of it already. It is already going to go in to history as such a thing. If we want to prevent this we must do something quick."

"What shall we do?" asked Jean.

"Continue the work in spite of this loss. I can work around the craters, as that was suggested. It's best now though I believe to stay away from the enemy camp. Try and learn anything there will be futile."

"I believe," said Catherine, "that the enemy will try his best to hinder us in our work in all ways possible. So may even while making our investigations find ourselves under them, and our major number of us might be killed. I am just thinking of-----"

"Thinking of what?" asked her sister, Daisy.

"We have both general Jivens here, and also we have Don Centinim Aronburg, and Hildebrand. Couldn't it be possible to drive the enemy out of here. It is now concentrated ground but in case of this grave necessity it would not be wrong to wage a battle, in order to clear the region so we can work in peace."

"But suppose the enemy wins?" asked Hildebrand.

"Oh, please," said Jean. "You are always thinking the enemy is going to win the war." "We can have Hildebrand offered that the right would be a good success."

"But is a serious discussion," said Jean. "I myself don't believe it'll work, but we can speak it over with general Jivens. Aronburg and the others. They are great military leaders, and know best."

"But how about Tenley? Won't he interfere?"

"Maybe he could be taken care of," said Violet. "I am thinking myself of striking him first, but if to surprise him, the others far better off would come up to join the battle, and the conflict would be a deeper one than we want."

"That's the difference as long as it is a successful issue," said Angella. "Hildebrand, please."

"But think the size of the armies will you?" said Violet. "Hildebrand is fifty million strong, and the others are 100,000,000 strong. That would make a battle that is worse than any if they joined in on an immense territory."

"And maybe the armies under general Jivens, his brother, and general Aronburg may get the best of it," said Hildebrand.

"We would have to take the chance," said Jean. "But I don't believe it would be so. But what we fear, is that the battle would be such a bloody one that it would appeal the world."

"But it can't be helped if we want to continue our work without hindrance," said Catherine. "For once I vote."

"Aye to my plan."

"What about you others?" asked Violet. "All in favor say aye."

"Says aye, and others said no, but the majority were for aye."

"The eyes have it," said Violet. "Violet."

"Don't you try?"

"No one answered to that."

"We can speak it up with the generals after breakfast," said Jean.

"It will be best to leave the matter in their hands."

"When do you think it is best to have them strike?" asked Dorcas.

"It's up to the generals," said Catherine. "They know best, how and when to do it. And we can't worry also on Hildebrand. Hildebrand's a good fighter and a shrewd soldier you know. If he does the best that best war, the battle will come out a success."

For them all the breakfast was a silent one. Hildebrand, Hildebrand and his scouts on their leaders made a work word and clouds seemed to surround them all. After breakfast was over the girls and Jean, again with Violet, and her sisters consulted about the last plan, and then the matter was taken up about having the generals in the cockpit. The generals however had had a late breakfast, because for once in his life their cooks had failed to get up in time to fix breakfast. But the three main generals who were requested to come for the interview, arrived at the headquarters of Violet, and her sisters at about 9 A.M. In the morning the viceroy general indeed told Gertrude how they felt sorry for her loss, but did not see how it could be possible that it could stop the work if it was desirable to be done. General Jivens said:

"It cannot be possible that any man as laid by the enemy could have been put into any of those subways or tunnels running north from the city of Abbeville, for the Gemini investigated all these, and the 'explosion craters' are not even in that locality. The only clues can be found in the immediate vicinity of any one of the fourteen craters and where else. I'm absolutely positive of that. As to your suggestion of making battle on the enemy on that territory, we can do that, but we will have to bid time. First we must learn what positions the Tremelines have, and others, and the strength of them. You know it is necessary to be wise, and shrewd and not rash, nor overcautious either. Our confidence in presumption too is the worst. This is a on your record, and besides we must depend on the weather. As are arriving into the early fall season, then the worst weather comes on. If the decrease of the weather still continues it's all the better. But we will be willing to do so. But the Hildebrand and the Tremelines combined make a powerful Glendolinda army and it is therefore wiser to not proceed. This is now September the fifteenth, and it is the time the weather up here usually takes a turn for the worst. It'll be getting colder anyway. If it is dry, and though the weather is a sort of hindrance to the enemy it does not affect the armies under the Tremelines, as they are used to it by now."

"I believe," said Hildebrand, hereafter "It is impossible for our country to win the war. Sentenced all over the south country of Catherine into a through-out southern Angella in too many many armies of Glendolinda soldiers, and also as the war began they had have represented a certain degree of development. The sudden and could formations of such armies tells us of a dangerous rebellion among the foe, the excitement prevail in everywhere illustrating the rise of their arms, and the decline of the Angellian armies, and this awful disaster itself affords a a picture of what may remain long after these great forest fires have been extinguished and the floods abate."

"How can you wildred men put such an explanation," said Violet.

"Why the building up of the enemy theory is not supposed to do and entirely on mobilization of troops by collection to or any other situation surrounding their cause, but the main agency is assumed to be a general progress of those already in action against us, resulting probably from the larger resistance of smaller armies, and by armies under out very good and drilled officers. The awful condition of Calvernia produced by these disasters we are trying to investigate, of the forest fires, and the length of time the enemy is holding out against the besieging armies at various points indicates that the world never expects us to win the war, but that "land's inland" is the successful side. This flood, as any explanation of the disasters dominated the world's thought from the date of its occurrence, June the first of this year and the statement of it being a volcanic eruption as received almost universal acceptance, and though recent destructive critic activities had proved that the disaster disaster was not of volcanic eruption and earthily upheavals and that the idea must be abandoned, it must be said however that the great flood for some unknown reason shows evidence of progressive development instead of abatement, and so many other disasters have been found to occur in difference stages, with fires in flames that it is impossible to start a series showing consecutive stages up to the time of this month, while despite all in vain investigations the mystery of the cause of the disasters remains unsolved, the flood still has great velocity of movement, too great for any one to halt it or so by itself alone, and yet by the aid of the wireless telegraph many other disasters have been brought to our knowledge ranging in character, from volcanic activities interspersed with triple and conglomeration of disasters, to the definite outlines and highly suggestive forest fires in other parts of the world, and of all the disasters we know of or do not know of these we are trying to investigate suggest the operation of one process of the enemy in trying to prevent mobilization of armies. If we do not succeed in our mission here, I know positively we'll never lick Glandinia."

"You have made quite an unusual lecture," said Violet. "But how about this?"

In July, about the first or second this month, observers on the tipsters looking over the whole territory in the neighborhood of Abbienn, discovered a foul like a monkey wrench lying on distance off the crater's edge and this was of little consequence up to that time the most significant hope of the future for us. Of course this loss of Abbienn is a blow not only to our nation but the world in general. This beautiful city which at the recent time stood alone all others as the best city of all kind has now come to be regarded as a thing of the past and the most serious catastrophe of all. The horrors of this disaster of course angers most strongly to the imagination, the largest disaster of all these European suffer this great flood, in perhaps the most interesting and shocking one of all time, and it is so extensive and the dimensions so enormous as to be beyond comparison of all disasters known, although the only evidence has not yet come to light many other disasters as you may wildred has already been known causes have been discovered, and fastened on the enemy, each disaster showing different stages of a development, and the investigation of hundreds of the Glandinia and scientists have to a great extent solved the riddle and proved that the enemy was responsible. The enemy's efforts to throw us off the track have shown such at the time here also. The power of the flood establishes it as the chief of all the disasters though, and the records of its effects are evidence of the spectral horror which is supposed to characterize the different stages of the flood. Many of the disaster we have seen of the past, including the mercuric explosion, flood, fire, and numerous type have enough evidence to bring the whole Christian world against the enemy. As the flood disasters are as certainly brought on by explosions only the theory of development must embrace both types, and that we have to wait before we can resume the work to morrow. Through loss of caution by the Calvernia government, our important rivers and dams and lakes are now in a perilous position, and such a condition can be regarded as representing the first period of the coming of disasters. Our big forest fires are said by many witnesses to be most marvelous, and yet they hinder a great deal in our work. The conglomeration of such a mass of fires from all those burning forests and one involving the destruction of a great amount of heat, the flames grow hotter as time as they spread more and more. They are impossible to battle now. Going on with these forest fires are the afternoon phenomena of darkness of another, heat over the whole country above normal for the day, and our tired darkness in the sky so long with little or no sunlight at all, without going into further detail. There is a general acceptance of the theory that there exists between some of these explosion craters, and more about in left of Abbienn alive or infinite as to how little doubt that caused the disaster, for we can fear the worst as wildred as a very possibly in the another corner or later, for the gradual cooling of the atmosphere by absorption of the forest fires with development of waves heat elsewhere by new fires due to combustion of carbon 1. Nowon will produce storms as we have never seen before and may hinder a good deal our off-against the enemy.

All our disasters show definite progressive lines forming the basis of a system of classification, their size, and form are indications of what they contain, and of their duration there seem to indicate yet and such disaster need to be separated into five size classes by these two principles."

"This flood is a force in its fifth stage," said General Vivion, it was starting early in July but was added by other big flood following no such phenomena. With the appearance of the disaster, the surface of the ocean underneath the water seems to have undergone vast changes in flood details, caused by the water pressure and the speed of the current which is past the rocks followed by the operation of dyke bursting but are I supposed being followed by readjustments of the surface of the ocean. It is supposed that we are to have a great deal of rain as the conditions brought on by disaster will make underlings somewhat dangerous to fight a battle on such ground would be equally dangerous for both sides. Underground here where unequal strains must be broken up set up at different points due to the effects of the explosions, and when shocked by battle these strains may cause some of the ruptures in the surface, and we might meet with disaster. The investigations that you said I continue to take only remain safe by the recovery of the plane that got lost. And following the flood waters into a nearly vast inland sea, the first process of stages in investigations would be a cooling of this to normal form weather, accompanied by well needed rains or snows, but the adding of these forest fires develop increasing heat daily and act on the different elements of the weather according to their particular properties, and therefore develop out of storms which cannot occur under such conditions because of a general heat from the disasters. The result is that Calvernia and her neighboring states are completely prostrated with the effects. These forest fires raise the temperature throughout our country for higher than would exist under other circumstances. These forest fires are called by the Europeans "the Red Plague" as you all know, under ordinary conditions we know only as "flood", but when great weather conditions the sea is said to be changed into a state of combustion accompanied by glowing lights and terrific heat. This is the case as flows come to the surface to be felt in the day, and temperature drops in the cities. There is then the ten gases, Hydrogen, Nitrogen, Oxygen, Chlorine, Fluorine, Helium, Argon, Krypton, Neon, and Xenon exist also in these forest fires due to abnormal chemical action produced by the heat of the flames. I suppose too these gases are carried in a state of intense heat. The chemicals can be caused by the materials that are floating. These ideas will cause a very bad reduction in our trees, and the demand for building material will be out of the question.

The most important discoveries for the cause of the disaster and their consequences, as the case of urban disorders, urging us to have the sea protected, whether by electric batteries or by other means, providing what the explosives were. The disasters of this and of Lake St. Louis are divided into two classes, and they include not only the unknown sources of the flood waters, but the sweeping and overwhelming of the rivers. The Lake St. Louis flood came only from that lake. Referring moreover to previous conditions, this flood is to be investigated the next. The heat rays from the forest fires pass parallel to the ground and through the atmosphere, but the heat is not as rapidly passed out into space for the end need it is not but after 2 in suspension suspended in the air. "Maybe we" said General Hansen "there was not too many left to cover what I discover what was going on since all these dreadful and bloody massacres have occurred, the investigations of the problem has greatly extended our knowledge, and because of the conditions of the horrible conditions have added greatly, but while the forest has been so badly covered at no cause of this big flood have not been fully discovered. Fresh things back to the roots of the conflict with the Giant Little Man, much disaster has been discovered to be getting bigger and bigger, in fact it was the wonderful and very tremendous All-Form action which even the "A" movement is a tremendous destruction. Because now we are at the edge of the flood even at the last further ending or southern end of a station that the waters of the flood are unparallel with any other end of this, and therefore therefore I believe the present of the ending will have developed the month of the past the flood will be the ending with the existence

But there is a considerable loss of detail which the first edition nullifies and makes the third if the film were ever made but most of the places are not low level ground but are about the same as the hills and valleys.

"But" said Stirling "I believe the explosion disasters cover in themselves the whole of the subject. The ground movement of the largest craters has not broken into the great lumps and one of these was the enormous mound of earth which formed the mountain which later became Mt. San Jacinto tearing the surface of the country apart in west and east lines, with great deep basins between them into which the waters of the sea of the flood had flowed forming the two lakes to which no such thing ever existed near Abilene before. Since the time of this great unknown "convulsion" which many think now is a "Volcanic disturbance", strange transformations had taken place which marked by the different strata of the surface to new conditions this no doubt being or have been produced by the force of the great explosions. The mountain ridges have been caused no doubt by the terrific shocks of the explosions. Strange the enormous horizontal cracks for hundreds of miles have been recognized in many parts of the explosion territory as important factors as a result of the explosions and the convulsions they produced, the ground between each crack has been thrown into a series of undulations undulations, and can be more steeply inclined than the other. These cracks are widest near the "volcanic craters" and very small mounds of earth are overturned. These strange events must have taken place very widely even though the strata affected by the concussion of the blasts lay deeply beneath many thousands of feet of deposit, even countries have been involved in the disaster by their crater slopes shaken down into tremendous landslides which burst down, of course I suppose not due to the cause of this volcanic disaster have been suddenly or gradually carried away or raised either by flood or fire. The force of the flood no doubt was like a conflagration has been great enough to cause the great destruction of the whole of the world and the little of the world.

The starting of these diasters on the Pacific are less known because of the destroyed communications, and the fulfillment of all the diasters are little known because the results of their operations have arrived some time later than could be used in communications. It is just as if a state of exchange tension resulted, but no doubt are very intense. The present changes of this diaster probably took place during late May during which this ocean of water covered one quarter of Antarctica in a section of northern Australia and other station, with waters by their enormous pressure and weight has reached very massive tide. (Q14th - Answer) The destructions were not the only cause of the flood

According to statements which changed the condition of the ground surface yet they were a very important element especially in their force in sinking down the walls of river lake and dams. I believe it was in this way this big flood was caused for we should know that great lakes dried in were situated some distance north of Abbotsburg, between Lake Shasta, Lake St. Ann, Lake Min-Hill and others, which would flow the land if their levees ever burst. Of course disaster was followed by another as we know, and with each a new wave of life was added with the result that the world believe now it was a tremendous volcanic upheaval. As the nearest volcano to Abbotsburg is Mt. Golconda, and that is three hundred and sixty miles away. It seems to be these disaster have increased as our resistance to the enemy has increased, disasters occurred more violent and wide spread, and the flooding and the burning of the country now have and all is complicated. Such a disaster seems impossible to solve.

One of these is the tremendous flood idea produced by the concretion, and the other is the idea of a volcano. The flood idea we have divided into two classes, those of the lower hills and those from the mountain slopes the latter is the latter which were greater, and I believe that these blasts were as great as any and interior explosions that the world may be, and at the same time, the tremendous effects of the explosions took place as if working chemical reactions throughout the region, and everything we have discovered was forced up into the air and scattered all over the country, but I have never discovered anything that anyone would ever give signs of a volcano eruption. The effects of the flood idea has long been gone, it seems and therefore the unusual strain due to the lesser force Government which seems powerful enough to allow an enemy to overcome us as Mildred says seems yet only intermittent that it cannot be depended on. The force of the explosions have caused the earth to crumble into small folds, the hills forming deep pits with a double shell when the explosion was not severe, and characteristics we where the explosions were of the greatest force.

The first explosions were did tear great fissures in the ground near the city of Abbotsburg which it is all the floods had filled up to a flood over all the surrounding country. No example of such great disasters have occurred in any historic times, but there is abundant evidence that other great disasters have occurred in the earlier period of the wars of which we are positively ignorant of, yet what is strangest of the disaster is of the great fissures that have opened in the earth for this distance of five hundred miles, yet not deep enough to engulf the flood waters, they are numerous and more widely opened than fissures caused by earth tremors, and yet these openings connect with the craters from one to the other for their entire length some believe if it had not been for these fissures the flood would have spread over all the country of California. Nearly all these large groups of craters are level with the ground have no evidence of having been from volcanic activity, have no cones or inner craters and are filled a half way to the brim with water. If they had been formed by volcanic activity they would be in cones of great height rising from these level plains and would have interior cones. That proves they were not produced by volcanic activity.

"But," said Mildred "how can it be proved that these craters were not produced by volcanic eruptions? Volcanoes do throw materials such as lava, ash, and rock and even clay and gravel all over the place and can't it be proved?"

"There is no proof," said Jean herself. "Didn't you ever read or study history?"

"Yes I have," said she answered. "but what has that got to do with it? I can even explain anything in such geographical history!"

"Explain," said Mildred "in the fashion of a geologist."

"A volcano is a mountain that blows. In the fashion of a geologist, it is a small or very high and to be great an opening in the earth's crust which is overflowing with the magma through which the products of interior contraction are thrown out in the shape of water, steam, gas, or molten stone called lava, the motion is all in a downward from below by the explosive power of the magma and is spread on the surface where it accumulates and gets hard. A volcanic cone may be built up either on the land or floor where a fissure allows the gaseous activity to assert itself, the surface opening is connected with the homogeneous medium of the interior by a pipe through with the lava. The pipe is lava, and that is to the formation of the cone. The lava is a mass of the stones, dust and other materials which are fused together, and the materials to other and with the chemical action of the lava the entire magma is formed into a sort of rock stone called tuff. cones may rise in the center but a very hot or fluid lava is from the center forms a hill with a gentle slope, a cooler or more viscous lava, which becomes solid more solidly, or one formed of stone not melted, probably an of lapilli or sand formed or for a forms a steep mound, at the opening on top there is a cup shaped hollow or called the crater, which is formed in the upper cone this cone would be continually built up around the crater by successive eruptions. In the course of time therefore when the volcano is becoming extinct the cone becomes breached on one side and slowly disintegrates leaving perhaps nothing to show the previous existence of the volcano but a solitary hill land or mesa which is the lava that solidified in the throat of the volcano when it became extinct.

"You are," said it that time. "said general Vivian. "Yet there is no such evidence here. The craters which are level with the ground are divided into two classes, according to the force of the blasts. Some are small and eruptions each such would not have lasted a second but would have continued. The great majority of these craters are as big as those of real volcanoes, in fact some are bigger."

"Did any witnesses ever see any of this during the explosions?" asked Mildred. "I don't know," said general Vivian. "It goes as this, did they see in the following order: The electric cloud followed by disruptive discharges, steam, water or gases from these fissures or long holes in the ground, hydrogen flames bursting from the center, dark heavy clouds of steam color of volcanic dust rising to a great height and spreading out at the top in the shape of a pine tree which gradually dwindled as the lightning changed from dust to sand, ash, and lapilli stones, lighter colored steam billowing out in rolling clouds, called the cauliflower shape, or of variegated colors charged with gases and brilliant with electric discharges followed by torrents of rain and rivers of mud or lava. Did they see all that during each of the explosions?"

"They saw great clouds, flashes below the horizon but nothing else than that," answered general Vivian.

"But," said general Vivian. "new papers published that the disaster was caused by volcanic eruptions," said general Vivian.

"I have seen that," said Mildred. "and one paper said the lava rushed out in a great flood and that some explosion drove a hole through the mountain side and sent out horizontally as from a gun a volume of incandescent and gas that destroyed Abbotsburg, that the top of the mountain near Abbotsburg had been blown off, and that the mountain that stood where these craters are now had been totally annihilated so as to be level with the ground."

"But," said Jean. "the reporter that wrote that must have had a vision in his mind. There never has been a mountain so close to this neighborhood. Of course the explosions here had a sort of rhythmic but the rhythm changed and their operation in the explosive phases was very different from that of volcanoes, and too sudden in coming and too brief in duration and there was no order of any kind. The elements which are chemically in the magma are not found here in the manner of the formation of these craters are not round but of crazy shape from oblong, square, and to even round deep holes, some as if by a terrific wind blast."

"There are those who do say they were exploded as but who blamed the blasts were caused by forest fires," said general Vivian. "They say there may have been immense quantities dumped near Abbotsburg and the up-blowing caused by the forest reaching there, and then the flood water washed over the surface of the land."

"There is no forest fire near the neighborhood at the time," said general Vivian. "You can see none of the surviving trees had been destroyed by any flames. Of course the conclusions have limited the trees of their foliage and limbs, and none of this debris came from volcanic eruptions. There is there any place covered with volcanic ash, lava or mud? Each explosion was as great as to have probably thrown out fifty million tons of debris, but none of it is volcanic debris, since this debris is not to be found in the shape of a volcano, a region of the earth's surface and a volcano however great. I said a country as good as this one is would not be destroyed by a catastrophe little sort of this from nature, since God had made signs for it for the test of the people and that would even seem flatteringly. No change either can be seen through unless future demands it. And volcanoes all of them here serve as great reliable safety valves by which the electric

"I do not doubt that the whole country had been subjected to volcanic strains because of the disaster. Volcanic eruptions apparently have always originated along the fissure lines or on the weakest parts of the earth's crust and mountain ranges, and there sure is no such weakness here. And an eruption once started tends to become a lively main active but if the crater becomes closed from many cause other openings are formed along the line of the original fissure. And if these explosions have been volcanic eruptions, then where in Heaven's name are the Cones?"

"We can build one" suggested Dolores.

We are not joking but this is serious," said Garrard, and "two facts are noticeable in the location of nearly all volcanoes, they are generally in mountain ranges, near great depose and are frequently arranged in groups having, evidently a subterranean connection. We are quite a long distance from any mountain even though there are hills, but that are these hills, merely mounds. The most important volcanic groups on the Californian gate are Mt. Vivian, Juan, Juan, Olivine, Andrain, Mt. Catherine, and others and none of them are active now, and they that is the first investigators even blamed these mountains for the disaster."

The big explosion craters with its smaller companion ones are situated in the center of the "Hempal County," said Violet. "I have told that out. The group of eight or nine explosion craters are located on level ground, and not in a low-lying line. The explosion crater in the immediate vicinity is about six to a thousand feet across, the nearest neighbor is thirty to a thousand feet long, and eightywide, and the smallest is about five to a thousand feet wide. There is lots of water in these numerous craters, probably either having come up from below or were filled by the flood, on the other hand we have made great exertions efforts to accomplish the investigations, without any resistance from the enemy recently, and have found no evidence of there having been any volcanic activity. However while this informal war rages continually throughout all portions of the land which no. is called the "Continental war of the Rebellion, the storms of this war only great forth occasionally through or other sections, but this does not give as much cause as to the situation and therefore because of the old necessity of things we should not allow any difficult whatever to prevent us from finding out the causes of this great disaster! All these craters are in an immense plain and they combine the characteristics of craters torn in the ground by explosions of great force, the explosions evidently began near Abilene. The greatest greatest explosive natured fury was in recent Abilene. Abilene is therefore, all explosion and torn cities. The heaviest sufferer. Force of the volcanoes could be blamed for their eruptions are normal, beginning hot sand, ashes, lapilli from the crater and small which are of no consequence. If volcanic eruptions had occurred here there would be cones and signs of lava. These great explosion craters are characterized only by some strange gunpowder explosions of extreme force. Panning to the location of the other and smaller explosion craters we have found that the are farther away to the north and the war conditions were in a state of an act. The theory has been advanced with much show of reason that much of the masses of ground in this neighborhood are old torn in the air, probably the winds of feet by this great convection which tore the ground from the surface, if that theory is accepted it can be readily understood why all the fissures are connected with the immense craters bordering in the city. These explosions surely must have been most violent ones, for at the same time it rent the ground, leaving it as it is to try and in causing big floods, and formed the great eight we have observed, but it also destroyed by some action as many great cities and towns in a momentary and measure."

north or twenty-one in number scattered through the County of San Salvador and the other Guatemalan Counties of Nicaragua, Costa Rica and Guatemala.
 Nothing of the sort exists here, except, about sixteen suffering greatly. The United States has sent it into South America in great part in favor of the few for many of the Guatemalan armies are in active and continuous operation, and from one Guatemalan army is defeated another starting to rush into its place. The armies under the Garibay are the principal ones, and are situated on a vast military scale and they seem to be the head of the Guatemalan military affair. The main armies now number sixteen, two of which are right here now and so many others are so far away that little is known of their movements save that often a number of them are in operation at once. Guatemala is a prey to us without doubt. From southern Guatemala, through to the east they say there is a string of Guatemalan armies extending down toward northern Anglo-Lima states. Any of these are active and violent in their military movements, and during other periods the frightened inhabitants have to flee before them for fear of their children being ordered murdered.
 Some one suggested once that the government of Guatemala could bridge this vast flood for the use of their armies if they wished to pay the expense. But the northern part of Guatemala is really finally free of Guatemalan armies and the flood from this zone is it is saved by the Anglo-Lima military troops north. These soldiers are all Tripanconians and cold fighters, when we come to think of it I do not believe Hildred is right in her estimate. Our case cannot be lost, even if we do not find any cause as to the cause of the disaster, but I do believe all these explanation craters or the ground around them contain evidences of the true cause, and too they may be more usual for the connection of the craters and thus their corresponding fissures. East of us is the big burning forest but they do not seem to hinder us. The relative position is the circumference of the war zone and it is so unusual as to call for special consideration. The whole static State of Guatemala is surrounded by a circle of our disasters of every different nature with this big flood in the center but in the north, south, and east, and also west forest fire are raging, great movements of the many are now are going on, so great that the so-called impossible of conception, the energy of the war is more intense in Guatemala, while in other parts of the south, southern section of the nation the force of the war temporarily I suppose seems to be dying down, and the great convulsions which are so terrible are raging here."

"There in one thing said by witnesses," declared General Aronburg,"and
"And that these explosions were not accompanied by earth shocks and subterranean noises. That shows these were not volcanic eruptions. Always accompanying an eruption there is always an tremor and a lateral disturbance, the appearance of the electric cloud being one of the first ones of the first symptoms of a volcanic explosion, clouds of dust fall over the country, lightning flashes and the noise of thunder adds to the horror of the scene. Clouds of steam pour forth into the air and the steam condensing falls with the dust as rain, or the falling of the hot water are thus mixed which mixing with the dust and ash can run down in place of boiling mud, and yet none of this happened here."

"What is the matter for you to have that big red bonnet in the clouds of a day over your face -- first you afraid of being seen only by the light of the long day."
"I am not afraid of you," said a pale and sad faced child about nine years of age who standing on the shore of the flood near Ableman was just in time to hear the distant shore north of the ruined city which was fast hiding from view from "Fire Fox". A number of civil and boy scouts belonging to the district command had come up and one of them saw a fine boy of about fourteen and he had him in train in vain to get a line glance at the face of a civil child from view by the large ruined city. At the end of his face, the little civil started, and although smiling he hid his head.

"I am afraid. The scandalous are after me. I am a disgrace. They slew my father and mother, and I hit an officer over the head with a hammer and he is dead. They're after me."

"So you are a refugee are you?" repeated the boy, and at the same time lifting her up and forcibly holding her hands in a second in placing full into her face. "Well you were bound to be afraid of some or other of that fact," said he after waiting his opportunity, "but I wouldn't be a million about it. I find people who are always smart, and perhaps you are. So you brained a Glandelinian officer. Well! That's good. He deserved it for murdering your parents. Anyway I love brave little girls, so let me and my friends here just sit here and be acquainted..."

This little refugee child thus introduced into the story and whose name was Susan Geraldine, was certainly more handsome than the boy and girl girlscoouts expected her to be. Her features though were small and thin from under nourishment, her complexion sallow from exposure to all weather and her eyes though bright and expressive, seemed large with fear of the Glandelinian enemies. He had naturally a fine set of teeth, he had frequently been told by his friends and parents that the Glandelinians were responsible for the flood horror, and often when alone she had wept over the whole thing, and wondered though not a fully why it was that our blessed Lord would allow the Glandelinians to do all this. Mrs Geraldine before she was murdered, was the mother of this little girl, and with her husband incurred the displeasure of the Glandelinians, by really "knowing too much" about the disasters & explosions at Abbianna, whose secret if found out by the Christian Authorities would play the mischief with Glandelinians.

Humbly at her father's feet she had stood and even begged him and her mother to flee for the Glandelinians were inexorable in their purpose of murdering them if they had the chance. The poor mother had been murdered first by being shot at in and she, and her husband carried the fate which had now befallen him of his wife, and two children, and a girl who also had been murdered. As a last request before she died Mrs Geraldine had requested her husband that little Susan should be given to the care of his wife's sister Jennie Geraldine, who at the time was on the eve of moving for the north and who within four months after her sisters death sailed with her young niece for the city of Calverine, accompanied by her father. Here during the trip her father was shot and thus Jennie Geraldine was left alone with the remaining child. Occasionally she heard the fore were trying to get them too but time and distance gradually waned and the strength of the peril, and also because they entered the territory of so many Christian armies, and at their escape because the little girl Susan had dashed the brains out of a high Glandelinian official the wrath of the Glandelinian generals were by beyond bounds. To this boyscout the little girl refugee was quite pretty, but on whose cheek the softest rose should have been blooming, but was not, but nevertheless her rich black hair fell in wavy masses about her white throat and shoulders. The boy too saw there also was something in her character to admire. Though she was pretty, she was not porpuod and selfish and was the same as any other Abbiannian child. Manley it seemed was surely aware of this child for he had once spoken to his generals.

"If not this Susan Geraldine child," said he, as with his hands behind him, and his head bent forward he strode up and down his headquarters "We'll see how she'll get on the little snail. I'll use all my influence to have her captured for she's news too much."

But he had been fooled, for though a fugitive with her Aunt for over eight hundred miles and followed and shadowed by Glandelinians of all sorts, agents and so on, they succeeded in elude eluding their pursuers, and the child only clung the closer to her good Aunt, happy to share her fortune or misfortune, whatever it might be. She too had been instructed though a child it was more than justified for her to use a pistol on her pursuers, and both had been supplied by sales with hood ready guns and ammunition. Three months afterwards, hearing that their uncle was home a dangerously wounded in battle, hearing that their uncle was sent to him, but the soldier had been shot in the head and though death did not come at once his reason was gone. Faithfully she watched until the end, and then he was dead, and being wounded here by foes too who were bent on getting little Susan she crossed the turn from her long eye back and continued on the safe route for Calverine but then because of the flood lost her way. Day after day the aunt and niece had struggled on while each day's march reached them of the danger of going too far into the interior near Abbianna, and when at last when hope seemed to be dying out, and they had had narrow escapes from even the "Red Plague" and even the brave aunt smiled less cheerfully she she used to do, she resolved to try to find her way toward some refuging Christian army camp. This resolution she communicated to her little niece, who gladly shallily consented to it, for there was no other hope. They had then traveled their way through and had reached the Christian lines during the council of war and their sisters were having, and in which they had the interesting scientific conversation about the cause of the disaster. They were first of all on proving she they really were, and on the time these boy and girlscoouts were out scouting near the region of one of the orators of the supposed volcanic eruption, the little girl was standing by the edge of the flood, and this boyscout none other than Walter starring had noticed her and absolutely wondered what she had been out here for. All the read readers are acquainted with starring, and all realize how generous hearted he is and how much he was a favorite with all who were acquainted with him, and especially the Vivian girls who actually loved him.

He is a passionate admirer of beauty in the right sense, that is persons who though beautiful are as good as they are handsome (which is the case of all people in Abbianna good looking or not), and as we all are conscious of of her when he first had seen the Princesses and had caught a first sight of them he had let himself drawn irresistibly toward them and are long had completely won their hearts by his friendly ways and aiding them out in all their difficulties and troubles. This poor little Susan so terrified by her awful experiences had naturally shrunk from the observation of all strangers, and as Starring had a foreign appearance and at first to her believed eyes did appear decidedly Glandelinian had had at first when he and his followers approached eluded all his efforts to see what she was. This had at first aroused not his curiosity but his suspicion, and when he had seen her move away to a distant part of the crater edge he followed her addressing to her the remark which is recorded in the past page or so of this chapter. If she had been a Glandelinian girlscoout in disguise he could have arrested her easily enough but her answer had softened him and she was therefore finding him a friend. Walter Starring was not an Abbiannian, he was naturally absolutely Irish despite his name, and he loved little girls especially those of Abbianna where all people and children were so astonishingly and miraculously good though he greatly preferred the company of the brave girlscoouts and boys too whether they were pretty or not, put in Abbianna you could not hardly find a homely looking child though many of course are natural as I if plain and so on. Seeing that the little refugee was really afraid, if not timid, and looked as if she had been crying he resolved to be as agreeable as possible and in ten minutes time had so far succeeded in gaining Susan's friendship that she allowed him to untie the red bonnet which he carefully removed and then when she did not see it scanned her features attentively to as if to discover all the bravery there might be other ice in the child. At last gently smoothing back her hair which was really bright and glossy glossy he said-

"Who told you that the Glandelinians could be after you here? Why they can't get you." The tears started to Susan's eyes, and her chin quivered as she replied-

"Aunt says so, a little girlscoout by the name Jean Gauders says so and everybody says so. It's true. They try to get even you! I know when the girlscoout a chief shot you by mistake because a Glandelinian played a trick on you both."

"Well you can save yourself more by trying to be a Camp fire girl" said starring, wishing to administer as much comfort as possible. "You too should be disguised, change the style of your hair, put on some different clothes and do things so no Glandelinian eyes could recognize you. You've got pretty blue eyes now brown hair, and your forehead too is broad and high. If you were even a scout I as we are you could instead of suffering this way give the enemy himself such a fright. You could repay your loss by serving your country."

Adding her face in her hands Susan burst into a passionate fit of weeping and said between sobs "I can't I can't. I have no pull. It takes a lot of red tape to become even a camp fire girlscoout. I'm smothering the bonnet from Starring's lap she there. It on her head and she hurrying away when starring caught her and pulling her to him said:

"Don't be so foolish Susan, you can get in. You have a pull with us. I can even only get to get up the petition to get in and we'll be all right."

It was some time before Susan had time to get up the petition to get in and we'll be all right."

difference between her and the girl and boy scouts she had become acquainted with, and therefore often times when ever she said any of her daily or hourly prayers, she prayed that all the boy and girl scouts might love her a little. More than four months had passed since her own village of Lund had disappeared from view under the flood, and now she was among the scouts or the army in general. In the meantime one of the boy scouts had been shot at from ambush while during a tour around one of the "expansion stations" and all the boy and girl scouts had visited him frequently, but Gertrude had once commanded poor little Susan to stay away, as unless they were really acquainted better or well off with scouts' references were never allowed near a scout camp, for a day or two. Susan obeyed Gertrude, and the other, superior, and then curiosity led her toward the injured boy's tent. For a while she lingered, as no one was around to see her, and then she was about turning away when a low man fell on her rear and stopped her from going out. Gertrude's commands were forgotten, and in a moment she was standing by the injured boy's bedside.

The tenderly smoothed his tumbled pillow, moistened his parched lips, and bathed his feverish brow, and when an hour afterwards Jean Anderson entered, she found the boy calmly sleeping with one hand clasped in that of little Susan who with the other fanned the injured boy with her big sunbonnet of which gawking had been so surprised to see her wear. "Susan, Susan Gertrude!" said Jean. "This is no place for you!" and she endeavored to lead her away, fearing meanwhile Gertrude might see the refusal. In the tent and scolded fearfully. This aroused the boy who begged so hard for her to remain that the girl scout went in quest of Gertrude, who finally consented, and Susan was duly installed as nurse in the boys' room. Perfectly delighted with her new vocation, she had sat for hours by her charge, watching each change in his features and entreating as far as possible his wants and needs. She possessed a very sweet clear voice, and frequently when all other means had failed to quiet him she would hum some hymn or a song of home until lulled by the soft hum he had fallen away to sleep. Such unwearied kindness had not been seen without its effect upon the injured boy scout and therefore or four days later than Susan was sitting as usual near him, he called her to his side, and taking her face between his hands kissed her forehead and lips, saying:

"What can I ever do to pay my little nurse for her kindness?"
"Susan had hesitated for a moment and then replied:
"Love me, and get all the boy and girl scouts to love me."
"Love you?" he exclaimed. "Who says we don't love you. I for one do love you better than the rest, but all love you, even Gertrude or she wouldn't have wanted you this permission to stay here when the military government generally place it against the rules for refugees or strangers to go within the child scout camps. Gertrude has not been here to see me once. What is the reason?"

"A boy scout by the name of Frank who a moment before had stolen to Susan's side answered saying:
"Yes she has but you have been unconscious most of the time. She had been offered for your recovery."

Just then Gertrude appeared, and this time she was accompanied by Jean and they both were happy to see he had improved. This was before gawking had to learn her by the canteen rim and had a talked to her. After her slight interview with the officer gawking, whom she learned was no boy scout but one of the highest aid-de-camps of the Prince's and a general as young as he is she noticed that none of the child scouts slighted her as she had feared, or forgot that she was present, and she was granted a special favor by the very Prince to be allowed to go through the camp any time she wanted to. Very often too, a kind word or affectionate look from many of the boys sent such a glow to her whole face and sparkle to her eyes that the wounded boy who always loved her best declared "she looked as good as any of the girl scouts."

On this day of gawking's sitting with her in the canteen rim he and those with him, though all strangers to her, went out on their tour of the region for evidence of the disaster cause. After his first few words with her, a tall, dark, broad faced man but handsome nevertheless came riding on horse, a guide for Walter Starring, and announcing himself to gawking in his queer English as soon as he saw him. Walter immediately stopped forward, and after greeting the guardian of the village, the girls introduced the little refugee girl, telling him at the same time of her kindness to one of the boy scouts during his illness. "She was a grand little!" said he, "I'm glad to see her."

"After Starring told him some more about her he finally said:
"All for consolation in the camp starting, but in the morning and until I did not forget that I was a boy scout. Violet, and her sisters, my aunt, and my grand mother here."

Before he left Walter did not forget Susan. Taking her aside he threw around her neck a small golden chain which was attached a locket containing a miniature of the face of Our Blessed Lord.

"Do not lose it ever!" said he "and retain it to remember me by in case I fall in battle."

"I wish I had something to give you!" said Susan, and Walter smiled. "Never mind I can remember you as you are a good child. You will be a good scout I'm sure, and he too, in his arms and wiping away her tears said: "Don't worry about anything again. The Glandelinian soldiers cannot get you or your aunt here, for they always have tried to get even us and that they never did. I don't realize what made me say so but I believe I saw you some time before about two years ago, and I believe I remember your name. All you have been good to one of the wounded boy scouts, and all of them shall remember it, and will also repay it. As soon as I meet with the Viridian girls I shall place the petition before them for your being a scout. Of course it does take a lot of red tape for any one to be a scout, but you have the pull with me, and the others, will all back me up. Go run back now to the camp for they may be sending for you soon." Then putting her down, he sprang into or upon his horse, and followed by the others rode away.

Susan looked after him as long as the heads of the white horses were in sight, and then she went on her way to her own part of the camp where her aunt had determined to stay until it was safe to get to some northern city. While the curtains of the headquarters of Violet and her sisters had been thrust aside and a very beautiful and equally beautifully uniformed girl looked out almost impatiently waiting Starring's return, wondering why he and the child scouts who had accompanied him were gone so long. In the center of the room the coroll table was standing and Violet had twice changed the location of her Geography, once placing it at her side, and lastly putting it directly in front, so she could glance at it the better.

"Why in the world don't they come?" she had said for the thirtieth time to her sisters, and when the sound of halloping horses in the yard below made her start up, and running down stairs she was soon seen in gawking's embrace, though she wondered from the appearance on his face whether her future plans about the expedition was in any danger or not of failure or frustration from the enemy. Placing her arm affectionately around him she led him into the parlor of the building and a saying: "I am so glad you have returned for we have been somewhat worried about you. We'll try to have nice times even during this adventure, but perhaps you'll taste the long time it seems for us to find out the true character of the disaster. Did you see anything new since you went out for that scouting tour..."

"Yes indeed I did. I came across a girl refugee."

"Oh!" said Jennie "who is she?"

"I'll tell you all about her!" said gawking. "So does she appear? Is she brave?"

Instantly as gawking had predicted there came before his vision the image of the poor little forlorn faced child, and Starring told Violet, and her sisters of Susan Gertrude, who had watched so faithfully over one of the injured boy scouts, during the weary days of his illness. Contrary to his expectations, she did not reproach about her being in the boy scout camp but simply said: "I am sure I should love her." Then after a moment's pause she continued: "They are two refugees you say. We'll try to get her. If she really wishes to become one of us to fill the place of one of us who might have died in line of duty. We'll try and interview her to remove."

Starring said he was pleased at the appearance of the child, and would if possible find her on the morrow and have her examined for good qualifications, and if she was not acquainted on the matter to have her learned before she entered. However Violet herself had a uncomfortable feeling or impression that something was the matter with everything. The fact she heard was coming forth to reinforce only, that Gertrude was advancing, and also Richardson Federal also with great numbers with the purpose to try and cut the Viridian army from the territory of Glandelin. It was dark when the clouds from the distant fires shed a darker than usual light on the air as though with it and the atmosphere was feeling as if the earth was going to become a molten planet any day and as all appearance were it seemed as if the world was approaching to its end.....

"Never mind, the worlds disapp intiment it can be forgotten in all the future excitement of this war, and if a big battle happens here, the world will wonder why, and therefore I believe Princenace to confirm the gun a suspicion, it's best to let the enemy attack if he will. "For the land ahead," said one of the Princesses as the column halted, "what a noise, can't you contrive to stop it. You'll have a horde of the Glandellians, you are afraid of in your very hair, for the noise will attract them if any are about, and we'll have a hot time."

Swain glanced nervously round in quest of the "Goblin Glandelinians," but she did not see off a large gray uniformed squadron. In error Swain called out loudly and whispered, as she pointed toward the column, which was moving off in an opposite direction "What are they. Are they. May I see such out here."

Sam ran toward the road which she skirted the borders of the meadow, opposite, and for half a moment felt inclined to flee thither, and hide herself in the bushes, but then if she did she felt she would be called a coward, and also she was loosely guarded by the scouts, and they entered without being molested the west portion of General Viviane army, and after tarrying through the camp for half an hour, rode up to a tent and stopped full upon the stand in front of the opening.

"We are going on without stopping," said Violet to the man. "We need your help in our service and purpose. Come. Bring your squadron with you. Glandelinian patrols are outside the Christian lines."

"Why yes, we can work it so to give the Glandelinian patrol a sort scare" said the officer. "Good there'll be a battle to sorrow."

"With a sh Susan noticed that the smoke clouds were brownish gray and appearing as threatening storm clouds. They now rode down the company street, which here was long and narrow, with a big forest of trees on one side, and high tents on either other. Near two tents stood an immense poplar tree, and the poplars on each side facing toward the west. Susan felt that the end of the Company Street was clean. In the middle of the road which almost frightened her at first, first suddenly emerged an immense cawery column under Colonel Barter but in the arrangement of their uniform there was a nothing that caused them to appear as Mandolinians, though they wore gray, but she was surprised of the many colored standards, and the long threatening lances and sabres they carried as weapons, besides long cut-throats, neither was there anything sumptuous to see that she had ever seen, they were she did not realize it, but these men was a large body of the members of the Gemini in uniform of Galvarianian gray, and Gingo-oro and Barter were at the head. Susan too by now was very tired with holding the baby so long, and too she would have cried, but there was a tightness in her throat, and a pressure about her head and eyes which prevented the tears from flowing, indeed she had felt this way since once before, and that was when she stood at the grave of her parents, and now as it began to grow dark and very hot, and she saw this strange column of cawery, and objects seemed to start turning in circles and she pressed her hands tightly to her forehead and said ----- and she suddenly fell ill."

This was said with a lowering frown and a movement toward the direction of the Gland-Indian army.

At this poor, ^{and} partly shrunk back toward the horse she had been riding, and covered her mouth with her hand, as if she feared the enemy who was always shadowing her would spring upon her from the very atmosphere.

"But we are not also seems able to learn anything why Abbiann was destroyed," said Juice in a conciliatory manner. "And then too you are so good at driving off Glandelinian patrols, that I thought that we would be better off not you, therefore we command you to accompany us as a body ward. We might be attacked by the enemy and you have goodfighting men there. This little girl is scared that Glandelinians who are shadowing her will continue to persecute her."

This speech, while it mollified the Geminian leader, caused poor Fran to shudder, as she thought of a horde of gland-linians whom she was well acquainted with suddenly descending upon the party. But she had no time for thought, for the general, who was very rapid in his movements, and always quick as if in a hurry, and who really loved the Vivian girls and was concerned greatly in their safety said:

"All right, increase anything you say to's. But we'll need more than one son of a b—ll to get the aid of her horse. This is dangerous, explicit and I'm afraid the little girl will be scared to death when the adventure really begins in earnest."

"One child said Gingers himself remounted for horses, and you better bid between these fiery girls" indicating the Vivian girls, for "for she'll protect you at the same time he remounts his horse. The shafts again were pushed on and after passing under a gloomy avenue of huge, baring trees, which opened into a glen, Susan was startled by a voice which came from over her head, and which between a sneer and a hiss called out—

"See here the Inscrutable Princesses come, going to destruction."

This was followed by a wild insane shriek and chuckle.

"Oh, who is it?" said she. "Is it a Gland-Linman?"

Susan longed to marry the insane person was, but as the girls with their passion of adventure in mind did not seem at all inclined to be communicative, she followed on in silence until they came to the heart of the Christian camp, and here telling the escort to wait, Violet and her sisters, binding Susan with them, headed for General Viviane's headquarters. They entered a long and light hall and on each side of this there were three opening into small sleeping rooms, and into one of these the Vivian girls led the "plain child", saying as she did so that in Violet said:

"Hereafter little orphan friend, this is your room, and its a great favor to you to sleep with us as it is ours too. But mind" she added to the country "allow no one in this room unless it is my father or the general vivian, and others we now know. We don't want no landellians coming in here in disguise."

Inde Ed Susan thought she would rather hide under a bed than see a single Communist-infan soldier, but when given a pistol she felt braver. She also felt a great curiosity to find out who else would sleep in the room so she at last ventured to request a request;

"If I place a baby in care of a girl scout, and give it plenty of milk while I am with you."

"Where is the child?" the child seemed faintly minded Angeline.
 "No," said Susan. "She has never seen anything like this."
 "Will you tell me?" she asked. "I am as if she were a baby."
 one day, I might as well hear her as if she were a baby."
 "If she must have it, I will tell her. But I want to understand it first. I will tell her as soon as I can. I will tell her as soon as I can."
 "If she must have it, I will tell her. But I want to understand it first. I will tell her as soon as I can. I will tell her as soon as I can."

Susan told of many hard nights which she and her brothers and sisters had passed after her parents had been murdered, and Jimmy left the room saying to herself, "I will tell her as soon as I can. I will tell her as soon as I can."
 the mystery of Angeline and because of the enemy's presence, suffering this way. I'll die in this territory before I give up. I'll tell her as soon as I can.
 down when you get ready for the milk. I'll tell her as soon as I can.
 A few minutes or so after little baby Janie began to cry, and Susan feeling she was hungry, laid her upon the bed and started for the milk. She trembled as she drew near the gate. She felt as if she were for suddenly in the far distance there came to her ears the sound of gunfire firing, as if the whole world was shooting at another planet, but as she an opening in the door, a sudden voice entirely different from the one used toward the Princesses recently called out, "Come here, little dear, and see some of your best friends." She would have obeyed, but closer and unexpectedly came the crash of a frightful explosion that, shaking the house as if the ground was convulsed, and fearing an earthquake, she quickened her steps, and was soon in the kitchen, where she found a large group of officers and generals, and many Circut leaders as equally arcon group of the voice as if no nothing happened and all were eating their meal around the table about the war, and also of the enemy and hearing that they believed the firing was caused by the enemy trying to "feel a part of the Christian line. As Susan entered the room they all turned toward their of emotions, and glancing hard at her, demanded if she were the little orphan girl of whom so much heard of. On being told that she was they all gazed on her with consideration, admiration and even with great interest, while one said:

"Poor child! I pity you for your loss, but don't worry, Orphans receive great honor here."

Indeed Susan heard that word many a time, and most all the time these "more" convened better meant meaning that she usually had expected.
 "Where can I find your Violet, Vivian?" she asked at last ventured to ask.

"Where can you find her?" asked one of the officers. "Did she tell you to call her so? She should be called Princess Violet."
 "She told me that was what to call her," said Susan.
 "Well, Princess Violet is outside with her sisters. Why do you wish to see her?"

"She told me I could have some milk for the baby."
 "There's the pantry," said the soldier. "Go and help yourself."
 "There's no more in that pantry," said the officer. "She'll have to obtain it from my aide-camp in the main room beyond," indicating with a pointed finger in the direction Susan had no trouble in finding the main room beyond, but on trying the door she found it fastened inside.
 she knocked gently on the door, but there was no answer, and as she was going to do so again, the aide-camp came in by the front door with two bottles of milk in his hand.

"What do you want child?" the man demanded.
 "I've come after the milk for Janie, Princess Violet said I could have it."

"Where are the bottles, but don't forget to bring back what you do not use," said the officer. She accepted the bottle and started to return to the dining room. As she passed the outer door, a strange-looking man with a face as if he were a devil, in appearance and simple and dumb in his expression, and dressed in civilian clothes, suddenly stopped and her stretching out his hands as if to reach her. With a loud cry she rushed holding into the dining room, where the officers at the cry and her sudden appearance rose in body with alarm on hot faces with alarm on their faces.
 "What's come off now?" said one of the officers to the man man who with his hand thrust forward, still advancing toward her. At the sight of the officer he suddenly balked, but one of the officers as quick as a flash drew his pistol and brought the cowering man down.

He was suddenly killed, and the officer ordered one of the others with him to search the man's clothing. He did and found a letter addressed addressed to "Janie," giving him orders to capture a girl called Susan Geraldine dead or alive."

"Who are you?" the officer demanded of the little girl.
 "Why I'm in a bit of a hurry," she answered, somewhat alarmed.
 "I'm a bit of a Circut, but I'm not a soldier."

"The Princess Violet, in a bit of a hurry, is out on an adventure after dinner to try if I have the spirit to be one."
 "If that is the case, why did this scene in of my try to grab you right in our work very presence?"

"He told him and the others why her parents had been assassinated.
 "Well, don't be scared," said the officer. "We'll have a witch placed upon all points of the camp. Better hurry up stairs but one of the soldiers better go with you in case you meet with an enemy unexpectedly up there."

With the soldier accompanying her she was glad to run hastily up stairs.
 This time she was not accosted by anyone but as she passed another room another room she was glad to hear or said some here a musical voice singing the national air of America "The Star Spangled Banner", and she wondered too at the taste of the singer in finishing every verse with "God Save Abbi-Annina from glandolinia."

Indeed the little baby missed her cradle, and therefore was unusually restless, and Susan to retain quietness in the place, carried her in her arms, until the child was asleep. Then feeling very tired, she thought of resting before she was called for again, and therefore threw herself upon the bed, and for the first time in many days, dreamed of Walter Stewart, and his parting promise to see her again. He was aroused by a loud sound as of distant thunder, and a strange thudding sound, and he got up and saw that the last of some of the officers were still eating.

"I'm afraid the boy won't be able to come with the cradle to stay any more," was her first thought, and throwing herself upon the floor, she burst into tears, wishing as she had done before that she had died with her mother. In the midst of her grief the door was flung open, pushed hastily hastily open, and a voice from a Circut exclaimed:
 "Don't you want some dinner little girl? I didn't know but that you might be hungry. You must eat or you won't be able to stand the adventure for you cannot go out on an empty stomach, and such things don't answer here!"

"Is it still dinner time?" asked Susan.
 "After breakfast dinner time," repeated the boy. "If you got time yet and also I guess you'll find there's something to do during your adventure and did you think you can run out on an adventure with the girl Circuts and the Princesses on an empty stomach? Don't be so foolish. A good dinner too of very special food, the very things Violet, and her sisters eat is waiting for you come down."

The boy was touched by the pale tearful face upturned toward him and he wanted to find out why she was crying or had been, and she telling him he answered:

"That boy about don't fool any one. Cheer up. The cradle will be here."
 Although though so poor, Mrs. Geraldine had been extremely neat, and as she had said "old water cost nothing" she had insisted upon her children being very nice and particular in their daily toilet. Susan remembering this, and now casting a rueful glance around the room from she said "I wonder where I can wash myself for dinner."

"Go upstairs in the washroom," said the boy. "The aide-de-camp of course forgot to place a china bowl and pitcher in this room. I'll have him get one. You will of course the Princesses don't use them. They do by their washing in the wash room."

"I don't care where I wash myself, but the baby is sick and not her mother whom I always helped before she did die had me bathe her every morning. I don't believe the baby seems as well."

"This is a curse caused by the enemy," muttered the boy. "We'll see that she gets better bathes here, but I don't see how you can do it up here.
 Better bathe her in the washroom. Now how to wash baby's hair?"

"Yes," said Susan cheerfully.
 "Then I'll give you some good warm and soapy water, or at least I'll send the water and you can have the soap to use as you wish after dinner before your trip, but come or your dinner will be cold."
 Susan glanced at the baby, her eyes sleeping sweetly, and though there seemed to be no reason, she still lingered.

"What are you waiting for?" demanded the boy scout.
 "I have forgotten the baby's bottle," answered Susan.
 "A Circut boy," he said, "paved over the baby's face, and he turned away without looking back. He was a good man, but the baby her bottle, and then he fell on the ground, and though the words she addressed addressed were not to the Circut Mother than to a Circut Lord, she felt comforted, and being up started for the dining room indicated by the boy scout.
 Susan, it was so brilliant, old group of old and boy scout officers which she found assembled around the dining room table, and as she entered the room, the boy scout called Radcliffe who was there also smiled on her her saying, "This is going to be the new girl scout. Good..."

The boy scout was wondering about the same thing,, and lifting the little girl in his lap he replied-----

"No he never will, he never does, and he'll be here sometime." and then he told her again many points of how to pass the tests she might receive that she would receive more than one test. By this time the party getting ready for the expedition was gathered, and Radcliffe himself was sent upstairs to notifying the girl that she must come, and guess he was surprised at the sound of voices in the room adjoining, and while Susan was still in the boy scouts lap the door opened and Radcliffe appeared, with his hands thrown up.

"Susan Geraldine," said he to the boy scout up in this hall where no boy scout is ever permitted to come. What does it mean. ut come down girl you are wanted as the party is ready to start. go down you to the boy sternly."

"No danger Madam, I assure you," said the boy scout. "I came to bring the baby's cradle, and did not suppose there was anything out of the way in coming here."

"It's nobody but a boy scout who brought my baby's cradle," said Susan frightened at Radcliffe's wrathful looks.

"And what is he doing here. It appears to me, you are beginning young, and getting on fast too sitting in his lap. Supposing I too should do so---wouldn't it be a bit throughout the army? But come down we are waiting for you. I would not say anything about this though. You'll get yourself in trouble Frank. Come Susan."

The boy got up saying that he must go now, but would come again a week or so later and out how she pulled through the test. Susan followed him down stairs, and then mounted the horse outside which was brought up to her.

"Excuse me for butting in air," said a voice at the door of General Manley's room in his headquarters. "But I heard you talking to your officers about something that is supposed to be known about the Abbeinnian flood which girl and boy scouts are trying to find out. It's tiresome to hear of it. I am a representative of the two Professional Professional Spies Nero Pania and the other. Mind if I come in. My air I can tell you something of interest to you and your army officers. I am an old timer here. And he produced a card which he handed to the general.

"Come right in then," said the general, rising and extending his hand. "My name's John Junior Manley. And this is my head staff general Raymond Richardson Reddard, and his two leading men Pic-nell and Jeapline Jensen."

"My names Benton Watson," said the other with a bow. "I was raised in the army is when I was young. My dad was in three wars."

"From her hiding place Susan, imagine it saw that the man was about the middle age, was dressed in a long green coat and had on a yellow pants and blue shirt with what she had never saw any one here wear before a red sombrero worn at a rakish angle.

This was the beginning of her adventure. Susan seemed well familiar with the general, that is she recognized them. Always since the conflict had begun Violet, and her sisters, and all girl and boy scouts had always been either drawn, or plunged themselves into a web of strange and thrilling circumstances into perils, and so on. On so it even happened that the loyal brother of Violet and her sisters had been kidnapped by Glandelinians, and Violet and her sisters themselves had rescued him. Now to try Susan's nerve they had talking her on a spy trip, but had brought a strong escort to help her in case she got into a tight fix. Veterans of course had played no unimportant part in their adventures. In fact they had been instrumental in bringing them always to a good and successful conclusion. It was usually general Hendro Dargar, a great man always enthusiastic over the safety of the Princesses, long before the "possessed war cruised Glandelinians" swept the country who had done the most.

He was licensed by the Abbeinnian government, and given the honor by the Emperor to be one of the guardians of the Princesses.... Dargar himself always was the one who erected signal stations at any point of the Christian lines, and these stations not only provided exceptional exceptional opportunities for any one operating them but also provided methods of helping defeat Glandelinian armies, and also to defeat the ends sought by the Glandelinian armies. Even Dargar, and boy and girl scouts had found many many many signal stations which were formed in a chain that had been built by Glandelinian spies operating in the Christian lines against the Abbeinnian as in secret ways. Of all girl scouts as the reader should know Gertrud Angeline and Angeline Jones was the highest in rank and they had played leading role in their many adventures. Of all girl and boy scouts as far as none had been an orphan, and through investigations it had been found that none of them had lost their parents in the great disaster. Of all the girl scout officers, Annie Sanders was the oldest of them all, and was nineteen years of age, while next to the oldest was Angeline Jennings the sister of Dolores, the daughter of John Jennings. All the boy scouts and girls always no matter what army they were in attended during certain hours the military scout school. On their way this time to general Manley's army to test Susan the whole party had gone toward the Glandelinian army by a short circuitous route, through a portion of the Red Riding forest. They were now in a part of general Manley's army cleverly dressed as Glandelinian girl scouts. They had been for safety sake accompanied by the "dangerous," Radcliffe and then had made their way to what was then called the "obs observation room of Manley's headquarters, and could hear the conversation from a partly open door. Now after hour they had sat there while the scenery outside of distant forest fire "colours" about them gradually changed into character and slaps with the passing of the afternoon, the mountainous clouds of smoke giving way to huge undulating wreaths, and strange monster and half human shape and seeming to come nearer and be bigger and more heavier in color and blackness. Of course the fire was drawing away from them and apparently descending into the lower ranges. The strange old man who claimed he was an accomplice of the Two Professional Glandelinian or International spies looked to be a pleasant sort of man despite his character and the girl scouts and the Princesses half doubted whether he was really in the service of Manley or not. But if he was not, then he sinned by telling general Manley a lie. But after listening to the conversation they had learned his intimate history, and realized he was a man that any Christian Government would give a huge sum for his capture. He said his name was Francis Gump, and he told Manley of the days of how the flood was progressing, how many scouts of Manley's army had come and went overland, and to see to it that the flood did not spread over Glandelinian territory, but continued over the Christian territory, how the Glandelinian scout patrols were continually fighting Christian patrols. The men of old fought Indians and starvation and the fires too, leaving many thousands in nameless graves by the wayside during the fearful affrays across the plains and through the mountains, and over fields and meadows, all these hundreds of skirmishes being as fierce as the battle of Lepanto, how in other cases, the Christian patrols had been like crafts sailing into windjammers.

"These days," the man said slowly, "shows the danger Glandelinia is facing. I want to tell you, sir, that if any of these Christian girl or boyscouts in this neighborhood find out what caused the disaster of Abbiennan, Glandelinia is in a bad way. Though I'm facing you, sir, I'm not afraid to say I'm not against them, in fact I probably favor them, but just the same I believe it is my duty to warn you of a coming peril that you never comprehended. These girls are absolutely different than children of our own nation further across the seas, and it's their very righteousness and goodness that causes them to be so dreaded, and so successful. Of course, sir, I didn't experience them personally, for I'm just young at this work now, and have not been investigating them personally. But I have been acquainted with many children in many of these towns north, never saw a child who did even a slight misdeed, refused to obey their parents, or refused their duties in any school or elsewhere, and if a child hates school here he or she is something very unusual. Their very education, and their terrific desire of learning everything that comes their way, sir, is responsible for what we would dread here. Education means a lot, sir, and any person who is well educated cannot be frustrated in anything they set out to do. You cannot stop their work here no matter what you do, sir, unless you can with the cooperation of the armies under Thomas line and his Confederate outposts the Christian armies from this locality. They won't attack, so why don't you, my father was one of the Forty Niners, came out of Tennessee into the United States and I too was an old Indian fighter. I could learn you many tactics how we fought and defeated Indian bands, and that way you can learn to fight these Abbiennan armies. Of course I'm doing all this for you, sir, but I'm afraid I cannot help saying that your nation is doing a stunt as follows:

"A prize fighter being challenged to combat by a one armed man. Nothing sort of a tremendous miracle from Heaven can cause the Abbiennan Nation, to lose this war, even if your country was fighting for the same cause, and she was fighting for yours. This is a crazy sort of a war, sir, and though I'm giving you pointers of how to carry it out since you your Government won't listen to my advice and a desist, I'm doing so just for your advice. Your advice is a profound fact, all proofs by right now, crushing Christian armies opposed to you, like eggs shells under a machine masher, but in the future I warn you 100% that Abbiennan had 1 or has only a pinhead full of her armies only in the field now. Later your nation will be helpless. So I'm asking you again to take my advice and not turn me down."

At a question from one of general Hanley's staff officers, who like the rest was intensely interested in the story of this new comer, the man launched into a description to the boy and girls about as he knew them. The boy and girls about the Christians he recalled to the generals, are mostly Abbiennans, but what causes it an advantage to the Abbiennans they have some righteous foreigners among them. The girl and boyscouts come from the best Abbiennan families, and had been passed down from generation to generation, one of them had their fathers in the army, mostly generals of course, like Gertrude, Angeline, Angeline Pichee, Angeline Jennings, and so forth, the former being general Aronburg, Vivian Nichols, and Walter Starring Jennings (the boyscout Walter Starring). The numbers of the boyscouts and girls were huge, and different from the equally dangerous "Camp fire girls or boys." The girl or boy members if having the qualifications were officers, and if commissioned so had superiority over generals. Out of war times it was an easy gracious sort of existence, as if on parade, and good times, fairly good adventures, seeing and studying the country and so forth. "On now girls about were seen to ride mounts jingling with fanciful and costly trappings, and the boyscouts were dressed like macaroude cavalier of old. Yet despite all their clannish way of being uniformed and dressed they were more dreaded than the Christian soldiers, and in their way comes the strangely dressed "Camp Fire Girls" and boys, "under men or women as leaders or guardians. They were equally as fierce against the Glandelinians, but they don't go so much on long distant adventures, and these were helping in the work around Abbiennan.

"To day," said general Becknell, in his drawling voice, "There are thousands of the around here, and the ones who are called the "Aronburg Rangers" though personally I don't believe in them, are or were originated by those dangerous girls called the Vivian Girls Princesses. There are many of their very descendants left, for there are ten of the girl or boy scouts among them who are cousins to the Vivian girls and are the same way. But I have heard a lot about them. I do not fear the Vivian girls at all. They cut little figure in the present day of the war so far. But these girls about especially, who in the world ever let loose such a swarm of human hornets."

A general who was called Josephine Jensen spoke up with some unexpected heat.

"Well I think it is a shame," he said. "I know we are supposed to believe that we can win this war against those Christian foes, but I for one do not believe, believe so now for the Christians have too much support from these girls about. They are the sole life heart of the army. If we cannot frustrate them, we cannot frustrate the armies. But tell me, generals who and what is that Radcliffe. I'm positive that personage is not a boy."

"Radcliffe who?" asked general Hanley. "I never heard of him."

General Bob White leaned toward Josephine Jensen (a man in the head) and assumed a confidential tone.

"Never heard of him. That's good."

"He's thinking of that Angeline Jennings friend."

"I have seen him," said general Thomas Cleveland. "So far he is one of the he is operating as one of the highest rank boy scouts in the army but is not in any particular army. He is a roamer or a roamer, he there, he's here, he bobs up somewhere else like electricity and disappears like a ghost. He is also a chief leader of all those dangerous camp fire girls and boys combined and is either a relative of said Angeline Aronburg or her sister or brother for I firmly believe that is the disguised Anna Aronburg or I'll eat my hat. He is also the leader of the Virgin Rangers who had once captured general Huntington and his troops single handed. Ten of my men went to his rescue, and though girls about gave me valuable aid we couldn't save him."

"Maybe he is a boy," said general Cranier. "And a future lover to that post Angeline Aronburg."

At Cranier's words, which although low spoken were intended to reach Hanley's ear, the latter flushed. Then he reached over, and pulling Cranier's hand down over his eyes, started to shake him good naturedly. In a moment three generals were entangled. General Josephine laughed and explained the situation to the foreign spy. The two officials watched the Glandelinian chums amusedly, until a sudden boom somewhere outside brought them all to themselves and the fun stopped.

Hanley proposed to accept the man's proposition, and he then left the party. Dinner was served late, and Hanley settled down to his cigar and a nap which he was studying. For a time other officers gossiped in low voices which the girls about failed to catch, but it was believed two of them might have been seen peeping as the officers occasionally looked glanced in their direction. All the officers sat in silence down in their chairs and at first staring out at the landscape. However little Susan had heard the words and she had seen one of the officers cast a sharp glance toward the girls about say a word or two in a low voice to his companion, and they arose and left the room. Susan who as the others had been sitting on a lounge, said to one of the girls nearest her:

"Did you hear that?"

"Here what?" asked Jean.

"What those three officers said."

"What three officers?"

"Why those three officers who passed through here," Susan said impatiently. "I believe you were actually asleep Jean."

"Guess I was," said Jean yawning. "But what was it they said? Did you discover something? And were they saying something to you?"

"They were whispering to each other," said Susan. "They raised their voices and I managed to overhear. Then one of them glanced our way—to see if we were heard I suppose—and they got up and left. Hanley is alone in there now."

"Well what in the world was it?" Demanded Jean.

"Oh—h—h—h," said Susan nervously. "The door's open and that soldier is suspicious of us—and he is staring at us. Listen," she whispered. "Let's get the rest to go out on pretense of some duty. Then we can all go some secret place where we won't be overheard, and I'll tell you."

"Now what is it Susan please?" asked Jean, when she and the girls about including Violet, and her sisters were all gathered in one of the empty rooms with the door fastened behind them, O and as on guard there too. "What is all this mystery?"

"Yes, what is it you overheard out there near general Hanley's observation room?" Demanded Jack Saunders. "You seemed certainly enough excited. What's it all about?"

"Spelled my pleasant dreams," grumbled George Zimmerman. "It's better to be good to a girl or they won't be able to find you. And picking up a sofa cushion he started to bicker the girl with it. He however laughed and warded him off."

"Take him away," she said. "The German boy is a wild man. How can I say any thing if he smother me?"

"Sit down," Susan, Violet, Vivian commanded him. Her... She obeyed.

"Well every one listen closely," said Susan, assuming a serious manner and lowering her voice. "I realize all of you are puzzled by my request for you to come back here. You wished to test me and make me a girlscout. Well, I may have succeeded, but I didn't dare explain out there near the general's 'Observation' room. Those two officers were sitting too close, and I believe too they were watching me. One was at least, and he was a tall man. You see, while the rest of you were listening to Manley and the others I was near the other room where the three men were. And I overheard just enough of the conversation between those three men to understand there was a big plot of some sort. Those two were John Manleys two brothers, Johnston, and Hubert, Manley, with general Francis Madden."

"Plot?" queried Gertrude Angeline. "What plot? What are you speaking about? Plot against whom?"

"A plot against all of you, and the Vivian Girls in particular," said Susan. "I tell you I couldn't hear much. Only a few words here and there reached me. But I gathered there was a plot being made to smuggle a large number of the slickest Glandolinian girl and boyscouts into your hands and all in disguise with the hope they'll frustrate you in your effort to learn something about the destruction of Abbeann, and that these generals had a hand in it."

"Violet, leaned forward. 'What was that?' she said. 'Yes Princess' answered Susan stoutly. 'That is what they said. I can repeat the exact words. There were only snatches here and there that I overheard. But my mind continued to follow the thought between the words, and also my loss of my parents and brother and sister. Oh you realize how it is. That Johnston Manley is responsible for my loss.'"

"Violet, and her sisters together nodded. They were beginning to have a great respect for the little orphans intelligence. Often before since her short stay they had been witness to the orphan girls almost uncanny abilities to guess another's thoughts, and had almost believed she was a mind reader."

"But tell me please what they said?" Violet asked. "Anything that you could hear definitely?"

"What you mean definitely?"

"What was it you could plainly hear?"

"Yes," said Susan, "there certainly was. There was something about your plan to investigate the great flood, or the big 'eruptions' around here at, --at --wasn't that at Abbeann, near here, or on the Norma Run somewhere?"

"In Bengall State, near Bengall County Calverlinian Province," said Jack. "Go on."

"I am going on. And there was something too about two girlscouts or leaders whose names are Gladys Wentworth, and Joy St. Clare, and all about Glandolinian patrols, and motor boats on the flood, and right patrolling spying, and and -- Susan paused for dramatic effect. He obtained it."

"And what?" demanded Gertrude Angeline. "And wireless telegraph," added Susan triumphantly. "That was what I heard at the best. One of the three Glandolinian general's generals was explaining something to the other and he became excited and raised his voice. 'He said' why general Federal keeping us within touch, we'll be fixed right, and not a Christian army will remain here. We've got the signal and telegraph stations at the flood cove completed, and can guide every newly arriving Glandolinian division past every danger. We get to break those 'Christian hellhounds' or they'll crack us.'"

"Telegraph," said Gertrude. "Whew. Those Glandolinian generals must be well organized."

"And girlscouts of the enemy to secretly join forces with us with the purpose to frustrate us too," commented Joan. "You certainly did have your eyes open Susan. You are doing fine for the start of the test, more than we expected."

Susan turned to the eldest Vivian Girl.

"So there you are Princess," said she. "That's what I heard these Glandolinian officers said. Then afterwards of them said that about the signal and telegraph station, and this general Federal, and about girls and boyscouts of the enemy posing as a part of your own in reinforcements. I'm sure that is what they proposed -- he suddenly realized he had raised his voice and might have been overheard. So they left the room. But I'm sure he was suspicious of me, although we all did seem to be smoking as they all did. Now what had we better do. Or what should I do?"

"This is a serious matter, girls, a very dangerous one," said Susan. "I'm sure that is what they proposed -- he suddenly realized he had raised his voice and might have been overheard. So they left the room. But I'm sure he was suspicious of me, although we all did seem to be smoking as they all did. Now what had we better do. Or what should I do?"

"I have understood we have some sort of law barring any girl or boyscout from any outside quarter whom we do not know," said Joan. "But I'm busy about it."

All the others, except Violet, and her sisters nodded agreement.

"Well," said Joice. "In the days when this war was begun, and when our armies were infected with enemies within as well as without, not only from the eastern part of our country, but from unknown sections too, our general officers had grown alarmed at the secret arrival of large numbers of girl and boyscouts in the Glandolinian armies, and though they are not as we, they are exceedingly treacherous, vindictive too and something to dread. To get the best of you they'd stab you in the back and they would not meet you face to face in a fight. Besides these girl and boyscouts of the enemy have utterly different standards of military life than we have. They are paid, we do it for just our country only. Due to the great numbers of them for Glandolinia you will recall had one quarter of about the entire population of older children in the army as scouts, these learn to do their duties on less experience time and adventure than we, and to dress and eat more cheaply too. Accordingly we do our duties for nothing, they won't and they are so numerous, and they are so dressed at times that you cannot always tell them from child slaves, and consequently all our generals and even father had begun to worry at this influx of child scouts into the enemy's armies, fearing they would frustrate everything we and they do. Fortunately they have turned out less educated than we, they are mostly stupid, yet we always do what we can to allow to child scout into the army that does not know our honorable pass word and countergain."

"But we have a good number of child scouts, and fairly educated ones here," said Joice.

"Oh yes," said her sister, "But the enemy side has the most numerous. Of course mostly all of us are mostly professional scouts, signal scouts, adventure scouts, student scouts, and travelers. But ours are so few, and we are so particular whom we allow to come in."

"How many are there in total numbers in all our armies combined Joice?" asked Gertrude.

"Only about Five hundred thousand," was the reply.

"And have there been no further numbers admitted since then?" asked Joan.

"Not officially," replied Angeline Vivian. "During the progress of this awful war some labor battalions of independent girl and boyscouts were formed under contract to act with the camp fire girls, but they did not like the work and quit. However as I understand it, there has been elsewhere in this war zone a steady traffic along especially our own fronts in the attempted smuggling of Glandolinian girl and boyscouts into the Christian armies to mingle them with our own and to frustrate them in their duties but has not met with any success thus far. As to God, this is especially true near our own armies here, although smuggling rings have been discovered in operation elsewhere, and only a few months ago a company of five child scouts was smuggled into general Charles Browns army, but all detected and held as prisoners of war. The reason for wanting to put them into our troop of course, is that being secret members among us they could without our realizing it convey all plans of ours into the hands of the enemy while pretending to serve us. There are officers in the Glandolinian armies, who will pay well to any batch of these scouts who learn our intentions, and no questions asked. Consequently such smuggling rings come into being for the purpose of supplying this illicit demand. Thanks to Susan here, we have learned of this, and we'll allow to strange girl or boyscout force to join us, and will warn the Camp Fire scouts to be careful too."

"Well what shall we do about this information Princess?" said Madcliffe.

"Don't you believe we ought to order the generals to watch out for these schemes, and to tell the authorities of our child scouts."

"I certainly do," exclaimed Violet. "When we are back in the Christian lines I shall lay this matter also before the military secret service the first thing, and even then if when we get back strange scouts have come among ours we'll arrest every one. You Susan will have to go with us to tell them what you overheard."

"Meanwhile," commented Angeline Pichee. "They might so cleverly disguise these scouts as refugee child slaves that we would seem hoodwinked to arrest them."

"Well we can't help that," decided Violet. "We are superiors of all things being daughters of the emperor, and can arrest any strangers who cannot give the boy or girlscout signals and other evidences they really belong to us. As for shadowing our other letters, that is out of the question. But we'll frustrate that plan. And in the first place girls, the three generals already have a suspicion that Susan must have overheard them, and accordingly they will be on the watch. In the second place place we all will be ready for a good nights rest when we return to the lines, anyhow. I imagine that for what Susan overheard, all our army revenue officers will get good enough clues to enable them to run down any of these gangs of foe scouts."

After that the conversation became desultory. Violet lay outstretched on a couch. The others wandered out again into a club room and beyond to the observation room. No one was there now except a sentry and he was half asleep. It was growing late in the afternoon.

The sentry gave a start, mumbled something and started pacing up and down his usual beat, saying no doubt to himself "Wish those boyscouts would mind their own business."

All of them grew exhilarated at the prospect of hoping or of succeeding in finding out such things so soon, though they were within the world famous Lendelinian army, which is the flower of Lendelinia and unlike any other army, strange, fierce, and mysterious.

But at that very moment, the General who had suspected Quinn of overhearing him, was tipping a Gandelminian child scout who was near by to learn what sort of boy and girlscoouts they really were, and who "Indeed we would join," said Gertrude. They were all sitting on a grassy lawn in the center of the Glandelinian camp. This, as maybe the reader should remember was one of the most famous

"Oh yes we'll object," said Angelina Riches laughing. "We'll be awfully awfully put out. We don't want to find out or see a thing."

"Suddenly Radcliffe's pale rose to his feet and with an inchoate cry started to dart away. Gertrude seized him by the coat. Radcliffe writhed in her grasp and attempted to twist free. He was highly excited.

"Look" here," she said to all "Rudcliffe is right. If there is a big plot going to be carried out, and this fellow suspects us of having gained some news of it he probably would do just as Rudcliffe says."

"Suppose you call the Gemini Secret Service man 'Angeline' as posted Joan and if he is there, Mr. Gingore to call on you in our own tent in the camp. Wouldn't that be better than going to them?"

"Very good," approved Violet. "The Gemini Agents could make their way directly to our own suite without arousing suspicion if he takes precautions, while Radcliffe if he is correct and we are being shadowed, shadowed within the lines we could not stir out of any part of the company Street without being followed. Do the rest of you stay here and watch while I go to our own room, and telephone. If you see any more of these fellows call me. If not come up within half an hour. By then probably a Gemini man will have arrived."

The half-hour passed quickly for the others who sat there near the road intensely interested in the life of the Glandolinian soldiers, and especially in the Oriental style of their uniforms, and bag College Professor like square topped hats, and the others in their gorgeous gray uniforms. They saw no sign of the man Radcliffe believed was shadowing them, and at the end of said half hour, went up to their own room. Barely had they entered than there came a low rap at the door, repeated three times, and Angeline Vivian sprang to open it.

"There's the Gemini military agent," she said. "That's the signal he said he would give."

As he opened the door, a tall alert man stopped inside, and closed the door quickly behind him.

"Pardon my sudden entrance," he said in a low voice. "Are you the Princesses with the girls?"

"We are!"

"And I am James Scanlon, one of the Gemini," said the other, flipping back the right lapel of his coat, and displaying a small gold shield. "You wanted to see me."

"We did Mr. Scanlon. Won't you sit down."

The man took off his hat and accepted the proffered chair. He looked inquiringly at the boys and the girls, and Violet introduced her sisters and them too.

"Now," said Angeline. "You were somewhat mystified by my message. I being in a free camp did not want to say anything over the telephone about the nature of the business on which we wanted to see you. At last I did want you to come here without being seen. That is why I requested you to be cautious."

The other nodded.

"This our business," she said to the Gemini. "We receive many strange calls. So I was not at all surprised. I may as well tell you however, that others who realize I am here and who can be trusted realize my mission too."

"He shot a glancing searching glance at the others. Violet nodded.

"I see," she said. "We might have been enemies trying to lure you into a trap. That was a wise precaution on your part." But she added, leaning forward, "We are not enemies, but who have come into possession of certain information which we wish to convey to you and bring to the Christian lines right away."

"Wait a minute," said the Gemini in a low voice, and leaping to his feet he gained the door in two strides, threw it open, peered out and then disappeared.

While the others still sat at a table where he had left them regarding each other in speechless surprise, the Gemini member returned, closed and after a scout went out to do guard duty by it closed and fastened the fastened the door, and resumed his chair as if nothing out of the ordinary had happened.

"There was someone listening outside the door," he explained. "The when I opened it, saw someone running down the hall and he disappeared out of sight. Your room is only two doors from an angle in the hall. So I followed to the turning and glanced along the corridor but he was gone. Now what is it?" he demanded.

Violet herself explained, and when she had concluded concluded Susan herself once more rehearsed rehearsed the scraps of conversation which she had overheard the three low voiced professionals drop on the table in the opposite room of the Observation Hall a few hours before. The eyes of the Gemini blazed with satisfaction. He pounded one clenched fist into the palm of the other, repeating the phrase several times.

"Good work," said he. "Good work." Then turning to Susan he commanded, "Describe these Professional men to me." "....."

Susan complied. At the description of the man who had so strictly scrutinized Susan in the observation room, and whom Radcliffe believed had been with the two Professional Mutt and Jeff Spies, the Gemini leader uttered an exclamation.

"Do you know him sir?" asked Gertrude eagerly.

"I sure do and how," said the Gemini. "I believe I saw him in the company Street down a ways, although he did not see me as far as I can tell, and if he did he did not recognize me. He was hiding behind a tall tree."

"Who is he?"

"He is a Glandolinian official spy of many aliases. 'Red Spot' is his name among the Glandolinians, because of his freckled face and red head. He's the leader of all the Glandolinian spies and Military Service, and also the commander of a powerful gang of Glandolinian Professional spies, a gang with ramifications in many districts, wanted by all Christian armies not only here but wanted by the authorities of many countries of the world besides. He's been responsible for many deviltries throughout the Christian countries for many years, and is dangerous to our side too, but he's unlike the Mutt and Jeff Spies, for he'll do his work just for Patriotism only but we have never been able to lay anything definite at his door as to whether he is as foreign as he appears or a dark complexioned Glandolinian. It'll be a feather in the cap of any soldier who can also get the goods on Mr. Red Spot."

Violet, and her sisters were all excited. And they showed each other. Gertrude herself could not restrain an exclamation.

"Then what this little Orphan Girl overheard will be of some value to you?" she demanded.

"Value?" repeated the man. "Indeed you are right. I have also a surprise for you children too if you do not realize it already. The enemy are well acquainted with your purpose and decide to smuggle Glandolinian child scouts disguised as child slaves among your bands."

"We are well acquainted with that," said Violet. "We overheard that in a conversation among the scout generals."

"Well lately the smuggling of Glandolinian child scouts into other portions of the Christian armies have greatly decreased because it is a failure, and child scouts everywhere are onto their game. We know they are trying to come in, but we can easily stop them. We can suspect too that there must be a leak somewhere in our forces. We have managed to stop such strange smuggling it into the other Christian armies pretty well, but all our best efforts to stop the or to put a stop to bringing in disguised Glandolinian child scouts to spy on our own have not been successful everywhere. We have fleets of fast child scout patrols and also Camp fire girls operating off different points of the Christian armies but somehow the child Scout smugglers of the enemy coming from the various Glandolinian armies manage to elude them in the night, or on foggy days and push in their numbers in some unlocated place whence undoubtedly, they are whisked into the lines by waiting wagons and hidden."

"I should believe you could patrol the whole country, and have all the armies watched if necessary, and also capture all the enemy scouts, besides locate the clues as to the cause of the disaster disaster," said the Jack.

The man only shook his head.

"My young friend," said he. "If you knew more about the ways of our members, you would think differently. We have to do a tremendous amount of work on small donations and with a limited force and our lives are one of dangerous adventure and great peril. Our too is also not a spectacular branch of the Supreme Gemini Service, and because of the nature of the war, its costs, and the losses brought on by these awful disasters, the authorities of the Government cannot just now afford to spend any money on us. You do not realize children, and especially the Princesses, here how the country is tied up and at odds and ends. Moreover now too that the dreadful war has increased the national debt and a great amount of money has to be used to succor the refugees, they are even shouting for help. Instead of being able to give us more men and money they have now all they can do to help themselves. Our country is in greater peril than we imagine, and we have enemies within as well as without the government."

Gertrude Angeline nodded understandingly.

"But this tip about Glandolinian secret service spies within our lines," said Radcliffe, "returning to a new subject" won't that imperil us till more."

"Not if you are watchful," said he. "But it will help us. The spies are employed by those two Mutt and Jeff Professionals, who operate from one army to another another. Some think their appearances are a makeup but they are not, but mutual. There are also two famous spies among the enemy who have the same personal features, as Hans and Fritz would be in grown up faces in uniform and not comic appearances and these two are also extremely dangerous, treacherous and violent. Just to show you how valuable I consider your information I'll say that since sitting here I have made up my mind to make a trip immediately to the Christian lines myself and do what I can to frustrate such plans of the enemy. If I don't your efforts will be availed. All spies or strangers within the Christian lines who cannot prove they're refugees will be put under surveillance at once."

"But 'objected' Mr. Scamilton 'The code drawn up and deciphered might be from our station life - yours, Miss Aronburg.'"
"In which case case you would mean it would be about legitimate business," said Jean. "but we have Government licensed stations on our big raft but, they too are listened, and their codes on general file. I believe it could be a good move to put any of our coc code experts at work at some distant station."

"I haven't come here to work" answered Susan. "I am no christian dog either. My comrades are outside."

Just at that moment fortunately for her one of the generals called out loudly ~~hhhhhh~~/

"Oh Herbie, come down a minute, I want to show you something." The man slowly flew forward all about his he tried to tell him Herbie. Then came a girl who she had never seen before. Yet Herbie was still apprehensive and would have avoided her before, but the

The little girl's voice was low and musical, and also there was something in its tones which in a measure justified Sumner's fears. After a while the little girl gently demanded:—

"How come you to be here. I heard you was a fugitive from the wicked soldiers. Did they capture you if they did I can't say." "I came here with the Vivian Girl because as they are looking for me."

"I shall for ever hope there'll be an improvement for your

"Wait for it wife I hope there'll be an improvement but I don't see it, especially an improvement in your favor, for if there isn't I'll worry for you, for its safer to be a scout and waste than be flapping one part of the country to the other, though to be sure, as don't let us if you could been used to anything better than this milk."

At that moment Susan saw some one glance suspiciously at her as he passed, and involuntarily Susan's hand went to her mouth to prevent a scream, and the girl pulled her into the room and shut and locked the door. Then sitting for Susan to be over her composure she continued:

"Sunah replied that she had studied it for a few months when her father had been living, having studied it in a Military Training camp at Glendale and for a few weeks in the Military Study Air-Infantry camp at Honolulu in California.

"Oh I'm so glad" said Sil "for now I can give you a trail myself. My greatest objection I have to the kind of children I meet here is the foreigners who are so stupid at times you can't learn them anything. For this place of course won't you and I have good times in talking to them and you the pupil."

The food too which the stinginess of the slaveholder allowed her was not particularly conducive to her health. She was told that she managed the ironing with to which she had been accustomed to in the Christian Union. She should be a young woman who didn't go to have such a woman around her house, or can become a Christian. out of her sewing machine can of munnings mills. "If I'm not in uniform" she said, "I'll wear a blue dress." "I'll wear it if I'm not in uniform," said the sergeant orderly, forgetting he can't wear a blue dress. At this he was startled for the clump of big bushes which green near the house. At this stage of affairs Captain Alpine came dancing in, and a young Queen. If she thought the temperature of the kitchen conducive to health! Queen instinctively drew nearer to her as a friend and whispering her dressmen threatened with blue dress toward the orderly, who was returning with a big black strip lining off the lip she was to wear. "Strip it off the lip she was to wear," said Captain, and planting herself in the doorway, "If the orderly came up, she said, "Why come you with this blue intention!"

Intentions."

"Out of my way girl," said the orderly "I'll teach that upstart to destroy things when she's made mad." Punishing Gertrude aside, he entered the dining room. Susan retreated behind the other door, and the orderly was about to follow her, when Gertrude with a nimble bound, springing upon his back, was pulling him to the floor with a crash, and snatched the club from his hand and broke it into twenty pieces. Gertrude held him down and said, "You hit any one of us in uniform you boob and I'll crown you." How the matter would have ended is uncertain, for at that moment General Manley himself appeared, and to him the orderlyland Gertrude detailed their grievance, both in the same breath.

"I can't get at a single word you goons," said he, and turning to one of the child slaves, who was quietly juring potatoes he demanded:

"What is the row about?"

In a plain straight forward manner, he told all, beginning from the time they were first sent into the kitchen, and adding an opinion of his own that the girlscout was suffering from the heat. General Manley swung round upon the orderly and said:

"It is ridiculous to have such actions on your part, you are out of sorts to forget you cannot beat any one or fight any one in uniform whether it be a soldier or a child scout, and that if Susan needed punishment she'd get it by being put to work under guard, but as he had not witnessed the proceedings he wasn't going to do anything about it."

"At this girlscout here," said the orderly as he readjusted his hat, which was slightly displaced, "can't she be put into the guard house? She threw me down. There's badham to pay the whole time she's here."

"No," said Manley, "he did it to prevent you from clubbing the other girl in uniform. He didn't strike you, though she threatened to do so, and that's no excuse. You started the row and she finished it. Go to your duties and let's not hear any more." And Manley went out grumbling something to himself, glad too no doubt to get out of the mess so easily, as he didn't vary whether his soldiers or scoutscout (each other or not).

No sooner was Manley gone, than Gertrude catching Susan by the hand and "come up stairs, and I can tell you something good in a more congenial atmosphere." Then as Susan appeared a little startled she added, "Never you fear dearie, I know what I am about, and no one will bother us."

Indeed so far all these girlscouts with Susan had now been within the enemy lines for over thirteen hours, and Gertrude had taken her upstairs this morning to tell her to tie on her old sun bonnet, and run across the meadow, and through the woods until she came to a rye stubble, and then follow the footpath along the fence until she came to another strip of woods with a stream running through it. And just on the further edge of these woods said she, "you'll see that you will believe are a bunch of Glandelinian boyscouts. Tell them to come here that the mules is ready, and hand to the leader this letter written in English. If the sentries stop you tell him of them your around and they'll let you through but don't for the world let any one see the letter, give it about your person."

Susan tied her sun bonnet and hurried off, glad to escape for a few moments indeed from that hot kitchen with the child slaves at work with the endless round of dish washing, scouring of utensils and silverware, scrubbing floors, wiping door and window sills, washing down walls and ceilings, window washing and cushioning of chairs, and so forth. She had no difficulty in finding the way, and though she was challenged several times by sentries she told her desecration and was allowed to pass, and she almost screamed for joy when she suddenly came upon the wide stream which appeared to bright in clear in its dancing waves.

"What a nice place this would be to sit and read," was her first exclamation, and then she sighed heavily as she thought how small were her chances now. But she wanted to be a girlscout and she therefore realized she must stand the test. Then quickly her thoughts flashed to the past and her tear mingled with the clear water, which flowed at her feet, as she recalled the time when blessed with a father and mother's love, and a sister and brother, she could go to school and learn as other children did. She was roused from her reverie by the sound of boys voices, and whose tones she fancied were softer than usual, she followed the sound, and she was determined not to hurry but to follow the course of the stream, fancying she would find it to run toward the direction of the Christian line. She had not gone far when she came suddenly upon a squad of Gray and boyscouts and two girls, who seemed to be doing something at the edge of the stream. In the front of the boy who seemed to be the leader she recognized to be some boyscout she had seen somewhere far away before when she first started to study for scout work, when her parents were still living, and remembering that Gertrude had said of all scouts, she delivered the letter, and as she did so, she was about turning away as he did not recognize her when the smallest of the girlscouts spied her and called out:

"See here gone dear, I reckon that's Susan Gertrude. I'm going to converse with her."

"Jenny, please don't be too long, don't detain her as Gertrude won't like her," answered the girlscout called loose. But whether Gertrude would care about it or not, Jenny Hichee did not stop to think, and going toward Susan she said:

"Have you brought any other message besides that?"

"No," Susan replied. "I can't call the boyscouts. Gertrude wishes to see them," she said. "I could remain in some time if I wished."

"Was that you who screamed so loud before? I couldn't think who it was, but it can't be time for mess so early. It's only five o'clock."

"It won't be time for breakfast till two hours."

"Well we don't eat then till two hours, and we can stay here till that time. Won't you stay with us and tell a bit of your jaw?"

"No I can't stay too long. I must go back to Gertrude she's expecting me" said Susan. "And oh you ought to see how the poor child slaves have to work. It's heartrending."

"Work," repeated Jenny. "I think it's bad enough to have to be in this wretched old camp, without toiling for them dirty Glandelinians but come to have time to see a part of the flood from here and grubbing Susan's hand, she led her some distance till they came in sight where the water stretched like a inland sea with houses and trees partly submerged, but where they stood the flood was partly dammed up until it was like a large deep clear pool indeed as clear as crystal, looking in Susan could see lots of household furniture on the bottom, while a fish occasionally darted out and then disappeared."

"I made a good trip on this flood myself," said Jenny. "My brother Henry helped me, and Susan was also good. The general says I'm a great—great—flood forger." The word, but it means a land fish, and I was persuaded by a Glandelinian patrol captain and had an accident before I got here during the excitement of the chase, and I guess I do look a fright, don't I?"

Susan for the first time now noticed the appearance of her companion. He was an evenly built but chubby and pretty little girl, with a round sunny face and laughing blue eyes, while her dense black hair hung around her forehead in short tangled curls though in general it was a long bob as she had to wear it that fashion in the Glandelinian encampments for she'd bring no action upon herself. The front breadth of her uniform dress was plaited with mud. One of her shoestrings was untied, and the other one gone and her shoulder was badly ripped. The bottom of one pantalolet was entirely torn off, and the other rolled nearly to the knee disclosing her inner angle which was badly scratched and had been bleeding. The string of her uniform girdle was twisted into a hard knot, and the bonnet itself hung down her back, partially hiding the chasm made by the absence of three of her four hooks and eyes. Altogether she appeared as if she were the kind of little girl which one often finds in the country swinging on gates, and making mud pies. Even her face had traces of mud. All girlscouts even of the enemy side too were usually very neat, and in reply to Jenny's question as to whether she appeared a fright, she answered, "I like your face better than I do your dress, because it is not so dirty."

"Why so I can clean early this morning," she answered ruefully. "But there can't be anybody be pursued by an enemy and in trying to get away avoid a mud puddle and not fall in unless it's a miracle. You see my pantalolet is hanging by a few threads, and as I needed a bandage to tie up by badly scratched hand with I had to tear it off. If I can I'll get the Glandelinian Glandelinian patrol captain who is responsible for me looking like this."

"In a mother did I was going to get a swell uniform?" "I'm in General Manley's headquarters. It's makes too much trouble to stay there but the King's mess Principals are sitting at the table through a test."

"General Manley? He's a spiteful wicked old thing. He's afraid of us girlscouts isn't he?"

"He certainly is but he's suspicious of me I'm afraid, and I'm getting afraid of him now. I always run away when I see him."

"Oh Henry? Jenny called to her brother, I want you to come and see Susan Geraldine. When he is around," she added to Susan "Glandelinian girl and boyscouts don't come here to bother us."

Henry gave and knowing whistle and pointing to his sister said:

"You went through a cyclone didn't you. Oh is that the little Orphan Girl. Ain't she delicate. Most as small as my little sister. I was she was mine."

The tears came into Susan's eyes, and Jenny said, "Henry Hichee you are the greatest boy. Every boy like you wants some orphan for your sister."

"Cracky," said Henry with another whistle. "That may be too, but you see we are mostly all unhappy because of the enemy, put how about Susan. Who is she with just now."

"General Manley?"

"Sitting around that man," said the boy his brow darkening. "What are you thinking of Susan. Where did you get a ch nerve. If he finds you out."

"Isn't he but fair?" said Jenny wiping some of the mud off her dress. "But Gertrude says we girls are all in the same predicament. There is one Glandelinian general who isn't so ugly. But by the way do you know Walter Starving?"

"Yes," said Henry.

"I know Penrod," said Jenny.

"Do you know him too?" asked Jenny to Susan.

"Penrod?" said Susan quickly. "He is one of the best friends I've got in the world."

"Well, he's a good deal for the Princess and oh every body loves him ever so much. I believe he's the best boy scout in the world though he is a wfully coverts at times. And isn't his face beautiful?"

"I'm a little doubtful of it" said Susan. "What makes you think he is so good looking?"

Q "Oh I don't know, minus he's so nice for even being a foreign boy" and as if the argument were conclusive Jenny suddenly unrolled her umbrella and tried to rip some of the mud off from her dress, at the same time glancing toward her sister, who at times a little distance was reclining against an old oak tree, and poring intently over the distant encampments of the enemy, seeing that she was not observed, Jenny drew nearer to Susan and said "If I could not tell you any one until we leave these camps, I'll tell you something."

[illegible]

Susan hesitated a moment for as much as she liked Penrod, there was another boyscout leader whom she cared for better, though so far he had never been seen by her as much as Penrod. After a minute she answered; been seen by her as much as Penrod. After a minute she answered:

"Yes! like or did li e Walter Starring butter, but I'm afraid I will never see him any more." And then she told Jenny how her home had been destroyed by the enemy because he had perceived that the explosion at Albiham, then she told Jenny of the long dreary flight through the country where her parents had been murdered, and of the horror of her fathers cruel death, and how she came to the mid night when her mother and brother and sister died, she could not go on, and laying her face in Jennys lap and cried for a long time. Jennys tears flowed too, but she tried to restrain them, for she saw that Rose was watching her movements. "Are long however she thanked her for asking, and then Jenny softly caressed a Susan said:

"Don't cry so, for we all love you, and when you become a girl scout we'll have lots of thrilling adventures, plenty of fun and good times too. We are in General Vivians army but it'll be most six weeks before we'll be needed to march in the brothers army. I mean to see you every day."

"In general Aronburg's army?" said Suen inquiringly. "And you are now in general Vivians? Starring, Walter Starring is in general Vivians."

Jenny was silent for a moment, then suddenly clapping her hands together she said:

"I know it's all right. He is just opposite our own girls' scout camp, and is General Blin Night Lingers Cousin. Just 'y he's a great soldier and a general guard. Only of course you must know him good for he is very severe, and is terribly strict. I'll tell him about you, for June muner my superior says he's one of the Guardians or retainers of the Vivian Girl Princesses and perhaps he'll give you a commission."

Sagin felt that she wouldn't for the world have Walter Starring request for any more favors, and she quickly answered, "No, I don't want you to. Promise."

"No, no you mustn't ask him anything for me. I don't want you to. Promise that you won't."

"Promise that you won't." She begged again. "I guess I won't tell my sister Rose either, for she and Walter Starring are great friends. Walter Starring says he doesn't know which to life best us or the Vivian Girls, though he thinks Violet, and hands her sister sisters the goodest. He likes all us good little Abbiemnian boys and girls, and so do I."

to it." Susan knew that all Abbeennian children (like herself) had no idea of which to (boast), and therefore having heard much of the greatest girl of all Jennie's mother but having never seen her she very naturally mentioned her as if she had been her own sister, saying how much she wished to see her.

"Why don't you ever go."

"Why don't you over 50."
"I'm going when we get through here in this Glandelinian camp, Gertrude and I was Susan's reply." Radcliffe told me the last time he was here that he would come and bring us."

"Oh, I'm so glad and when you start in being a girl scout I hope they put you in my scout class, for Jennie Turner is the teacher of it, but if they do I'll contrive to have her sit with us because—because—here Jenny Pearson, but seeing that Susan was waiting for her to finish the sentence she added, "She's a good protector to you, and can do anything for you you ask her to." Then a beautiful Rose Fisher coming forward, "I'll tell class,

"Thank you, young Johnny" said Rose Fitcher coming forward. "I'll tell General Lillian of this new intimacy and he'll aid us I'm sure. But come along, our superior is calling us and we must go."

Jenny rose to obey, but whispered to Susan "You'll find me most any time in any part of General Vilvana's army. I'd ask you to come to the generals headquarters with us, only you I suppose remain here with the others for your tests. I shall see you when you return to the Christian lines. Good bye."

Susan watched her for several minutes as she disappeared among the bushes with the rest, then she too started to look for General Lincoln's headquarters, with a lighter heart than she had before for many a day. She had found an extra new friend, and though of course Gertrude Angeline was slightly impatient because she had been so long, she did not scold as was expected, but she commenced humming a tune while one of the Glandulian officers was storming about a glass of so milk which he had found in the cupboard. A sharp bang on her ears, brought her round, and, and the tears into her eyes, but she thought of Jenny and all her girl and boyscot friends, and the fact that all of them also knew Walter. Staring made him seem nearer, and when the Glandulian officials did not see her she hastily drew from the golden locket which she had taken from her bosom the picture, and glanced at the handsome juvenile revealed quickly thrust it back as she heard a stifled cry in the passage. She was afraid she would not have any opportunity of seeing Jennie pilche again that week for she was kept busy from morning till night by the girlscouts who had brought her, to a here and there after secret information then to go and learn the conversation of the officials by bringing water to their rooms and to size up the camps if possible. Yet fifty times that morning the officers told her that she didn't half do her duty as a girlscout should - to say nothing about the new ones who were with her, and that her superior who brought her was not stern enough or too easy.

superior who brought her was not stern enough for her. Susan was willing to do whatever she could for only her own friends, but sometimes she began to feel the test was too severe for her own efforts and had often wished that they could go back to the Christian lines for the she would not have to toil so hard. She had several times been sent on warrants to general Federal's tent, and she had first made a duplicate of the message before delivering him the original, and the general had always been able to hear the meaning of her why she didn't do more, and spoken roughly to her, demanding of her why she didn't do more, and telling her she wouldn't look so pale if she was more willing to do as she was instructed. It also was through Gertrude's shrewdness too that Susan had obtained permission to go alone toward the Christian lines, with a pretended intention to mingle a mong girlscout of the Christians, give them information, seek out Jenny Jenny niches, and then return to the enemy lines.. Gertrude was a professional shrewd spy girl and of everything done, even planned, by Violet, and her sisters, Gertrude generally took the lead, and every body was apt to get behind her. One peculiar thing that happened on this morning was due to the nature of real Glandolinian boy and girl scouts really were one of themounted a large writing table, and sang camp meeting hymns of the enemy military as loud as he could scream. One of the girls who called, another nodded and laughed, a second by way of increasing the badman drew a file across an iron philippe that was hollow when the Glandolinian officials scolded and declared--they would not and could not pay such a noise. This scene Susan looked on in perfect amazement, then again she chanced before break fast to meet Sal and begged her to stay in the roomwith her and listen while show she read to her from her little child's Fairy Story book.

Let it all the noise down below, and some of the officers shout scolding, and cursing, the reading was perplexing business, and at last a bit of intelligence Susan tossed the book on the bed saying "who can read with such noise. Those boycotts below are crazy."
Indeed Susan was glad when the mass call sounded, for this stopped the racket..

Gertrude decided that since meals were passed it was high time to see Susan on that street errand to the Christian lines. Angelina, who she promised that if she had the time she would accompany her, and in case he failed Billy was to go instead. Susan would have preferred going alone, but gaily begged to go, and, this Susan finally asked Gertrude to let her go too. She consented however with some unwillingness, and now it had been hard telling which looked forward to the next hour with the most impatience Susan, or the girl scout Billy, the latter of whom was anxious to see the Susan, or the Christian lines once more. To usane happiness there was on one drawback. A week before her mother's death, she had given to her now dead sister a her own best straw hat, which she had outgrown and having lost her original hat in the enemy lines, the only bonnet she still possessed was the one which Mr. Starling had critized so severely, and which by this time was nearly worn out. Angelina, who to disguise Susan how she had passed the time, had heard that Susan bore a great deal of things which was worn out and Angelina had immediately looked over a straw hat which had brought into the enemy lines with her and selected a blue ribbon arched which she herself had worn three years before, and which she had given to Susan and gave it to Susan to use until she got to the Christian lines. Then she was instructed to carry it in her hand only.

The hat which Angelina picked had given to Susan was even rather large for a good sized woman, and was therefore a world too big for Susan, whose face appeared in it, as Angelina picked smilingly expressed it "As a yellow pippin stuck into the far end of a firkin." Yet Susan was to wear it for the purpose of her appearance making the Glandelinians believe she was some strange foolish child, and Gertrude also said "It was plenty good enough for a disguise, reminding Susan that when out on duty expedition, no child scout, even the highest superiors can be choosers."

"You can see it to fool the Glandelinians with," returned Sally, "and therefore when you are lasci leaving the camp you won't bring any suspicion upon your self."

Susan made no remark however, but she secretly wondered if the Glandelinian sentries would be suspicious of her because she wore such a hat. Still her desire too to see Jennie Turner, prevailed all over other feelings, and therefore this morning after the morning meal it was a very happy child which at about eight o'clock bounded down the stairway, tidily dressed in a ten cent looking blue lawn suit of uniform. There was another circumstance, too, aside from the prospect of seeing Jennie Turner, which made her eye's sparkle until they were almost golden in brightness. The night before in glancing over the articles of dress which she would need she had discovered that there was not a decent pair of stockings in her small wardrobe. Gertrude, to whom she mentioned the fact commenced a tugging or tumbling over a basket containing her own wearing apparel, selecting first a fine pair of cotton stockings which she had no doubt long preserved because they were the last thing her father had given her.

"They surely are not much too large for her now," thought she, and she waited until all around the house was still, and then creeping stealthily to Susan's room she pinned the stockings to the uniform pants, hanging the whole to or before the curtainless window, where the little girl could see them the moment she opened her eyes. Susan knew full well to whom she was indebted for this unexpected pleasure, and in her accustomed morning prayers which she said without kneeling down, she remembered Gertrude, requesting that she would be always successful in her work.

On descending to the dining room Susan found Sally waiting for her, and as she expected rigged out in a somewhat fantastic style indeed. Her dress which was an old blue colored uniform Glandelinian silk was altogether too short, tight, and too narrow for the prevailing fashion, but she must wear it for her purpose. A handkerchief much too large was thrown across her neck and fastened to her fastened to her belt in front by a large purple bow. Her hat which was not a very decent one and also too large for her was almost entirely covered by a heavy heavy blue plume, and notwithstanding the sun, to make it it more showy she carried in her hand a large green umbrella saying to one of the guards she was afraid it might rain because it was so gloomy and dark outside.

"Come Susan," said she the moment the child appeared "put on your big hat and let us start. It's getting late...."

There was no looking glass in Susan's room and she stopped before the one in the dining room while she adjusted her hat, but her courage almost failed her as she saw the queer looking image reflected by the mirror. She was unusually thin, and as she placed the big hat upon her head she was half determined not to go. But Sally caught the child's hand saying, "Come Susan, it's time we are off. The Glandelinians won't know you as you appear now. Do you remember the message you had to learn by heart?"

"Yes," said Susan.

Scarcely were they out of sight of the building when Sally setting herself upon a large log was removing the shoes and stockings from her feet.

"What are you doing?" asked Susan in great astonishment.

"I guess I know better than to wear these in passing a certain sentry," answered Sally. "I'm going bare footed until I reach the river bridge, and then I shall replace them again."

The shoes and stockings were carefully rolled up in a piece of cloth, which the girl scout produced from her waist, and then they went swiftly forward and reached the center of the vast Glandelinian encampment some time before the drill bugles were sounded.

"Come down this company street, please," said Susan to her companion, who with shoes readjusted and umbrella hoisted, was mingling along, courtesying to every one she met, and to avoid suspicion sending every soldier how he was. "Come down this company's street; I want to see something."

Sally readily complied, saying as they drew near a large gray tent in which a number of boy scouts were dwelling. There is nothing very elegant in the formation of this tent. Susan made no reply however. With her head resting upon a fence, she was suddenly sobbing as though her heart would break. Very gently Sally laid her hand on Susan's shoulder, and led her away saying, "What would I not have given for such a command of tears when all my folks and relations perished in the flood and I was the only survivor. But some how or other I could not weep, and my tears seemed all to burn in coals, and which seemed to set my brain on fire."

The next time Susan raised her head, they were opposite some of the tents of her own spying friends disguised as Glandelinian scouts, where Sally declared it her intention to stop. As they were coming up to the front of one of the tents, one of the boy scouts who had heard their footsteps, came out shaking hands with Susan and trying hard to prevent himself from laughing at the wonderful courtesy which Sally made him just for the fun of it. On entering the house they found one of the boy scout flat on his back, the pillow pulled out from under his head and the bed clothes tucked closely under his chin.

To avoid doing something for a Glandelinian general he doesn't like he's pretending to be ill," said the boy to Susan, while Sally waiting up to the bedside asked jokingly -

"Is your illness unto death my good boyfriend?"

"Oh I'm afraid not," was the laughing response. "The Glandelinian official who looked me over and who claims he's a doctor said my sickness would last for years."

Susan glanced inquiringly at the other boy scout, and a smile parted his lips as he said "He was reading yesterday about a soldier who had been bedridden with a spinal difficulty, and he pretended to have a spinal disease. He's pretending it for a good purpose to solve the work he is doing for us. But where did you get that girl's fright of a hat?" He continued, "It's like looking down a hole in the ground to see your face."

Susan realized that all boy scouts was very observing the way all girl scouts dressed, and she blushed painfully as she replied that Angelina picked gave it to her for a disguise."

Then Sally he had mischievously recommended a mustard plume to be the most proper thing to draw the "spinal disease" out, started to go saying "She wanted to be within the new lines in season, as their mission was urgent. According they again set forward, attracting more attention and causing more remarks, than any two who had ever passed through the Glandelinian encampments before. They however in showing their out pass had no difficulty with the sentries, and half an hour or so afterwards on reaching the front of the Christian lines Sally proving her identification to the first sentry she met requested him to give her a shorter route lead to the first sentry she met requested him to give her a shorter route lead to where she could find the way to General Vivians headquarters, and he accordingly directed them to the proper route. Susan had been in general Vivians lines before, but as she had never been in this location, she did not understand or know in what part of the Christian lines general Vivians headquarters was located, and whether it was a house or merely a tent. A long a certain distant bell in the camp began to toll, and soon an official uniformed as if in deep mourning appeared on horseback and passing down the company street halted before a group of officials. He was accompanied by a little girl tastefully uniformed in something like a frock of light bluish purple silk tissue. A handsome

French straw hat of purple color with a red band was set just faintly on one side of her head, and her long bobbed hair hung over her white neck and shoulders. Though she did not see her face, Susan realized this must be Jennie Turner, and involuntarily started up, she leaned forward far enough from the horse she too was now riding to bring her bonnet directly in sight of some girl scouts just riding past, and they glanced at it as if it was some sight of a great curiosity. Blushing scarlet the poor girl smiled on her horse's saddle, saying half aloud;

"Oh I wish I had it come home now."

"Don't be alarmed," said Sally. "Those girls won't laugh at you if you want to ride over to the group of officials, and attract Miss Turner's attention."

Yet Susan feared that her companion may attract more attention than her bonnet and twirling her dress had her not to do so. Susan or Sally complied with her wish, but she had no further opportunity that morning of deciding whether general Vivians or someone's Christian came were best or not, for she was constantly watchful, and whenever she saw some strange man scrutinizing Susan more closely than they ought, and knowing why she might be done so, she shook her little fist, or a motion as if she was going to draw her pistol warned them to disappear. Twice during the waiting for the column to break Susan thought, my, I feel sure that she caught Jennie's eye but it was quickly withdrawn apparently as if unwilling to be recognized. Finally Sally insisted on going over to the group immediately so they rode forward, just as the black robe man started to ride out of the column of officials. Had she chosen, Susan could have touched the man's gloomy colored uniform as he rode past; but from back in the line she almost shrank from being seen, and also would probably not have been observed at all, had not Sally planted herself directly in front of the strangely armed man saying loud enough for all near enough to hear to hear "Sir, do you know where I can find Miss Jennie Turner who wishes to see her?" at the same time pointing to Susan, who was nervously grasping the string of her strange hat, as if to remove the offensive article. The man proudly saluted Sally, and advancing toward the little orphan said very kindly;

"I am glad to see you within our lines little girl. I have heard much of each of you and hope you will each become a good little girl scout. Yes

"Miss Turner is here but she is busy just now, but you may accompany me to her tent if you desire."

"The words and manner were so respectful and fatherly, that Susan was obliged to force down her tears, as it made her again remember her sad loss, but she relented that she was willing, but too that she wanted to go to some army chapel to pray for her parents and brother and sister, and wanted some one to go with her."

"It's pretty warm for you to ride so far, but if you wish it I'll say you can go," said the man. "Only be careful don't get red and heated, as this is not natural heat but from the forest fires." And saluting the soldier in black gathered up the reins and slowly rode away, scarcely did he start forward when Jenny Ritchie came tripping up and seizing both Susan's hands exclaimed:

"I'm real glad you have come here. I thought you hadn't come here until I heard them talking about a orphan girl in large quonset hut. But let's go for a minute to my force of scouts and you'll have a chance to see."

"Miss Turner while the girls scouts are assembling for drill duty." Susan accompanied her young friend to a large circular formation of tents in an open square, at the front of which without avoiding it she met Jenny Ritchie riding up face to face. There was a sudden exclamation of joy in Susan's part, and for a moment Jenny drew back surprised and then riding forward said:

"Did you wish to see me little Orphan girl. I didn't at first know you looked so queer in that headress. Why did you want to wear that for?"

Susan was half determined to tear the bonnet from her head and trample it under her feet but Jenny rode forward closer and softly questioned her and said:

"Don't mind it just the same if it is just for a disguise. We all love little orphans and so does the Princess. Jenny has told me yesterday you wished to see me. I'm glad you came as I was going over to see you if you hadn't I saw Walter Starring in the camp of General Aronburg's army looking for you as he did not know you went over to the enemy for a spying tent."

"However it seemed to require more than the love of all scouts to soothe Susan just then. The remembrance of the enemy's cruelty to her because her parents knew something, the foe didn't want the world to hear of the disaster she had met for months, so different and horrible so unusual from that she had anticipated had stung her heart, and sitting near the entrance of one of the tents she burst into a passionate fit of tears. Jenny Ritchie who was really distressed occasionally pressed her hand in token of sympathy, at the same time offering her gloves, peanuts, and sugar plums. At this too there was a brighter flash than she often could recall on Miss Turner's cheek for she knew why the little girl so often could not prevent herself from crying, and she so jumbled together the words she was trying to say that her aide-de-camp asked her that was the matter. By this time all other girls and boy scouts were assembled for the customary drills and this time Susan had dried her tears, and she slowly advanced toward Jenny Ritchie and said:

"Don't you go to Miss this morning with me I want to pray for my friends."

"Jennie looked down at her embroidered pantaloons, and said "Oh it's so dirty, I'm afraid I'll get all dirty. Wait 'till I put on my uniform and then I'll go it'll only take me a minute."

However Jennie was faster than she thought she was and in half a minute she was already astride her horse.

"Don't ride too fast," Jennie warned. "We mustn't get too hot. In fact I never seen such a hot morning. It's sure sizzling."

"Why not asked Jenny with a salute, "I ride hard every day till I am almost roasted, and my skin isn't half as rough as some others. But say are you going with Susan to Church?"

"I guess I will," said Susan, and then anxious to make Susan feel a little comfortable and make her forget as much as possible her sorrow, she added "General Vivian says, my eldest sister Mary is coming to see me before long, and then we girl and boyscouts are going to have one day off to ourselves, and joining with the camp fire girls will have a real good time for once. Susan must come too. I've secured lots of pretty things from the flood, many shawls and dresses, and I wear French gaiters like you see this one every day just for fun. I found them. They were in a trunk floating on the surface of the flood. Susan I'll give you one and you must throw away that old bonnet. You don't need it now. And Jennie took it off and threw it into the dust. Feeling there was plenty of time she sent one of the boy scouts for one of her sisters which Susan soon saw wearing. Then glancing first at Susan then at Jennie Ritchie, Jenny said:

"I suppose you know Susan's history?" "Not much," said Susan. "But I know as much as I've been told. She's lost her parents and brother and sister. If I were her I'd take it out on the enemy. She'd be justified. The enemy make war on children. It's a child's nature to go on know."

The three girls, two privates, and the other the high officer Jennie proceeded together toward the army chapel. During these few Susan wept for a long long time, but she felt more comforted when she had received Holy Communion.

"It would not be so bad," said Susan when they were outside again "if there was anybody left, but I am all alone in the world. I haven't even an Uncle or an Aunt. They died in the flood."

"It was in vain that Jennie told her of the love of all the Abbinians for little orphans. Susan wept only more, wishing that she had died. At last remembering she had left Billy behind her, and knowing that it was time to go, she arose, and leaning on Jenny, whose arm was passed lovingly around her, she remounted the horse and the three started to return. The others were already on their horses of drill ere they reached the other part of the camp, and as Susan had no desire again of going elsewhere and as the two Jenny's had much rather stay inside their tents for a time, they sat down inside on a lounge, Susan wondering where the girl scout Billy had gone.

"I want to look around and see if she's anywhere about," said Jenny, and going out side, she clapped her hand over her mouth to keep back a laugh and returned to the others saying:

"Oh if I didn't see the faintest light in the world. I see her out there and where she got them I don't understand, but there's two prisoners I hear possession. They are arguing but she is not taking any argument."

It seems that Billy had amused herself during the intermission by riding through different parts of the camp alone, and had come upon two men in civilian clothes who were snoping round the camp, acting suspicious and asking every one if there was any (Keed by the name of Susan Gardline.) As she did not satisfy their action she had watched them closely and followed them cautiously, and found soon evidence to justify her in arresting them. Of course she was only a little girl, but when they saw her determined face, and the pistol muzzle pointing at them, they gladly so to say threw up their hands, and she had marched them to the first squad of soldiers she came to. They bargued with her but she said not a word. After this incident Billy gathered up her umbrella, and courtesying her way through the crowd of soldiers soon found Susan and started for the fore lines again, declaring the reason why she had arrested the men. "You sure must watch everywhere Susan," she said. "Glandelinians are bent on getting you for some king about Abbinian. Do you know something about these explosions?"

"What my parents have told me yes. When I'm initiated into your force I'll tell everything."

"So far for your safety sake," said Billy "you'd better keep quiet until one of our superiors requests you to tell it. These Glandelinians who know your name will try to make in their efforts to kill you."

As they were descending a long hill which led to a ride bridge, a column of girls scouts passed them on horseback and Jenny Ritchie who was inside, said the reins of her horse, saying to one of her superiors "Please Nell stop and let's go with them for a short distance, and we can comfort them for its such hot traveling and so far."

Nell might possibly have complied with her friends request, had not Lucy Gray clapped to the spirited horses, and said "Don't Nell for meys sake go along with them now. That'll draw suspicion upon them and we'll be responsible for the consequences. That little orphan girl is threatened by the enemy and if something happens to her now if we do it, we'll be to blame."

So the column reluctantly passed on, but Susan forgot the long ride by remembering the glance of affection which they all gave her as they rode on past. The girl scout Billy herself for some reason or other seemed unusually fat and even this time forgot to remove her shoes and stockings when she reached the bridge that ran over the small stream. Susan suspected there was something weighing upon her mind, but she did not care just then to question her knowing that Billy in her own good time would reveal her thoughts. They had nearly reached the Glandelinian camp, when Billy suddenly turning aside and exiting herself upon a long log under a big tall pine tree, said "Miss Gardline I've been thinking what splendid girl scout would be if you got in. Oh how hard I had to hold myself to day to keep from extemporizing to every one about what the Glandelinians do over there. I mean I would have been questioned by every one I met."

In the excitement of the moment Billy arose, and knowing that her arms outstretched in a manner in a manner indeed rather alarming to Susan who had never before seen so wild a look in the girl's eyes, soon however her mood changed, and raising her seat she continued in a milder tone:

"I don't ever have that I was a shadow."

"A shadow?" said Susan. "A shadow? Why not?"

"To be sure," answered Billy, "that's to hinder. Haven't I told you told you repeatedly that I possess an unusually large amount of judgment, and I added to this to my knowledge of grammar history and geography, and the common powers of imagination, enabled me to do things which but for an unaccountable for fear of nature, would have rendered my name immortal. Do you realize that for six months and a half though you never were conscious of it, through me the Glandelinians had never captured or killed you?"

"Through you," said Susan.

"Yes," said Susan, and Susan or Sally continued, "I don't understand," said Susan, and Susan or Sally continued, "You see, I wrote about six hundred pages of the perils you went through, of the destruction of your home, and the deaths of your parents and sisters, to keep track of them, and the reason I arrested those two men recently is because I know all the rascals who are bent on your destruction. I must confess I have been shadowing you all those dreary months. Did you not remember a certain boy who always at unexpected times came to your aid?"

"Yes," said Susan "who was a fine dandy little boy too." "Who was he Sally?"

"It was I, disguised."

"You?"

"Certainly. Do you remember that note I showed you so you'd remember me? Well I still have it to prove if necessary. It was a terrible strain for me, and the hardships of shadowing you and your aunt to protect you from your enemies came near tanning my brain, but there are many of these enemies trying to get you, and one of these days I'll astonish Glandelinia myself. I know more than you do Susan about Abbianna's disaster. It might be the same as you, except more. But the Glandelinians are not conscious of it. But I'll tell you something of it later on, and when to reveal it, but when we "blab it out" we'll only tell the Princesses. You see. That's Gertrude's advice. But come, we must hasten or Gertrude will be afraid we are not coming back."

Accordingly they started for home, and were not questioned fortunately by Glandelinian guards and they safely reached their destitute destination.

"Have to first," said Jane, "I vote for the general headquarters of the enemy generals. Here the bulletin says they're to hold a special council to day and we'd like to find out what's its about. It would be to us if we succeed in finding out something the greatest achievement in the world."

All of the girl scouts stood in the center of one of the big company streets of the enemy camp. The hour was near ten in the morning, and all the soldiers were away on drill. The usual early morning smoke fog which had hung over the region, as it did every day practically since the forest fires grew so enormous, had been slightly thinned out since an her or more, and a stiff southwest wind was blowing. The sky was however as heavy as if it was very cloudy but of a peculiar color, and it was as like twilight, and it was not growing any lighter. A brisk breeze blew like up the tremendously wide thoroughfare of the Glandelinian camp, which was the widest of all the Company Streets, so wide, that if it had been a city street like those of Calverline it could have accommodated six street car lines with the width of two ordinary streets left over on each side between the outer tracks and the curbs.

"If it is only cool and exhilarating," commented Angeline Ritchie. "It would make a person feel peppy."

"The bulletin says too that this continually darkness, caused by the fire," said Jane. "We'll have a hot smoky day the whole year."

"You waiting for your horses feeds," said a uniform soldier to Gertrude. They glanced toward the sound of the voice, to find half a dozen good horses waiting for them having been brought by the soldier. Indeed those were the horses they had ordered for themselves. The girl scouts moved toward them.

"We ought to decide right now where we want to go for sure," declared Rudcliffe.

"I'll tell you that comrades," Gertrude said, "Penrod gave me the number and address of Vanley's main headquarters, and advised us to go and take Susan there. So that nothing will happen a happen out of the ordinary. But shall guard her, suppose we do that first. Then we can go sight seeing through the camp on pretense of duty and gain some of the knowledge of the strength of the enemy position. It just occurred to me. Wonder where that big building is."

He began or rather she began glancing over the pages of a small memorandum book.

"Here it is. On Company Street called Ota Corner. Let's ask that boy scout how far away that spot is, if he'll tell us without suspicion."

After a little discussion, it developed that the address given-- or the first company street paralleling their own to the northward-- lay on the route of an old abandoned railroad. Right the same way the girl and boy scout company wanted to go. Accordingly all mounted their horses and rode away. However all the generals were away when the children arrived, led by the civilian girls, and at the ringing of the bell by the messenger for them, a tall man with a beard about came from a rear room. His hair was parted in the middle, and he was in his shirt sleeves.

"What was I did for the funds?" he asked in, driving, but with some slight light of suspicion in his eyes.

"Penrod himself stepped forward. "Are you the old Camp in this house?"

"Yes," said the man. "You don't look it. But I'm the chief scout in charge here of these" and Penrod pointed to all the girl scouts who had come with him, including Violet, and her sisters. "Here's a note from General Federal (A duplicate made by one) I believe you have met him often."

"General Raymond Richardson Federal?"

"Yes, I'm glad to meet you," said the man enthusiastically. "Yes I know all our generals by that name. I know in particular General Raymond Federal. When he led a great army against the Christian dogs near St Vincent I was sent to him with a note telling him to retreat and rejoin Manley and move for Trinogue. He's enthusiastic about this big flood that is raging in this state, and therefore fires greatly interest him, and he hopes they continue. We have had a number of great and important conversations. I remember him very well. But here I'm keeping you all standing. Won't you come back into the main room (the room) and sit down. Bring your comrades."

For a time the boys and girls stood out of the corner of their eyes were kept busy examining various maps hanging on the wall in that room and finally when they were alone one of them examined different telegraph appliances. All the time Penrod kept up a running fire of comment.

"You this," he said to Violet, "taking up a small device of unusual shape is a telegraph sound detector. The only similar device in the field so far is our own telegraphic compass, but it is clumsy and not reliable. With this device, however I am quite certain I have solved the problem of locating the point of origin of any strange or unusual workings of any telegraph."

Violet gave an exclamation.

"What say?" asked Gertrude turning toward him.

Penrod could hardly conceal his impatience.

"You know a good deal about telegraph telegraphing Gertrude, how does it work?" he demanded eagerly.

Gertrude looked at the instrument and then said it. "I suppose we wanted to locate the main point of the origin of some strange code message written off at the main telegraphic station within the lines yonder (she dared not say Christian lines here for fear of detection) in purple. First Penrod, and you too all of you listen to what I say, we could use a doctor doctor detector there, and find out along what line the strange ticking sound came to the station. It might be up the flood or down the river, from the direction of the conflagration or elsewhere elsewhere, or east, west, south or not north, south east or northwest. Suppose it came from the direction of the fire, or a from down the flood or from the north, or south. Then at a point southeast of this vast camp, we would and again by this sound detector and again at a third point south of the sound and discover what the alarm is. When at all three stations, the strange sound of ticking was loudest we would have three bearings upon the point of its origin and could write down the details much faster. Where they intersect, the the-----"

"The Glandelinian signal station would easily be located," said Jean Sander.

The next moment she was covered with confusion, as a Glandelinian soldier came in and almost catching her words regarded Jean blankly. So intent had the soldier been upon the description of the device and the method of its operation that he was aware only of an objection interruption. It just then did not realize the nature of it, though he had almost been explicit when he heard her words.

Violet, and her sisters, glared alarmingly at Jean for fear she was discovered.

"But," said the soldier, "what did you say, my girl scout?"

"Thinking quickly she answered:--"

"I just said something about the point of origin being where the lines of telegraph intersected. I declared Jean, considering it wise to withhold the whole truth inasmuch as the matter of the Glandelinian signal station was not for this man's ears."

"What signal station?" demanded the man. "We have none in this house. Those instruments are even no good to us. We can't use them."

"Could any one else see them?" David Hildred.
"You certainly," said the Glandelinian soldier, abstractedly.
"How?" demanded Hildred.
"By project imaginary lines of all sorts from each signal or telegraphic station, and where they'll specially into each, and that ought to be any station that you may be hunting."

"Absolutely Gertrude put aside the telegraphic sound detector, as if now the man had explained its operation in words of no more value."

"Here," said the man, "taking up a suit case, and swinging it around is a sort of tickers device that can be carried easily in this small suit case, and here—putting down the suit case before the scouts could examine it and taking something looking like a finger ring from a workbench is the smallest, strongest, telegraphic set I have set over seen. It is as you've seen in the shape of a ring and can be worn without the presence of the device being suspected."

"After the man was gone, Gertrude said to her friends: 'Excuse me and my friends for a few minutes while we step aside with you for a minute or two and have a little confab. I believe we will have a proposal to make that will interest you and be a benefit for our own country.....'"

"I know that you mean," said Jane herself as they were alone. "That strange telegraphic sound detector hey! if any member of the Gemini had that he would be able to locate the great signal station of Hanley's down by the flood."

"That's it exactly," said Gertrude. "General Hildred Hargraves himself said he would not be leaving for the Christian lines still to-morrow night. I believe we ought to get hold of him again, at once, and tell him about this possibility."

"I'm with you," said Angelina Ritchie. "But we don't know how to reach him within a Glandelinian camp without drawing the suspicion of the soldiers upon us. Suppose I call Gingsgore, for I know where he is, and can request him to get General Hargraves."

"Good idea," said Angelina Ritchie. "But some probably don't understand how to work it. But if Gingsgore gets General Hargraves to come up here, we will not be revealing anything to the Glandelinians, and Hargraves can tell us as much or as little as he wants."

"Then I'll telephone Mr. Gingsgore," said Jane. "I saw a telephone in the reception room as we came in. I suppose not suspecting our intention the hide-de-camp will not refuse to let us use it."

"And to draw off suspicion I'll explain as much as necessary without revealing our purpose," said Jane.

Accordingly she looked for the hide-de-camp and got the permission, while Gertrude Angelina telephoned Mr. Gingsgore, and explained they were inviting an officer to come and explain to them about something they wished to learn about scouting toward the Christian lines."

"I can't tell you anything more than that now, sir," said Gertrude. "But I promise you, of course that these articles in this place is not in any danger of being stolen. On the contrary, the man we have requested to come here may put you in the way of making your fortune."

IN THE TOILS OF THE HUNY.
A DETERMINATE BREAK FOR LIBERTY. GANDELINIAN HELMS TO WIN. THE POWER OF THE HUNY. THE HUNY TOWER. FOLIST FINE WEATHER AT THE GANDELINIAN CAMP.....

"Look here girls and boys," said Hargraves, "You sure have done a fine stroke of business for the country's cause to-day. Suppose you play a little this noon."

They were finishing dinner in the Glandelinian Mess hall. All about them were tables with Glandelinian officers, and a concealed concealed Glandelinian Orchestra was playing a popular fair which even Susan herself recognized. General Hargraves leaned back, sighed comfortably, and lighted a cigar. The boys and girls were on their desert.

"It was a good stroke of scout work, General, wasn't it?" said Hildred, "getting that hide-de-camp at just the right moment, and catching Gingsgore and Hargraves before they could find you. With that sound detector you ought to be able to locate General Hanley's telegraphic station."

"Sh-h-h—girl," said Gertrude. "Some of the Glandelinian soldiers might hear."

"All gazed around furtively. They occupied a separate table a large one. However and there did not seem to be any one near enough for their occupants to overhear their conversation."

"As for my own situation," said Jean Saunders. "I'm sorry that we girlscount are not going to be in on the outcome of this military business."

"Some here," said Hildred. "Here we girls go and start the ball a rolling and then because of other duties we need to perform in the lines we have to drop out, without a chance to see where it rolls too."

"Hard luck," indeed, agreed Angelina Ritchie. "That's what it is."

Gertrude shook her head, and Violet, and her sisters looked at each other in amazement.

"I should think you girls have or would have had enough of adventuring until the other thrilling experiences of the past," Gertrude said. "And those experiences should have been a remembrance for the rest of your lives. Yet here you are lamenting because you can't have more. Brave as we are, that is just the Princesses, we do in some degree fear the enemy, and yet you don't seem to realize, this matter we are striving for I thought could be of no particular concern to you."

"Just the same," said Jane. "It is. We sure have a personal interest in the matter, and as we are supposed by military authorities to help in the case it is our concern. We too started it by overhearing the plotters, by helping to investigate the floods and fires and explosions, and so on. Then we found this sound detector that probably will enable the Gemini and military Secret Service to locate this tremendous telegraph station of the enemy and to keep us secret from the flood. Now we are calmly shouldered out of the way as if we were just plain citizens and not girlscount. It's hard luck as I'm sure. Why also trifle this way. Why not make Susan a scout and do something with it. She has already proved her mettle."

Gertrude Angelina smiled, intently....
"You can't expect me to sympathize with you so very much on this situation," she said. "This way is going to be more dangerous than you ever suspect and may cause a loss of life among many of us. Well now which shall I be? Back to the Christian lines for a change, or prowling about the Glandelinian camp a little?"

"Prowl in Glandelinian camps! In a moment the peninsula of the girls had vanished. They were all smiles."

"Prowl about the camps by all means so we can learn something of value for our cause," said Jack himself, emphatically.

"Right," agreed all the others.

"I suppose with its dangers, its fierce Zimmermanians, and horrible scenes of child slavery and all," declared Violet vivian.

"Oh sure it isn't that bad," deprecated Angelina Ritchie. "I understand and for cautious makes these Glandelinian soldiers are supposed to be quite civilized by now. Nevertheless I expect we will find much to interest us. I'll speak to some head officer and get permission to go about, and probably he can direct us to a guide or some one who can help us and prevent us from being under suspicion. You know there are many soldiers and officers who can recognize any of us despite our disguises....."

On being consulted, and not guessing the true design on their part the head Sergeant of the Kitchin police agreed to obtain them a guide. Presently Presently Violet, and her sisters, and the girls and boy scouts were on their way on horseback to the unique portion of the Glandelinian camps, within Glandelinian camps, which constitutes the portion of the enemy's camps, having the most dreaded Glandelinians, a quarter housing more than sixty million Zimmermanians, and Pangaboos. Dangerous in every characteristic firing at MacLiffe but missed the bullet shattered a vase that stood on the windowsill. Jack played up a stool and threw it, knocking the gun from his hand. Then he to their surprise saved a long dagger which which mysteriously appeared in his hand. He began to shout for help as loudly as he could. Jack being too small to grapple with him as a man does, leaped in low, arms extended making a flying tackle as he had so often done in play on playing football with other good boys. The old general started to move backwards saving his darr dagger. MacLiffe seeing a chair upon which he had been seated and sent it flying through the air. His aim was deadly. The heavy chair caught the general square on the side of the head just as Jack pinned him round the legs. down he went like a log, his dagger clattering to the floor.

This old Glandolinian general, whose name they could never learn, and yet who was a very dangerous and desperate man, and had whole divisions of soldiers at his command, was unconscious, but breathing heavily. When MacLiffe ascertained that, their fears that they they had killed him faded away. While Jack attended to trying tying him up, MacLiffe turned his attention to Penrod and "Mr. Mutt." Gertrude Angeline of course was not in the fight, though she was a girl much as tough life "Little Orphan Annie" in the comics. She had recovered from her amazement and dashed in to help the boys with valor and discretion, but "Mr. Mutt" was thrashing about so wildly in the endeavor to dislodge MacLiffe's grip on his throat, that he had lashed out with his feet, and a tremendous rebounding kick had caught Gertrude both under the chin and in the stomach and sent her flying and swooping to the floor, where she lay very still indeed and bleeding at the mouth. MacLiffe however held on as if he were a bulldog. Yet in Mr. Mutt he had an adversary worthy of his mettle. That international spy leader had not gained his supremacy by his wits alone. He was a tremendous rough and tumble fighter and a prize fighter too in his day, and also a bull fighter. Back and forth they thrashed on the floor as MacLiffe paused above them under pain where to strike to also aid his comrade Penrod who still also grappled with the professional spy. Penrod still gripped the man about the throat, but the spy had so powerful a grasp on his hands that he was unable to bring a fatal pressure to bear.

Suddenly by an unusual effort, "Mr. Mutt" heaved himself to his feet with Penrod and MacLiffe clinging to him. He must not be allowed to win. Jack swung aloft another chair remembering the execution wrought previously on the old general by the same method, and brought it down on the spy's head. The chair splintered in his grasp, and the spy, relaxed, went limp, then collapsed.

"Well," said Penrod, panting, "I guess he's have soon gotten us Jack if it hadn't been for you. He's a tough fighter."

Suzanne's voice behind them rose in a scream.

"Look out here they come."

All of them shirked to face the new danger. And in through two doorways poured a dozen enraged Glandolinian boyscouts. Jack bounded to the side of his companions. The new comers were both Glandolinian boys and girls, and evil looking they were in the dim light of that room, with their glaring eyes, and reddened faces. They gripped small revolvers and the customary boy and girl scout badges, and as their eyes took in the two figures of the two officers on the floor, a murmur arose and they started to surge forward. It was a tense moment, but the boys and girls were resolved to sell their lives dearly and drew their own weapons which the captives had forgotten to relieve them of. Then two things occurred. The leader of the new comers Violet and her sisters recognized as Gerald Starring, and another as Frederick larger, and they halted the onrush with a gesture of authority as their eyes fell on Violet, and not sisters. And Gertrude, palled from the effects of the "kick" in the stomach arose to her feet, and stood staring in front of the rest.

"We call off the fight for the present," said Penrod, "at I warn you not to attack us. If you do we won't give you any quarter."

The leader Starring nodded but seemed nevertheless, and then turned to the group behind him crying out attention: "The boys and girls obeyed the command, and then he bade four of their number step aside, and the others to break command and leave the room." Grumbling and unwilling but evidently forced to obey their superior they complied with his command. And as the hangings fell behind the last to leave, Starring faced them, his face grim enough, not so much as looking at Violet and her sisters he said to Penrod:

"You showed sense this time. They could have killed all of you had I not interfered."

Stooping over "Mr. Mutt," he examined him intently. Then he did the same by the general.

"Here Bob," he said to the nearest boyscout "you get a doctor at once. You others help me."

With the three or four others who sprung to his aid, Gerald Starring started to lift the unconscious form of "Mr. Mutt." Then he bethought himself of the prisoners, and a dressed addressed Gertrude Angeline.....

"Stay in this room," he said "And I can protect you all the while. Only you out is the way you had come, and nothing can save you from my little devil if you try to run off. I'll be back."

Without more ado he and his silent assistants disappeared with their baron, remaining almost at once, for the still a unconscious form of the old general. After his second departure, the girl and boy scout prisoners were left almost being disturbed for quite some time. Therefore their first act was to take an account of injuries. MacLiffe Penrod and even Jack had some of unsathed, but Gertrude was sore about the shins, chin and stomach from the kicks delivered by the spy, but otherwise unharmed though the joy in the stomach had been the most a rich experience received, but she was rapidly recovering.

"It's not blaming you boys for your gallant attempt to win freedom," said Gertrude "but now the position could not really be worse than before."

"I'm sorry Gertrude. If you believe we made matters worse by jumping on MacLiffe," said Penrod. "Then I saw him threatening you I saw red."

"Any how as it is," declared Jack "if we had succeeded in capturing them, Gertrude, almost being surprised by these boys and girls, we might have used them as hostages to obtain our freedom."

Gertrude only shook her head.

"Perhaps," said she, "but it has a very long chance. However now we shall have to do the best for it."

"At least we have won a respite," said MacLiffe. "We have pretty well laid out that spy at least. Both of them won't recover for some time to come if I'm any judge of such kind of matters. It isn't positive is it that this leading Glandolinian, about who appeared like a sissy, who seemed to be a superior leader among the many child scouts, will do anything to us?"

"Probably you are right, MacLiffe," said Gertrude, "and we will now be made to remain prisoners but not harmed, pending the recovery of I of this spy, if not the other. But afterwards..."

High left the sentence unfinished, but Penrod took up her thought: "We can face that when we have to, Gertrude," he said. "We are safe enough."

"You are right, we are safe at present," said Violet herself. Nevertheless they realize we are all acquainted with that enemy boy MacLiffe, and that he'll turn us all over to Manley as prisoners the first moment he has the chance. He knows us well more than we do him, and there also is no friend at large who has any idea of our whereabouts, or realized even that we came sight seeing to the Glandolinian camps to give Susan a test. We did not tell a soul within the Christian lines. The only persons who know are the ones that spy and general declared are his followers."

"But surely," exclaimed Gertrude, "when we fail to return to the Christian lines, there'll be a big uproar. You Christians are girls of the most importance to them, and the whole nation will get all military police, spies and agents and the like on the case in double short order."

"Very true," said Gertrude herself thoughtfully. "Yet this is evidently a well organized Glandolinian army, and the gang of boy and girls who had captured us for this spy have hidden us away in such a way that we may never be found. Our only hope is to see a chance to escape later on."

"But you forget general Barger, Jingigore, and that boy about Adele too," said Jack. "When they hear of our disappearance, they'll put two and two together and will realize we have fallen into the hands of the man whose plans are frustrated—namely Francis Pen Pedro."

"Yes," admitted Gertrude. "There is a little hope for a there. Yet Barger planned to leave for the Christian lines to night to warn the boyscouts and boys there of Manley's plan to snuggle Glandolinian scouts among them for his purposes, as well as to try and locate the great signal station with the means of that sound detector he swiped for him. He or the others may hear of our disappearance for some time."

"But Gertrude," said Joan "it'll be in all the papers in every city and town in the zone of disaster, in a day or two. The news will be telegraphed to the papers in northern Abilene, and probably they'll get some in the way and probably he'll read it."

"There is some hope of that of course," admitted Gertrude. "But a mighty slim chance indeed."

For some time longer the discussion continued along this source. Then MacLiffe Starring again made his appearance, and put an end to it.

"You are to write a note to your friends within the Christian lines," he said "telling them to cancel your rooms there and give you a safe place to board. And don't write anything phony. I'm not asking you even to write my lies either and I know nothing at all and you do it. Tell them too you are coming to camp some time within a few days. That'll fix it if there are any questions asked about you by any one within the Christian lines. He is happy and penitence he added laying the a towel on the table. Get busy and write."

"And if we refused to comply with the demand," said Gertrude.

"If you are a sensible girlscout as you look to be," said Starring "you'll do as you're told. Otherwise I'll give you all up to Manley. You do it you're to only do further as I'll plan and don't never see him."

All thoughts of that terrible past which was the only entrance to the room, of the barred door across it, and of the villainous armed boy and girls along the route, Gerald Starring was right. As long as he was wounded in the fighting, Gertrude could have to obey. "But look here," she said, taking up the pencil and preparing to write "What are you going to do with me?" "The other one," now named Herodanna, is going to take you as prisoners to his own part of the camp down across a part of the flood, while his tall companion recovers," said Starring. "He give him a fractured head, and it will be a long while before he'll get over it. But the man to be opened his eyes he'll plan that to do with you, or his Confederate ally, Herodanna says he'll save you up for the other man to deal with when he recovers. He's going to save you for him. See!"

They saw. Only too plainly. "Francis Pedro was a vengeful man, Spanish people always are, and he no doubt meant to exact full measures for his injuries. With a sinking heart, Gertrude wrote the note demanded. He in hand, Gerald Starring passed at the door for a last word and was departing. "I wouldn't want to be in your place!" he said.

This was a blow. Not only a blow indeed. As the door closed behind Gerald Starring, Violet, and her sisters, and the other child counts glanced at each other with dismay. William plainly on every face. Then they wondered how Susan could take it. They were to be taken to some remote part of the Glendalough camp at once, and probably to an unnamed section. Moreover Gertrude Angelina had been compelled to write to the Dominant leader, a man to which if it was not for her chieftain she would prevent suspicion being spread by their failure to show up. But she had shrewdly made some unseen markings on the paper with a strange invisible ink, and always secretly carried about her person, for she knew that would be revealing. She had told all her followers and all the men under any circumstances without trust all letters she might write to them under any circumstances without also tracing invisible writing. If none is found all is well, if not something was wrong, and Gertrude therefore wrote with invisible ink on the clear side of the paper. "Have all your members search for us. We are prisoners of the enemy. The Hunt Spy tried on us."

This would cause larger to investigate and she knew also all others would inquire for her at any moment, when she failed to return at the hour she mentioned, and therefore at large. Large investigation of the other side, no one would believe the explanation of the note. Violet and her sisters and her followers would then be turned by the enemy safe and sound, or the Christian army would be hurled upon the enemy and giving no quarter. By her trick, no one could consider their disappearance unusual but would realize that had happened, and they would be the surprise of his life, and just now the size of General Vivians army, alone, with Jamesons, and Concentration Armies, could only be defeated by Manley and the Christian natural miracle, and miracles could not surely be made out for such an enemy.

"Of course Violet and her sisters explained that there was no hope that their disappearance would cause an investigation by the Dominant Military police to relieve them because they could not be found. At least all the Christian armies was the only hope. Or that at least could be only heard heard but in the papers, and so some perhaps the attention of General Vivian, or Walter Starring, or General Evans, who could crush the situation. They were without an overwhelming attack which would crush Manley, there would be no hope, and they then set their best to attempt to escape themselves when the proper time came, without a word spoken. These thoughts passed through the minds of all. They realized they were in the hands of a very shrewd international spy, who had foreseen the possibilities of the situation and had taken care to guard against the coming of the friends of Violet, and her sisters in particular. Of course in his heart "The Hunt" spy had wished the liberation of Violet and her sisters, not because he favored them, but because of the fact he was afraid of a full appearance if it was known they were prisoners. He had overheard General Vivian make a statement that he would forth just for the only case of Violet, and her sisters being seized within the enemy prison as prisoners, no matter what they did, he'll send over dangerous agents to assassinate General Manley, or give his army no quarter. However, there was this other case too to be considered namely that "The Hunt" might if he recovers fully enough vent his rage against them for their fierce attack upon him in Frenchish to be especially upon those who had aided him. Gertrude Angelina thought of this, she frowned and said "Come," she said, "I don't imagine her head from her hands. It's certainly to ten you in to a... like situation. At this case all is a... tent not only for Susan, show us the right door to get out for all."

"Pencil held a hand for her shoulder." "Don't say a word," said "Some of us have fled yet, and the enemy does not carry anything on capture. All trying on the very information we are after." After that she was to have means to discover the original situation as after. "Gertrude Angelina looked at the spirit in the morning" and were not going to be dead either, at least for some time to come. The Gertrude said, "you and the three boys have tested this unusual at every turn so far."

It is in the hands of an enemy appears his prisoners. But now the door. "Gertrude Angelina, I don't already have out the machinery of the Abbeilmanian government in motion. I don't find out all details as to the cause of the direct government and not only that, but also to put an end to the slave sampling of Glendalough, and to execute into our own armies among our own to front rate for conversion. And in the fight three of us must certainly not the best of it, and not Gertrude."

Gertrude Angelina, raised her head and appeared a bit more hopeful. "Gertrude declared, 'Jack' you forget that how often before we have been in great light places, and yet came through them all with colors flying, and I'm confident we'll do so again, and probably have some of our present captives our own prisoners."

Gertrude then reached a trace of a smile, as she regarded the only headed and boy, Jack, as he disappeared a year older than her, and though not so stout of frame, as fully as tall. Both were the sizes of eleven year old children, and Jack like all his companions, though funny with some of his little acts of childishness once in a while was nevertheless as hard and as sharp as a mill.

"My Jack," said Gertrude "I believe you live to be in a bad hole so that you can escape you again. As actually I do surely believe you are really enjoying this life, and I don't think you are really enjoying it."

Gertrude and Jack had most of the fun rescuing each other during our dangerous trip up and down the raft, and then getting wounded at the battle of Balaity Creek, while the rest went on the raft with nothing to do but—

Gertrude laughed his eyes on the back accordingly, and continued without anything to do but save the day, and all the while tried to capture the raft, you certainly were in good luck to need a girl to do the rescuing when a boy should rescue the girl."

"Oh that's all right," said Jack. "Just the same, if of you, he had more fun out of that adventure than I did of any of us. He was the hero, and she was the heroine. But it looks as if I were to be declared in, and I can't say I'm entirely satisfied either. I don't mind saying that our dear country has the best and bravest boys and girls in the world."

Gertrude shook her head. "You boys and girls will be the death of me," she said. "And then you can be a saint in heaven and be our guardian angel" said Angelina. "Hush!"

For some time the raft went on back and forth all the rest doing their best to cheer Gertrude Angelina. They surely did realize dimly the great use her wisdom, for more on their account than on her own. She did not fear for herself, and by belittling the dangers and persisting in regarding the whole matter as a lark, they hoped to dispel her gloom to some extent.

The various objects of the room came in for attention. The room itself proved to be a small room, and five other rooms, the walls covered with heavy Abbeilmanian hangings. Lights or chandeliers for lights were suspended from the ceilings but they were not lit. The only light came from several tinted bulbs on a massive, ornate table very low and stained with age. Investigation disclosed a little light bulb within the table.

"Let's find the switch, and turn the room into darkness when they come for us," cried Jack eagerly. "Then we can all jump them, and gain the upper hand."

The big door closed to where he stood stood grated slightly and swung open, and Gerald Starring stood in the aperture. He heard, commented Jack. "No sign."

"Come all of you," he beckoned, "come." Gertrude Angelina, and the others regarded each other gravely, without a word spoken, and without premeditation, they all clasped hands. Then Jackliffe sprang to take the lead. If danger threatened in the corridor, he could relieve the front, rather than let the girls accept that exposed position. The others fell in behind, and Gertrude herself brought up the rear. Nothing unexpected happened in the corridor, and they reached the courtyard, after passing through the guarding guards, without mishap. It was a wide courtyard, the air smelted strongly of smoke, but if any of them thought to cry out for help, now that the outer air was gained, that thought was speedily dispelled. Gerald Starring leaned loose, automatic machine gun life revolver in hand.

"One word and you are all dead at one discharge," he said. Then he saved a clump of shadowy figures ahead, which Violet and her sisters and the boys and girls could discern as their eyes became more accustomed to the darkness.

"By own boy and girls, Glendalough too called 'Scoundrels'." Starring said, and a few quick with their weapons. "I'm warning you that is all."

Thereupon Starring fell silent, standing beside Gertrude Angelina, and the group ahead, between the prisoners and the dark mouth of the cannily street, also were motionless. A slight sound, still as a whisper came from Gerald Starring however, vouchsafed no conversation.

"What are we waiting for now?" whispered Gertrude the irrepressible. "Just you sit and see what happens," answered Gerald, shortly. Out of the opening of a tent behind them a moment later debouched a a little cavalcade. In the center of a group of six or eight bobbing little heads rode a heavy duty object that swayed perilously as it lurched through the door. Gerald sprang toward it, with a low voiced imprecation, the door. Gerald sprang toward it, with a low voiced imprecation, the door. Gerald sprang toward it, with a low voiced imprecation, the door.

"Careful there," he commanded. "The object steadied and came closer. Then the boys and girls could see it was a stretcher torn by eight girls.

"What's that?" asked Radcliffe, impressed in spite of himself. "I didn't know they'd need a stretcher for any of us."

"It's not that," said Penrod. "Must be that old general we laid out."

The burden bearers passed the little group. The darkness prevented them from seeing its occupant. It disappeared with its bearers looting in the darkness like some glancing spider into the mouth of the company street.

"Come on," he said, "and remember, one cry out of any of you, and you are all dead."

All this time the wagon had been making good progress, although the boy and girl scouts from their syncretic knowledge of the topography of this part of the country were unable to make any surmise as to the direction in which they were being driven. They had climbed and descended several hills and were now on a stretch of level going, which however, was rutted and uneven, and far from smooth. Abruptly the wagon was brought to a stop. The driver gave a sort of a signal. At the signal, the wagon, came around to the rear having gotten off from the front.

"Here we are," said the Glandelinian boy scout. "Glad to see."

To try him to see he said to the two girls, whether of the children or of his own side, Penrod and Radcliffe got up first, and started to get out.

"You can't get out," cried the boy scout. "You know anything. Get in the wagon. The girls come first."

Violent, and her sisters descended, and the other girls, and then the boys followed, the Glandelinian boy scout, and one freed faced girl about bringing up the rear. The van drew up behind them at almost the same moment its rear doors were swung open and the stretcher was thrust out and lowered to the shoulders this time of two Glandelinian soldiers, one shouldered it dropped his end.

"Do that again you dumbbell and I'll kill you," cried Starring.

They stood in a lonely spot on what was supposed to be the western shore of the flood or its narrowest margin. The nearest encampments were distant to the rear. A suspended street lamp of some once good town which had been swept away, and the dim lamp was being the only survivor was hanging in the wind, casting strange forms over the rough frame tents of the Glandelinian encampments as the boy and girl scouts glanced back not far away across a high forested hill, with the far distant glare of fierce forest fires staring it in irregular pattern.

About them were scattered, odd and ends of the flood front, such as the fragments of broken buildings, shattered river ships, broken planks, tarry barrels, and even the skeletons of long wooden houses from which the board, and other parts had been ripped away by the force of the waters exposing the "rib" of the water still. Ahead and not far distant lay that appeared to be the resemblance of an unroofed wharf with a large stream of water beside it, though where the Glandelinians had gotten it was a mystery.

Toward this the stretcher was borne, and up a gang plank to the deck of the boat. Beyond the bow of the craft, pointing into the stream, showed the dark waters of the great flood, with a wooded and mountainous shore opposite to the east, and the glaring lights of the distant forests fires to the further east.

They had all of them made up their minds for a last desperate effort to escape, and they glanced anxiously about about, but they observed that the surroundings were not propitious. Besides the fact that there might be friends, and not Glandelinians to hear a cry for help in these desolate surroundings, and what Christian spies or agents were here to lend a helping hand. They saw it would be folly, next to suicide to attempt a dash for freedom now, and in so much as not only did they have Gerald Starring, his boy scouts and some of the enemy girl scouts to reckon with but also hundreds of others, though not easily seen in the ever increasing gloom, who were Glandelinian soldiers just standing a little to one side, prepared to take command, and there they went with him toward the vessel, trod the loose boards of the wharf that might have been a river wharf with lagging feet, passed up the gang plank beneath the light, and finally slipped aboard. Not giving them any time for looking about, Gerald immediately led the way to a small cabin from which opened a number of rooms. The three boy scouts were given one together, and the Christian girl scouts the others. Their staid, which all girl and boy scouts carry were in the room the others. In a brief note of explanation that this constituted change from a check. A receipted bill as with the money and this was evident her captors were not going to take anything of value away from her or her followers.

"This looks bad, comrades," said she pocketing the money. This second level hero fairly evidently has a tremendously effective organization. The way in which we were brought here, this strange strange steam ship, for such she is, and that means a ship that can weather any roughness of the flood water waters, the expedition with which our stuff were brought with us, even the careful accounting for our own money—all these give convincing proof that it is no common Glandelinian official with whom we have to deal, but a foreign military desperate worse than any Glandelinian living."

Joice yawned. They were all gathered in the little cabin and then for the prize practically to a pirate ship, and pirate stories have always fascinated me and my sisters. We don't know where we are going, but wouldn't it be a joke if we were going for the very cove we were searching for. And we don't know what dark and dreadful fate is being reserved for us, but we can face the consequences when we come to it."

"For my part," said Jack, lowering his voice, "I'll bet that before they are through with us, Mr. Hunt, and Jeff will wish he had let us alone and didn't steal us away as prisoners. Such troublous adventures as Angelina picked, I heard, and even Hadcliffe here, to say nothing of Misses Violet, and her sisters, and Gertrude Angelina, to say not nothing also of myself,-- notice us modesty--are liable to even take his ship away from him before we are through with this business."

Jean clapped him on the back, and Penrod roughed his hair.

"Atta boy."

"That's the idea."

Jean and her sisters merely had given an expression to their own ideas of his words.

"If we only had something to eat or so," murmured Jane.

Gertrude with an exclamation, reached for her bag. Then she looked again at her.

"No use."

"That's the matter Gertrude!" said Pen in the road.

"Oh Jane made me this thing of some sandwiches which I carried in my bag. But you see the bags open, some one took them out, and probably have eaten them to their own satisfaction."

"What's to be done, anyhow?" said Jane, starting to rummage. She was unsuccessful. The sandwiches were gone.

"Oh hell!" said Jack, "we'll get something to eat by and by, but we'll have to keep our eyes open, and our wits about us, that's all. I'm surprised they didn't remove our weapons from us."

"Maybe a friend or two may come over to our side," said Jean suddenly.

"That's right," said Gertrude brightening. "Of course, of course. Why I did not even consider that possibility, but that can happen even among Glandolinians. A cruel man like Christi here would make some enemies among his own, especially if they have finer characters, and are only fighting for country and patriotism and not for the cause itself."

"How about Starr?" suggested Penrod. "That boy scout is all right in a way. He doesn't know the enemy cause."

"Hard to tell."

"How about his companion Frederick Dargay?" said Jean.

"Spunk of converting the devil," said Violet, but so low her voice was not heard. They had seen the boys out of the fog and left the ship with his companions, as it was evident they were not going to go with it. Then at this moment a Glandolinian soldier put his head in through the door. He had the face of a sissy and wore glasses.

"We are off," he said, and it was true. The engines began to rumble, the boat to move out into the flood. "In ten minutes we'll be passing through Stombele's," said the soldier. These port holes are not big enough for a baby to squeeze through, so I ain't worried, but you can see everything outside through them just the same."

abruptly then, as if half sorry for his display of interest, as he didn't appear as a real cruel soldier, he closed the door with a polite salute, and they were once more alone. They looked from one to the other, and Gertrude Angelina nodded satisfaction.

"You are a discerning lady, Jack," she said.

The others nodded. That was all, but rightly or wrongly, the impression was beginning to grow on them that in this sissy-looking Glandolinian soldier they might eventually find a friend sooner or later.

"How fast are Gertrude, do you think this old boat must be traveling down the flood?"

Jean asked the question a few minutes after they had been placed on the ship. None of the girl and boy adventurers felt well either this evening, though they didn't feel actually ill. They understood that illness was ravaging the land, not particularly because of flood, and war disaster, but because of the endless days. Upper had been served in the salon by several soldiers under the eye of one of the officers. The room as well as their cabins, they observed had not been fitted luxuriously. The quarters however were comfortably larger than one could ever expect to find aboard any kind of such boat, but the furnishings were those of the Glandolinian military. In addition to the two cabins opening one side of the salons and which the occupied, two others were in the same inner located opposite. One was occupied by the captain of the boat, who apparently had wiped the craft, and the other by the wounded Professor Monk.

"Oh I don't know," said Gertrude in answer to Jack's question. "..... But I bet just as this is not built for speed. I believe it was made more for strength and endurance."

"Well but how fast do you believe it is going?"

"About ten knots an hour or probably thereabouts of eight," said Gertrude considering. "That would be nine to ten miles. A nautical mile, of course, not you understand is between one and one sixth and one and one seventh land miles. But who is Jack? What have you in your mind...." "!!!!!!!" Jack glanced at the door. It was closed tight, but whether it was fastened from inside or not he did not know. The app he knew by there too helpless to move under care of a doctor of the enemy no doubt whom they had not yet had observed. So much had been gathered from one of the more were civil Glandolinian soldiers who had not refused to talk with them. The latter had disappeared above deck after supper had been served.

Leaning closer, Jack lowered his voice. Instinctively to hear him better, all put their heads together.

"It was midday when we came aboard," said Jack. "It's seven in the evening now. That means we have been on the waters of the flood for nearly seven hours or more. How far we have gone I'm not sure but I believe we are heading south. Our cabins are on the side to port, and those from the east in our port hold. So you know what?" he leaned closer.

"What?" asked Jean.

"I believe we are heading for a Glandolinian plantation to be thrown this there as slaves instead of going toward the destination we at first suspected. And that's in the south somewhere."

The others nodded.

"Well," continued Jack, "I've been thinking this over. General Manley's army is about ten miles south of Stombele's. Isn't it Gertrude?"

"Entirely that and no nearer. Go on. Please don't keep us in suspense."

"I do not know what it is in mind but guess there has some plan. So she wished it to be suggested."

"What is it you have in mind Susan?" "!!!!!!!"

"At this. Suppose we go to that signal station you are trying to locate. Well I know here it is. At least I believe so but am not sure. The cover of this signal station is either above or below the flooded town of San Diego south of here or of the town of Stombele's, and not far from it in either direction. We shall reach this flooded town of San Diego in about forty-eight hours maybe more at this rate, or about this time the day after tomorrow. If the cover of this signal station is this side of it probably we would make it to tomorrow night."

"Now hold your horses," Hadcliffe interrupted, good naturedly but only, as she saw her disguised sister growing impatient. "Let her continue, she is coming to the point sooner or later."

"What I have in mind is simply this. With that man Jack put here as a mutt and Frederick Dargay who is on board this boat lukewarm because he's naturally good but does not know the real state of Glandolinia's cause we may have a chance to seize the ship before we reach the headquarters of this cove or at least there the enemy is bringing us. If we don't do it before landing our chance to gain our freedom later will be utterly impossible. And the way I figured it out, we can't even get as far as the signal station until tomorrow night at the earliest, which gives us the best part of the day of two days in which to see what we can do. There are about thirty child scouts on board here besides the soldiers, and besides Frederick all the others are girls. In some cases they may be better fighters than girls especially in other countries, but I wouldn't want to try it out to find out in this case. Girl Scouts of the enemy put me in mind of wild tigresses having hydrophobia. We must first beat them before the soldiers as they're fiercer than even a human."

"What a proposal," was voiced by the rest. Violet, however, knew the Glandolinians very much with all the experiences she and her sisters had with them, however sparse, of the almost insuperable handicaps--their lack of being able to fight successfully at close quarters with Glandolinian child scouts, the fury of the enemy girl scouts which were insurmountable, their ignorance as to the numbers or composition of the crew, or even as to the physical characteristics of the ship, and their location. She pointed out that they had been long forbidden to go on deck by Dargay, not because he refused them that privilege, but because he knew the nature of these girl scouts who would kill them on sight, and consequently, would know nothing before hand of their field of battle. "I agree with you of course, Susan, and so do my sisters," she added in conclusion, "that if we can seize the ship we must do so. But it is one thing to conceive an idea, and far more difficult matter to work out the details. Though we would be prisoners in the enemy camp we'd be aasier off than on this ship. However let us go into my cabin and leave the door open into the salon. There we can discuss the situation from every angle with less fear of discovery."

"There is one thing I haven't mentioned yet," said Susan. "I've been so excited that it slipped away from my mind this morning. That is I have a small telegraphic wireless set that my come in handy."

"Yes that one you mean that we observed in Manley's heady headquarters. I persuaded Annie to sell it to me you remember."

The others nodded.

"Well then we sent eight seeing this afternoon I wore it on my left hand and there it still is. You realize to prove we couldn't get away they didn't relieve us of a thing," said Susan held up the device for inspection. The general said it was no good it had a once a calling distance of ten thirty miles. It may mean to to a before we see the end of this adventure."

This strange kind of a telegraphic ring is worthy of more extended notice and inasmuch as later it was to play a very noteworthy part in the adventure of Violet, and her sisters and the adventurers, perhaps it is well to describe it at this time. In the first place, this ring was not at all Hanley's property, strictly confining he had stolen it from a similar device found in the possession of a prisoner whom he had proved to be a foreigner. This man had been an inventor of it, but had not patented his device but he had given a good description of its operations, pressing details to an interview representing the "Telegraphic Globe" of Atlantic.

Because he had had this in his possession was the reason the man had been made a prisoner, and this thing had come to Hanley's attention. Yet with no desire to steal another's idea, but merely for his own cause he had had taken up the matter and devised his own ring telegraphic set, and the other one not knowing her real intention for wanting it, he had sold to Susan for the small sum of fifty dollars which she then had in her possession in Glandelinian money. It was almost like a sort of radio for it had the connections of Hand Phones, and connecting lines from the ring to the phones and to aural and ground wire intact were intact. In her traveling bag Susan had already ascertained. Yet it would be the details from a telegraph in operation far away. No one had searched the bag for possible weapons and even Susan's umbrella was still strapped to the bag. Susan continued:

"You know General Hanley's idea—do—camp said a person could connect only a brass or steel, and could do it even to the metal stem of the umbrella for aural and stick any sort of lead metal into the earth or even into water for a ground connection. Of course water will do even better."

The peculiar part of this ring was of a coil, slender only slightly more larger than to go round a little girl's finger. The mounting comprised the controls and measured only 1 x 1-2 x 7-16 of an inch. These measurements included the brightly polished, bakelite, panel on which were mounted a diminutive crystal detector and small control connected with the coil by nine taps permitting of nine different telegraphic detuning adjustments by means of a no visible band fixing connections in the heads of nine tiny brass studs in the panel in the form of a double circle. The whole was no larger than many ornate rings, and resembled one in appearance.

"That ordinarily said it would act like a radio and would receive on wave lengths up to and including six hundred and fifty meters," Susan explained. This "Glandelinian" traveler undoubtedly has many good telegraphic stations. In fact I saw when we came aboard. Probably sooner or later it will open communication with the telegraph station at that cove, and we can detect it. I understand how to operate one. My father had me go to a telegraphic teacher. (Sighs.)"

"But you do not understand that these Glandelinians always have their long distanced conversations in code," protested Jean. "Besides they may use a very high carrier wave length, and your set would be unable to receive the ticking of the telegraph...."

Susan looked thoughtful. "I've considered that," she said. "Naturally, nevertheless I have the feeling that this little disguised telegraphic instrument ring, will be mighty handy indeed."

Meantime the party had adopted Violet's suggestion and retired to the cabin of her, and her sisters... the conversation was now directed by the older Princess into a consideration of the possibilities. If they were to make any attempt to capture the vessel she declared it would be vitally necessary to their plans to know something of the composition of the crew and the physical aspect of the vessel itself. Susan, Violet and also her sisters believed, seemed to have won Frederick's regard to some extent by her strange orphanic manner. To her was delegated the delicate task of sounding a warning in an effort to learn how strongly he was attached to the Glandelinian cause, and how much he understood the real facts of it.

"Be careful how, however not to give him any indication of what we have in mind," warned Jennie Vivian. "If you report that you saw any sign in Frederick's words or manner that he could construe favorably, why then I'll or my sisters will have a talk with the Glandelinian boyscout if possible."

It was Violet's thought in particular that Susan might appeal to the capidity of Frederick by the offer of a substantial reward and by the fear of letting him know how close upon the trail of the boat were the persons who knew of their capture. Like many well laid plans however this was to come to naught. All that evening the barometer acted queerly, and the captain of the ship kept the deck. After supper there was a growing smoky foggy weather and strange lights on that under it almost unbearably hot below decks, the sky which had been growing steadily as they could see from their cabin portholes, became entirely overcast with a usual gloom and far into the east there was a glare as if the whole country was burning. PPP up. soon the entire patch of is visible from the portholes as a black as ink, and had it not been for the shining of the lights to be on it, by a child scout attendant, sent down by Frederick Burger it would have been just as gloomy in the cabin.

"I know this is from the far forest fire," said Jack, but doesn't it remind you of a storm on the ocean?"

"Yes," said Penrod, "at this too is unusual for it to be so far away." I understand never a cyclonic storm occurred in this part of Silverina. "Who they don't mind violet but one of these is better than these confounded forest fires that shut out the sun so many days."

"Even this is unusual," declared Jean who had been occupied in reading a sea story which she had found on a shelf of books on the salon. "Listen that's that!"

There was a sound as of a vast drum being beaten by savages, a drum bigger and more numerous than anything ever conceived of and this sound suddenly filled the salon. The walls seemed to quiver, indeed so great was the noise, as chattered that all simultaneously put their hands to their ears, as if their very eardrums were threatened. Violet and her sisters alone looked at each other in alarm. Then that instant the trawler which until then had been riding a seven foot on the flood waters, heeled far over, so far indeed that it seemed as if the boat could never right itself again. Caught off guard the child scouts were tossed against the doors of the cabin, and bruised badly by the roughness of the impact. Then slowly as a swimmer coming to the surface after a dive the ship righted herself, only to begin a tossing motion that was frightful as if the ship literally had been caught in a most tremendous whirlpool.

"It's a storm of some kind," shouted Penrod who by clutching the table had maintained his senses and equilibrium. "But there's no real wonder what's the matter."

"Gertrude guessed it. "It's a fire hurricane sweeping across the waters," she cried. "The door of the companionway was thrust back, admitting a cascade of maddy water that washed across the cabin floor a floor and the reeling form of Frederick at larger. His head hung very low and there was that in his attitude which told them all, that the Glandelinian boyscout was in trouble. Penrod sprang to his assistance.

"Good boy," said Burger, in a thick voice. "Get the door or the whole flood will be in here. A wreckage floe struck us."

It took six of them to slam the watertight door while Penrod turned to the Glandelinian boyscout. Penrod's companions (except Violet and her sisters—O themselves) had gathered around. Frederick grasped the table with his right hand. The left arm hung useless.

"I must have broken my arm in that fall I had," he said. "Get that doctor out of that International Spys room. Call himself a doctor anyhow."

Penrod hastened to pound upon the door of the Spys cabin. At first there was no answer. Then a weak voice began to curse, the sounds not hardly heard by Penrod above the roar of the forest fire storm weather. He was uncertain what to do, and turned to appeal to larger. The latter reeling and clutching the table interpreted his action aright.

"Open the door," he commanded. "Kick it open if necessary."

Penrod obeyed and drove the door forcibly open with a sweep of his right foot. On a low tumbled forth the form of the "dark Mitt" with head wrapped in bandage, numb, relaxed, and breathing heavily in a corner on the floor floor as if tossed there by the action of the ship. Half crushed, a little slim man with blonde hair and ragged gray mustache. As Penrod forcibly opened the door this wreck of a man looked up, through blurred eyes, ceased mumbling, and stared in fright.

"Please don't let the devil carry me away, feed. Please don't let him capture me," he pleaded.

Penrod was thrust aside by Burger, who had come to investigate. Despite his broken arm which really was giving him great pain, the latter advanced to the covering form in the corner. He seized the other's collar with his sound arm and started to drag the coward into the salon. It was Penrod's first sight of the man taking care of Glandelinian wounded, that is if he really was, since they had come aboard, he had not left the cabin or been anywhere within sight to their knowledge. Boyscout of the enemy had brought food to him, for that matter they had seen none in that authority except Frederick's order. First mate, Second mate, Engineer, Stiller and Cook hands. If they were on the vessel at least they had not been seen. For the first time, Burger, looking back in the corner in disgust and started to stifle. His eyes fell on the still form of the spy. He stooped over him, raised his eyelids, let them fall, and with an oath of disgust quit the cabin for the main salon signaling the door behind him.

He disappeared, he slumped against the table, little.

"The spy is still unconscious," he said. "That is what comes for his grabbing you as his prisoner. And that little Jim doctor is so scared of the Glandelinian child scouts that he is of no use for anything. Uh."

Perrod advanced. "If your arms hurt let her examine them. Look here, you see, she is a pretty good hand at rough surgical work. She had gone through a course in first aid, so she could help out even wounded."

Fredrick looked up hopefully. "That's good. Well have a look girl scout of the Christian side. Here addressing Jack. You'll find bandages and splints and iodine in that cabinet in my cabin. go and get them. And bring me that bottle of brandy you will find there. There I sure need something to put spirits in me this night."

Jack obeyed hastily. Fredrick took one good long pull at the bottle of (spirits), then ordered Radcliffe to take it away.

"That's plenty he said. 'I've got work to do and must keep my head. Now scouts of the Angelinians you are doing a good turn to an enemy. Now girls' girlie" extending his arm and addressing Angelina. "Go ahead."

Fredrick was without what you call human coat, and Jack who assisted her first cut away the left sleeve of the boyscouts shirt. Deftly Angelina toiled aided now and then by Jean and Jane, while Fredrick sat without a groan through the whole operation. Beads of sweat dotted his forehead and so warm it was every one else appeared as if they were having a "turkey" bath. At the end however the boyscouts arm was neatly and stoutly bound in splints, and lashed across his chest.

"That man as me owe you something Christian girl and boyscouts." said when the operation was completed. "I'm a boy who don't forget forget. Now I'll be on my way to the deck. We have to get every body at work to get the ship out of the wreck we plunged into. We have to or there will be the devil to pay."

As he rose to his feet, and started for the door, Radcliffe intervened. "Won't you let come to me come up and have a look around sir?" he begged. "I should say not," said Fredrick darger violently. "I'm responsible for what will happen to you, not for what'll you'll do. And don't you know why I kept you below since you were brought on board here? It is because the Glandelinian girlscouts on board this boat have it in for you for half kill the old general, three of the girls whose daughter they happen to be, and they will kill you if they have the chance. There's only the soldiers I can trust stay where you are and be safe. They're worse than revengeful Chinamen."

With that he opened the door, reeled back for before the force of the wind, and the swirling gray hail of the dashing flood was water; then lowered his head, and charging through, pulled the door shut behind him.

"So that explains why the kids have been kept below here," said Violet, thoughtfully. "Well the prospect if we fall into the hands of those Glandelinian girlscouts on board this craft doesn't look pleasant."

"I have heard," said Jane Mellick. "That the Glandelinian child scouts fairly worship certain leaders like a god, and therefore will go to any lengths to obtain revenge for injury done to them. Glandelinian child scouts are more dangerous to Christians than even the fiercest beast in the world."

Dertrude, Angelina and several of the others nodded.

"Dertrude," Angelina said Jack hopefully. "These two boyscouts barged and goring seem a pretty good sort though they're Glandelinians, though they are rough. Fredrick will do his best to protect us."

"Yes," declared Perrod. "It seems to me to night that he was b ginning to regret being a party to our capture. At least he doesn't want us to fall into the hands of those Glandelinian girlscouts. I've seen some of them and ten of them are prettier than Pat Phillips but they're sure fierce, and he's disgusted too with his superiors. Maybe we'll get him on our side yet."

"He'll protect us from the Glandelinian girlscouts all right," said Jean. "But when that international spy who looks so much like Matt recovers he will be powerless. If this accidental kidnapping is saving us, I'd be on order to exact vengeance on us for the way we laid him out, we'll be in a pretty fix."

"You're wrong," said Dertrude. "That spy has nothing to say over the Glandelinian boyscouts. Fredrick can save us from even him."

"Listen," said Jack. "I believe I have an idea."

"What?" every one asked in a chorus, chorus.

"My here is the 'Mutt' spy helpless, with only a fright scared little Glandelinian plump padding of a doctor to help him. Let us take possession of 'Mutt' and gain the whip hand over Fredrick. Then we can compel that boyscout of the Glandelinians to come over to our side perhaps!"

"Now," said Angelina. "We'll do a thing against their cause even if it cost their lives."

"Why we can try our freedom, with the freedom of 'Mutt'."

"I can't believe it can be done," said Angelina. Violet thoughtfully while her sisters too nodded their approval of her words. "It isn't only the boyscout barged with whom we have to reckon, but these Glandelinian human little diabolos too, with them above all. And besides," said Perrod, the spy doesn't mean a thing to them as he is foreign and not a Glandelinian. They could rather see him killed than see us escape their clutches. They probably feel that when we have reached the destination we are being hoisted for they can compel Pedro to turn us over to their tender mercies, and that is the only reason they have been content to keep hands off so far."

Jack and the others were silent. The force of Princess Angelina's reasoning is apparent to them all.

"Well then," he said presently, "we'll have to capture the ship in some way or gain our liberty through some bribe. That's all, and perhaps we can persuade the boyscout barger to give us extra weapons. Besides the ones we got now, and help us overtake the child scouts on board."

"Perhaps so," said Violet. "Meanwhile let us all turn in and get some sleep. Tomorrow will be the day on which we must make whatever attempt we decide on, and we'll need all our strength and alertness then. Radcliffe, do you and Perrod be sure to lock our cabins door, and we'll do likewise."

So you and Perrod be sure to lock our cabins door, and we'll do likewise. Fredrick said we should. Let us each take a heavy chair into our room too. In case of a night attack by those Glandelinian girlscouts we can at least pull the chair apart for limbs. We don't want to shoot them if we can avoid it as they're sisters. But like us, and now good night."

Thereupon Violet, and her sisters turned in. For some moments more the three boyscouts chatted and tried to read, while the girls retired also but at last they too, retired. As far as they could tell the forest fire windstorm as it might be called continued to rage without abatement.

"I wonder what to morrow will bring forth," said Radcliffe, just before going to sleep.

"I wonder," indeed, said he. "Well good night."

Jack was the first to awake that morning, and he still lay in his berth wondering drowsily for several moments as to what caused the feeling that there was something unusual in the situation. Then he jumped alertly to his feet and without taking time to dress himself ran to the port porthole.

The traveler was not in motion. When he retired it had been tossed about by the hot windstorms produced by the dreadful heat of the distant forest, the hot engines were not running, its screws was not turning.

Now its engines were not running, its screws was not turning, and except for a slight rolling motion, it lay as calm as if in a harbor.

Could it be they had reached the cove of the signal station during the night? It was this alarming thought which sent Jack on down to the port porthole. But a look at the outer world convinced him to the contrary. There was no land in sight except patches of trees above the water and floating debris of every description. And as he was on the landward side he considered this a pretty good indication that they were still out on the flood. Of course the traveler might have swung about so that her starboard side lay toward the land. He sniffed. All the smell he could get was that of burning forests. He listened. No sounds of any kind came to his ears. And for that time it was awful dead and the sky was fire red seemingly everywhere.

At first he believed the traveler had croaked down. After in the windstorm or in the battle against the debris car led carried forward by the waves or perhaps that something had happened to the engines or screws. Jack had the natural curiosity of a young boy, and wished that he might go on deck and in estimate.

He thought of Fredrick's warning of the Glandelinian girlscouts thirsting for the blood of himself, and all his fellow comrades. But then after all he reassured himself if he merely merely poked his head up the companion-way he would see him. He surely ought to be safe enough, and with the hope of success and of the magically calmed waters if the flood he decided he would have to obtain a glimpse of the world above deck, get a lungful of fresher air, no matter what happened. All this time he had been hurriedly getting into his clothes. A look showed him the others slept on. Unconscious the cabin door, he stepped soundlessly into the saloon. It was empty of human occupants other than him. The door of the cabin containing Violet, and her sisters was closed. "That's door as closed. So too was that of Fredrick's larger. Jack gave a fleeting thought to the question how that worthy had survived the stresses of the night. He still on deck? Or had he retired to rest? If the latter, who was in command?

"Certainly is a queer man in command," muttered Jack. "Fredrick and the doctor and the dizzy looking man we have seen other than Pedro the spy of the men. Aren't there any officers? Are all others aboard girlscouts of the enemy? Well here goes."

And trying the handle of the outer door, and finding it turn without making any sound, he opened it slowly inch by inch. The companionway was empty. A short flight of steps led to the deck. Mounting several he found his hand on level with the deck and started to raise it cautiously to peer out. The sound of low voiced conversation came to his ears, and instinctively he bent down again. Listening a moment he decided he had not been seen, for the whispering chattering went on. It came too he believed from a point not far too to the left on the other side of the wooden bulkhead of the companionway. He held his breath straining painfully. Whoever they were Glandelinians or not they were speaking in English and he could not understand. Yet neither voice was that of a girl or a boy scout.

Who could they be? Had to see, slowly, slowly, scarcely moving, yet going forward all the time, Jack peered around the bulkhead.

"We will soon have the old engine fixed good now, Doc" this latter man was saying, "nothing wrong but a couple of bolts shaken or broken loose in the storm. I believed it was as best for me to lay up the ship temporarily and tighten things generally. That's all. Well so long doc. I'll have to go. Keep the crew working or well never get anything finished" and he started to go.

"Mr Algrone "the doctor said it to the engineer"you don't know what is always happening to your engines while you are away off duty in so you!"

The engineer started forward with a curse.

"If they're up to any monkey shines, I'll fix them."

"Oh Mr. Algrone. Oh you wasn't think that please. But its those chris boy and girls scouts that Gerald Starring brought aboard. They injured an old man. I know its the father of several or so of those girls."

"Yes, yes, I know," interrupted the engineer, impatiently. "I'll tell me for if you what you suspect is true, and I would n't let it rest them Ulandelinian gin secrets, it's high time I was getting below. So they're all the purpose of getting at those christian boy and

"I'll telegraph to that boat," said Jean perplexed. "You must be crazy. With this little relieving act I suppose!"

Indeed Jac was highly excited as he dashed to the main salon and for the door containing Violet, and her sisters and Gertrude Angelina and the others, and with somewhat halting steps, that said of course they must enter.

He heard Gertrude hit the floor, and grinned, even in the midst of his excitement. Gertrude Angeline he firmly believed had been sleeping late, and so were the others, as there had had to be no one to make them up. By the time Gertrude had opened the door, Violet, stood or rather too Jean with her stood beside Jack completing a sketchy toilet, by finishing putting on waist.

Gertrude, and Violet, and your sisters too. We have got to try and sell this coat at once."
"This was Jack's opening remark, as he and Jean closed the door to the salon. Violet, and her sisters, still in pajama clad, sleepy eyed looked at him in the greatest amusement.

"Are you crazy Jack!!!!" asked Gertrude.
"You're heard something, Jack," said Violet, "but is it?"
"You've heard something, Jack," said Violet, "but is it?"
Briefly and graphically the boy scout related his morning's adventures growing and the result of the ping telegraphic instrument.
"I had decided much he said, when I heard there was a Abbiesham sub marine chaser on the flood in search for us, that we had been missed and reported captured the moment it happened as Walter Starring had been spying in the lines and reported to the Christian lines by wireless, I felt we just had to make an effort to capture the ships telegraphic room at least and call for help. There are thirty of us here, and we can hold out until the sub chaser comes up."

Violet, and her sisters grew grave.
"At with these little good for nothing weapons we have with us," said Angelina, "what have we against the Glandelinian girls' scout soldiers. They're armed with hand machine guns and we ain't."
"Look here," said Gertrude slowly. "I'll bet this fellow 'The Yuck' say has a small machine gun or two in his room. He's bound to always have such a weapon handy as his life too is always in danger. If he was helpless, last night, and probably still is. No what is to prevent our going in there, and taking it from him now.!!!!"

"Good idea Gertrude," said Angelina, "Violet," and there's Fredrick larger also. Accordingly to Jack he is sent up yet. Probably got in a bad night and is taking his morning sleep while the engineers are repairing the engine. He is undoubtedly undoubtedly has a machine gun too. Suppose we compel him to give it to us, his arm is broken, and surely if we burst into the room we can over-awe him."

The others nodded their approval, and the eyes of the three boys' scout leaders lighted up with enthusiasm. Angelina, however, shook her pretty head gravely but continued to make a hasty dressing, still nevertheless.
Just outside outer dress and waist," Violet, "said, "That's all all we need. We have to hurry."

In a trice they were all thus clad, standing in their bare feet, and then Jack, who had assumed command gave his orders.
"Gertrude," he said, "deferring to her judgement (he being the world's greatest girl scout in this story) I believe we had better split each into two parties, and enter the enemy's cabins simultaneously don't you follow in the other cabin first, either 'Mr Nutt' or larger intending to follow in the other later the probability is as would alarm the occupant of the other cabin and put him or them on his or their guard."
"You say, Jack that is right. Suppose I Angelina pickee, and Jean and four of the others tackle Mr Nutt, and you and some of the others go after larger, while the rest watch for the Glandelinian girls' scouts."

"Right," said Jack, "hitching on the door, if I.
"But one thing more," said Angelina, "before myself making a motion of caution. Go in quickly and quietly, and get your man before he has a chance to fire. He should do likewise, and listen if we are resisted we give no quarter under any circumstances. They won't give us none."

The three boys' scout leaders nodded. Then Jack opened the door and with beating hearts they all filed out. Jack tiptoed across the salon to prevent his shoes making any sound. The others were in their bare feet. Four and four they ranged outside the doors of the two cabins. Gertrude nodded that she and the Princesses were ready. Jack did the same. Then they flung open the doors and dashed in. Jack and Jean who entered first found Fredrick larger sleeping heavily. One look showed an automatic machine gun in an ammunition belt wound around from a coat hanger above his head. With one swoop Jack caught the weapon and belt and brought it down. The moment disturbed larger who was lying fully clothed on his berth, the bandaged arm across his chest. He looked at them, then with a roar raised up but Jean pushed him back on his pillow. Jack drew his pistol and presented it at him.
"Quiet now," he said in a low voice. "We don't want to hurt you. But our lives are in danger from the Glandelinian girls' scouts and we mean to protect ourselves." Larger lay back and a gleam came into his eyes. He glanced from one to the other.

"Are they assaulting you, or do you just guess they are going to or dreaming it?"
"They have not attacked us yet," replied Jean. "But we are not going to wait for what we have found out will soon come, and like a storm. Look here, Fredrick larger, you know what the sentiment of the girls' scouts are toward us."

Tell my friend Jack here overhauls something early this morning morning which indicates the Glandelinian girls' scouts are planning immediate action. We realize you may be an officer, and superior to them, but in these situations they count on any attention to your commands. Now—" "You're right," invited larger sarcastically glancing over Jean's shoulder. "This is my special hour for receiving callers."

Jack and Jack whirled.
Violet, and her sisters, and Gertrude, Angelina were in the doorway.
"That Mr Nutt," said Gertrude, "agily, while Jean not to be diverted continued to keep an eye and a revolver trained on Fredrick larger. The man is still unconscious or seems to be," said Gertrude. "He found only one machine gun, but too and a rifle and six good repeating pistols besides, and a number of hand grenades."

"Was the doctor there?" asked J. Jack.
"No...."
"Mr Fredrick larger, here is the main telegraphic room on board this ship!" Jean demanded.

"On top of this cabin," replied the boy scout. "But little good it will do you. The engineer is the only one aboard who can operate it, and until the engine goes it will not have any juice, and if its calling for help you mean to do you'll have to use the bridge deck telegraph and that's in the danger zone, where you'll chance being stormed by the girls' scouts in no time."

They looked at each other in dismay. Here was a contingency that had not occurred to them. Perrod groaned aloud. But ere any of them could say anything, the stamp of the engines suddenly began. Algrone had succeeded in repairing them, whether the Glandelinian girls' scouts had tried to meddle with them or not. The engines seemed to gain speed and a slight quivering shook the ship.

"There, in your juice, girls," Fredrick reaching out his sound hand to pluck Violet's sleeve.

"Violet," whirled a broad smile on her face.
"Look here Fredrick," she declared. "I believe you are on our side at heart are you not?"

Larger sat up on the berth, swinging his legs over the side.
"Not on the side of your nation," he said. "I'm a Glandelinian boy scout. But I don't approve of the way the soldiers fight children of your side and when your lives are in danger, and also when you point a revolver at me and order me to get up and navigate the old tub, what can I do."

"Right," said Violet, "gravelly although her eyes were dancing, and the corners of her mouth twitched. "Well captain boy scout. Will you please navigate."

"Yes," said Fredrick. "Follow me."

At this started out of the salon and up the companion way stairs, Jack pressed an extra revolver into Jean's hands.

"Take this," he whispered. "I have a good knife."

"At Jack!"

But nothing. If it comes to a fight at close quarters, I've got more better weapons. You keep them off with your own and that weapon, do you hear. Don't let them Glandelinian girls' scouts even get near you."

Jack, the smallest of all these girls and boy scouts, pressed Jack hand gratefully, grasped the revolver, and followed in the footsteps of her boy scout friend thus bringing up the procession headed by Fredrick larger. The latter paused as they reached the deck and looked toward the wheel. He had left it locked. Not a soul was in sight. The others grouped themselves about him. Larger nodded Jean who was nearest.

"I'm out with your cause but I sympathize with you in your situation," said the same, he said. "I don't like the looks of things. The Glandelinian girls' scouts must all be in the four-castle, watching their plots. Will you allow me the gift of honor and trust your prisoner to go below and see how the engineer is coming along, and do you in the meantime while the engines are running and you have your chance go into the telegraphic room off the bridge. It is up this ladder. He indicated a narrow iron runged ladder beside him leading to the tiny bridge above. Veenly he regarded the girl Jean. "Can you use it when you're up there?"

"You induced I sure can," said Jean. "What do you think I'm a girl scout for if I can't. Well here goes before a girl scout of your side sees me. Come on gang."

And climbing up the ladder, she entered the room opening from the bridge, with Gertrude Angelina, followed by Violet, and her sisters, and the rest on her heels. One glance around, and she saw what she was looking for. The control apparatus for sending written messages was on a stand against the opposite wall. Adjusting the instrument and staring the fingers as if it was a type writer she got the connection from an answering sound and began calling the pursuing boat while striking the keys....

"A fine place for defending ourselves in case we are assaulted," commented Jack glancing about him.

"If we remain hidden the Glandelinian girls' scouts or the soldiers, and officers on board may not even discover us," said Gertrude. The front wall of the telegraphic room was composed of stout iron panelling to half a man's height from the floor with glass windows above. Gertrude, and Violet, and her sisters and the rest crouched or knelt or crouched behind this protective screen, not even their heads showing above it but one of them kept herself high enough to see along the deck toward the forecabin, where the enemy girls were holed. The forecabin door was closed. On the narrow deck, the men were in immense batches opening into the hold, which showed that the boat was once a huge fishing smack, but the captain of the ship had used the big hold in which to pack a pack of slaves which were to be carried off either for sale or to other parts of the enemy territory or country. Beyond the latches rose a stout derrick and beyond that the forecabin. Behind the bridge and the telegraphic room or aft in this tank was the engine room. The view was cut off by the black wall of the Telegraphic room against which stood the instruments which Jean was now trying to use.

"Listen" whispered Penrod. "Jean" is writing the answer for the other tickler."

All withdrew their glance from the dock and looked around. "I've got the Abbatinian Boat which was following or hunting for us" whispered Violet, gleefully and jumping up and down. "Say this is too easy. Why we'll have help here before the Glandelinians even realize what has happened here how the tickers go. Jean is giving the other boat our bearings right now just as Fredrick gave them to her."

now just a faint scratching sound caused Jack himself to face about in alarm. The door from the bridge however stood slightly open as they had left it on entering. He listened carefully. No doubt some one was creeping up the ladder. Now he was on the bridge creeping on hands and knees. He heard the door. Jack nudged a fearful Pentec and the latter slipped on the floor and lay on his side. Jack slipped on his side. He was the others who was farthest away were all crowded so close as to avoid being seen from the door that they themselves could not look out. In the silence the tickers rang out clearly and this was what Jean was working out; "Prisoners girlscount with the Vivian Girls I'm telegraphing you. Yes that's our pation. What's that. I can hear you. Yes I'm Jean Saunders operating the telegraph. We're not in a camp but on a boat. Hurry. This is tickle... We have their Telegraph room yes. They haven't discovered us yet. But when they do they'll cut off our juice. We'll hold out against the landolinian girlscount all right. But come your fastest. We're going to try and take the boat and make them all prisoners. Write me no

The sleeping sound outside had ceased. Jack could hear the anxiety no longer. He raised his head cautiously. There was no one in sight as he brought the deck within view. He rose a trifle higher as he saw the door of the fore-castle was within view. Then he yelled as the door was dashed open and inward against him hurling his head and arms. He saw a stout, manly captain of the ship, who had been wrong his eyes, enflamed with rage. He immediately stood swaying in the little door-mat doorway, crouched to spring. Penrod and Hadcliffe both sprang forward at the same time. He had given his revolvers to Jean. He had retained his long dagger but the weapon lay on the floor where he had placed it, when he fell. It was entirely forgotten. He was unarmed. Gertrude shouted in alarm and raised her revolver to fire. Then she dropped it again. The three boys. Penrod, two firars shot out, but the third came along the blow which slid handlessly by. When the bridge, tight and together, swayed a moment on the rollers and then fell with a sound, crush to the deck at the foot of the ladder. So suddenly had it happened that by the time he could regain his feet and as out to the bridge Jack was too late to prevent the disaster. Revolvers in hand Gertrude was a step ahead of the boys and started to follow. But she was followed by some of the men with their eyes on the two figures below. They saw her hand fall and the fall and struggling now in on the deck with Hadcliffe helping Penrod. But Jack saw what the others missed, and shouted a warning. "Look out Gertrude. Here they come."

"Open a retaliatory fire upon them Jean" barked Jack whose chest was runh us."

Obviously ~~xxxxxxxxxxxx~~ Jean sent a bullet pingling into the direct case and another into a coil of rope and with another shot hit a third Glandelinian soldier. The opening fire too of the other christian girlscoouts brought a host of fright from the enemy scouts, and a Glandelinian boyscout was seen darting from behind the rope and ran like a rabbit into the open forecourt door where Jean brought him down with a well aimed shot wounding him severely. Jean herself sent another bullet into the dec behind her and brought down a Glandelinian soldier, the shot had a salutary effect especially from all of our friends for an of the enemy were hit and not a survivor so much as even dared to put forth an arm to return the fire. Jack meanwhile leaped to where MacLiffe and Penrod were trying to overcome the Glandelinian captain for neither was willing to release his grip.

"We've got to run for shelter boys" cried Jack "Break away, for heavens sake."

"Let us alone Jack," wanted Penrod, "we've both got him now, ah... ah..." And with a sudden mighty heavy heave the two boys rose upwards. The captain rose upwards too. Over the heads of the two boys he went hurtling through the air. They all turned to look. There was a cry of anguish. Then a loud crash and just at that crucial moment the engineer emerged from the engine room and was met by the body of the captain. Both fell to the deck together, and then rolled downworded went like two footballs down the engine room steps. A fusillade of shots from the direction of the enemy bay and girscoats thudded into the bulwark. All of the christians replied with a considerable effect.

"Look out one of the enemy child scouts behind the derrick has got a dangerous looking machine gun, fired, man, pumping several more shots into the derrick mast. oop! keep up the fire on his position, everybody so he can't can't take aim. I've got to reload my own." "...

Jean pressed the trigger. No result, she tried again, again, again. "It's jammed!" she groaned. "Gertude try your revolver." From the tower however there was no possibility in the firing, but the enemy scouts saw that Gertude fired her own gun and also one of them saw her working frantically to put a fresh clip of cartridges into her own automatic. The glandolinian boy scout fired just as Gertude raised her revolver. The bullet sent the weapon spinning. A yell of triumph went up from the concealed enemy. It was a critical moment, another such shot, or shots and the enemy would be encouraged to bravely pour cover and make a rush across the deck. Jean succeeded in reloading, but she was now trembling as much from excitement that she could not steady his her hand sufficiently to pump her bullets into the derrick masts as before and the shots hit two of the gunners.

the gathering. This was every one of you quick-erled a boys voice. They gathered round for an instant and saw it was Fredrick Dargor. and he was standing aft at the stern post, becko beckoning, and beside him was the slim doctor white with fright, trembling, and wringing his hands. As the christian and boyscouts started toward him Jean who had taken one swift glance around, called that she would guard their rear, but Penrod insisted it was his place to do so, and did, and sending an occasional shot along the deck, walked backward after his companions.

the deck," yelled back wards after his companions. "Come on, come on," called larger's voice impatiently. What did he want, they end red. What was his intention? Jean found time to wonder. Never the less he did not relax her vigilance. Several more shots along the deck. She bumped into a form, and a blurred about. It was the glandlinian boy cut larger. Then the next girl saw a boat in the water below with the girl and boy, and she already in it. Penrod climbing over the thwarts, and Gertrude sliding down the rope. A yell of furious rage and frenzy went up. "Give them another shot to hold them," commanded larger himself. Jean complied. Several glandlinian girls crouched who had gained their feet and start a started forward toward themselves prone again on the deck. "Now give me that gun," said larger. "I've fixed the guns of your friends for them so you'll have plenty of weapons on the boat," and down the rope with you and cast off."

"But,--but--"
"O tute about it now" said Darger roughly. "I heard you calling for help and I want 'none of your troops pitting me him christian army jat jail as long as this crazy ar continue no matter whose side is right. Over us long, much, and good luck to you."

John said: "Don't lose the rope which Gertrude Angellin, who was braced in the bottom of the boat or its bow rather held steady for her. Penton and Lucille and the two others were already at the stern and sending off from the side of the trailer to get her away herself as in the stern."

Give us, quick! Helped larger from above.
As she made her way across the thwarts toward the stern, the latter to trim the coat, Jean glanced upward as was leaning over the rail of the big boat saving face. It took him an un- injured hand, in which was clutched the new life given to him by Jean. Jean saved us his share but sent lantly to the cars and the boat began to rush through the still water widening the gap between it and the trailer. A slight feeling of regret at parting with the boy scout target, though he was an enemy crossed Jane's mind. A strange boy scout, a leader of a Glendale child scout was Fredrick larger yet Fred and Jane and the others could not think to blame the first five scouts in the Glendale child scout, which drew them strangely. Violet and her sisters had made that both Gerald Starring and larger could not be fighting for a cruel and unholy cause. From the deck of the trailer there fighting to them now the high pitched voices of the girl and boy scouts floated to them now the high pitched voices of the girl and boy scouts on the ship. They were in sight, and the thwarted juvenile Glendale soldier were desperately angry and furious at seeing their prey escape... They ran to the rail, and I leaned over screaming defiantly. One of them a girl scout who looked up her arm and fired... The bullet slammed the water close to the stern. The next moment they could see Fredrick larger coolly raise his. Upon and fire... not at them... he shot caught the Glendale... Violet in the arm and the latter's revolver fell into the sea as he seized the injured member and danced about in screaming agony.

"I told them to get down," he's driving them all back into the forecastle." The Grandallman boy scout leader was indeed driving the Grandallman child scouts girls and boys together away from the rail. His voice came only faintly to the boat, but its occupants could see him looking striking with clubbed revolver, forcing the child scouts below. One by one by one they disappeared into the forecastle door until the deck was cleared of them. Then he turned .. they figure now on the deck, and saved once more to the boat.

"Stay on your cars now boys," advised Gertrude. "Fredrick said to lay here until the Abbi-annian boat which had our prisoner comes for us and gets a board."

"So the Glaslinian boys out here you some good explanation about the situation did he?" demanded Violet. "I am all at sea all right, in my mind as well as the cat on this food. What's it all about anyway, where did he come from suddenly, how with that injured arm did he get this boat lowered, why did he drive us off the ship ship and why did he come away even at such a critical moment, and why did he take this position but still not move, and why did he still the christian ship arrive. Then we have had all those Glaslinians our prisoners and the boat in our possession too, and also that confounded villain villain the "Mutt-Spy."

perused glanced around the horizon.
"There is not the slightest sign of smoke indicating the pursuer" he said "unless it's that very tiny plume over there-----pointing to the northwest.
"What position did the Abbevillean pursuer boat give, Jean, and how far away was it?" "**"

"That's it all right" said Jean, "She was northwest of us, and about four or fifteen knots away. She said she would be in about an hour away." She looked at her wrist watch. "Why" she exclaimed with a almost disgust. "The watch must have stopped." "I'm listening carefully" it's going all right. But it certainly is hard to believe. Only ten minutes since we left the cabin. I couldn't see my watch there. And now since I called the christian boat. I'll but sometime before it comes up.

"Look!" cried Mullcliffe, pointing. "The enemy ship is bolching a heavy smoke from its funnels, and yes,---she's beginning to steam away from us."
"I suppose," said Vice-Virvan, "that Fredrick is going to try and escape!"
She called to Guran. "Go over with Fredrick and help him lower this net if I saw you, but did he say to you, why did he our arch enemy help me?"
"Fredrick tell you."

"Those Chandelain children frightened me dreadfully when I hid in the little hole in the wall and we all escaped. And that Professional spy, who I'm so glad we escaped, but there's not much to tell. The Chandelain girls came alone, hint dropped by one of the boys that the Chandelain girls came alone aboard wanted revenge on us all because the way you three boys had laid out the old Central who happens to be the father of four of them. But it is quite certain that they hinted for our ill blood. The Chandelain child accounts are revengeful. So too was to Engineer Agriane and not single able to converse with him but the doctor was and earn him that the child could not let it, and then join his engine in order to seize the ship before it reached its destination and thus get us all in their power without interference from the soldiers in camp. He then went below and seizing me the engineer presently called me down and I obeyed. He then had the engine running. The dozen Chandelain cobbins on board were busy under no directions. He brought me inside out of their hearing, and told me to go to the chief of cook who for some reason probably told him to go into the Chandelain child slaves. He told me to tell him to go into the fore-cabin and to over-look the hidden there. He'll go now where to find them. These child accounts bring carry their knives and revolvers if they let a machine gun around it will remove those at last."

"I was frightened, but the engine over-powered me and drove me forth to do his bidding. The crew found a number of machine guns and removed them hiding them in the hold. So luckily it did or we's not any of us be here now."

"I'll say we couldn't," declared Jain.

There was one who had been so interested in the story Susan was telling that they did not paid any attention whatever to those who were or their own situation, now at violent cry, every one glanced around.

"Here it is coming" she added pointing toward the "Glandelinian" ship. The vessel was not yet even one mile away even though it was speeding very fast. As Jean pointed a wall of heavy dark rotten colored fog almost in all odds of shapes creeping across the waters, hid it suddenly from view and overhead it was coming very dark indeed. One moment the big enemy ship had been moving still and in sight, the next it had sunk into the fog and out of sight in the fog, and the fog was rolling and thence in the mist.

"Oh My Dear god save us," cried Susan in great fright. "We'll be lost in the flood and its worse than being lost in mid ocean. How can that Christian not find us?"

"Here she comes now," Joyce shouted, pointing to the northwest, where the air was still clear.

"You but five miles away yet," said Angeline piteously, estimating the distance to where the speedy craft was seen coming an immense thing even at that distance and it was sending up two col. columns of water before its unusually broad prop. prow.

"Good heavens," cried Gertrude, "it's our big raft! Look! Horray."
"Wow, and here's the smoke fog upon us," shouted the Post-

ANG, and Brian. We can drift you on the raft. All of us, and we'll be going to the train. The raft is more than I hope sees us. It must for it is undoubtedly sufficiently on the 10 foot. It ought to be up in about twenty minutes.
Presently we'll begin to shout, and you Jack flash your lights in its getting pretty dark."

Her directions were obeyed to the tip and some forty five minutes later in response to the flashing of lights, and to their shouts a muffled all came across the water. The powers surged like mad. Mills were repeated back and forth and soon a dark bulk loomed ahead, they banged into the raft, and then one by one clambered aboard.

When the two men, the deck of the Iranian raft they were confronted by a young Egyptian officer dressed like an Arab in the insignia of the country navy. At first he merely asked them recognizing them in their gray uniform they still wore he regarded them critically, then was able at last to see who they really were and offered his hand first, to violent, and then his sister and then the other two. He assured the three that the sailors were free.

Q "It seems to me that in this case, if he had come a bit later, and he could have been able to even succeed in locating you in this field of some fog. As it is, it is a question through the changes before the fog had come. Did you experience not a drift or did you escape."

This seemed to be a real threat at which the others bristled. All were covered with dirt and dirt and they had always been bathing every 10 days for years, but the one person who had been in charge of maintaining the big craft said, "I can let you have some old uniforms, but I have no good ones on board and it would be against the regulations for you to wear glandolinian shirts and undies come to the christian lines."

"Good thing the forest fires caused the weather to be so warm" said Violet.

"Say I have an idea" cried Joyce. "Suppose you join, call generally upon the 'arts' photographer and request him to dig I am up some of our uniforms or personal clothing from our property in his headquarters. He knows us well enough to identify our size, and of course, can give him, if necessary, further specifications."

"Go ahead" said the boyscout. "I planned to call him anyhow, to report why we went off and that you and the others have escaped."

"Doud did a police approved her sister Jennie, who did not not relish the prospects of going in; longer than necessary clad as she was as special. in the presence of boy scouts and soldiers. "Tell him everything will be all right when we come."

"You see" said Jan starting away "we may not want to go forth to general civilians lines for some time, for me we must locate that night station. It'll help us in the Abbleinn mystery."

"But you'll all be going ashore first won't you and the boat out in charge of the raft. I haven't thought of that before but of course that is the thing to do. Then you can return to the raft. It's dangerous now to go forth on an expedition as a battle is raging near that town, you are searching for General Munley is in action with General Hanson so they say and is driving him from the region so far."

"Gertrude" said Angeline Iduhu "surely since it is started we have got to see this thing through and she turned to Gertrude and voiced the desire of herself and her friends.. "Surely you won't put us all ashore and return to the Christian lines now. The enemy tricked us and duped us, and we have got to atri' ab back."

gorgeous smile....
"Girls, and Violet, and your sisters. I sympathize with you all," she said.
"But I advise you to look at this matter reasonably...We have been drawn into all of our most stirring adventures by force of circumstances, and so far have been unable to wry out of it. But we came here up here as Violet, and her sisters had planned for a business on the part of discovering things about Abblenn, with three of the boys accompanying us, so as to impress us with the return to this shore of the lines on important business. The general demand by request, you know, General Hanson lie in action, and things have turned out so no that we must do so, so for the time being we must let that signal station go and continue our searches around Abblenn."

"But Gottlieb-----"
It was Jack who spoke.
But Gottlieb only shook her head.
The next day she said it. "I'm sorry for the sake of all of you here."

"No my friend" she said it. "I'm sorry for the sake of all of you here. I know how all this adventuring and trife down on the flood, and no forth must appeal to all of us young girls and boys. But for once do be reasonable. It isn't out business to go making, raids and attacks upon strongly fortified it isn't but easier to go making lakes and rivers upon the signal stations, that work for the army. And besides, I all have had plenty of adventure out of the situation already, and this here again, had passed the test most unusually. I now I have had enough trip on this raft down the Penrod grinned as he regarded Gertrudes handsome and sturdy figure and disreputable appearance, unclear, clad only in a girls nightie and no

"It's true the situation is exceptionally dangerous, but I can tell you our English soldiers of you I'm sure remember that on passed through during your first long trip after leaving England. "It's dangerous, of course it is the best to remain on the raft for now, but if you desire for there are bunkers for all of you if you do desire to do so. I would not have bunkers for a force of men on board or nearly ten thousand, and the mill is on with four teen cabins for the entire roomed other draws. The latter also have bunks in the engine room that can be used in an emergency. We have a total housing space for see this huge raft has large series of cabins on it now build by the military engineers one hundred and ten feet long and with a speed of ten to twenty four knots an hour and it is built secondly as a Garbude destined it for use to harbor other men draws and her uncle and his staff. The only boy out that has been on board before you can having been planned in command at Garbude's orders recently. So you see there's nothing to be a hot battle on shore before long. It's afraid, and the best to remain on board and not make the mistake expedition you desire, it's best for all of you to take Garbude's advice."

"In there a fullfore of ten thousand men!" asked Jack unexpectedly. "I've seen only half a dozen men!"

"What you see," answered Arthur Sonia "is what you might call the "Deck match-W. Cherry & Sons of IN. 432."

"All of them who has not drunk or gets going tomorrow."

"Well couldn't we swing hammocks too?"

"Well, couldn't we make him more comfortable?"

"Why not I suppose you could," answered Arthurina. "Of course you could take him out and let him sit in the sun if you like, but that is your fault as I have been put at the command of Vilat, and her sisters and Gertrude too, if I could manage to accommodate you upon any fashion to which they agreed. But I advise you to stop thinking of that Taler on Talaran station at the moment which you might perhaps find it impossible to accomplish."

"Come, Come" interrupted Gertrude. "This is nonsense, nonsense. Jack go and call General Vivian. We do as I propose."

Jin Jain referred to the telegraphic station with Jack while the others (except Violet, and her sister) leaned moodily on the rail, and Gertrude fell into conversation with Arthur's cousin Susan stood aside, taking in all the shapes and sizes of the huge raft like host. Presently Jain and Jack approached the raft with eager faces. Arthur's uncle had disappeared with Gertrude.

"Where's Gertrude?" asked John.
"I don't know. Gone to get her then I suppose."

"I'm a n."

Everyone stood close to Jean, and put their heads together, while both Jack, and Jean whispered to the others tidings which quickly erased the gloom from their countenances.

"I'll go and call Gertrude," said Redcliffe finally.

A: that young Gertrude Angelina re-appeared, shod in white canvas deck deck shoes but a size too large for her but nevertheless.

"Gastoude has just been telegraphing third general Vivians headquarters spiritedly," said Jean. "The army is advancing down to support general

General Viven is to leave in case the relations between the enemy is heavy. It seems that not a successful one at first reported. General Viven's speech almost demands that we all stay aboard the huge raft, as he is going to leave the enemy at Santa Barbara Creek. He will allow us to go to shore there, he wrote, and we can catch the night riders' squads. I can catch the Creek and be there tomorrow morning ahead of the others. General Viven is to leave the day after tomorrow. He will be with me. General Viven says if we can't discover our expedition just fail to find that "Telegraphic code".

"Very good but unusual" approved Violet. "But I like orders here now. So will my sisters. I will see about that cable telegram later on. First we want to have a uniform. "All stay the

"Oh no indeed I did not have time enough for that. But I did tell of our escape from the gaudolinian ship, and general Vivian telegraphed to me in answer that the presence of an actual Gaudolinian ship of my description on the very flood waters seemed to him something very suspicious indeed, and also fitted into something he had in mind, which he would tell us about when he comes on board."

"Is he coming on board?" demanded Gertrude.

"Yes."

"I believe," said Jane "That the general himself meant that he must have also either to the signal station in the cove or something about the mysterious of Abbotism, and that the Cove was somewhere in this locality."

Gertrude laughed.

"Oh you Jean and Jack," she said. "You can't give up hope of being hit the death or having a hand in the location and capture of this signal station for our own use, can you?"

When he had ventured a question as to how such a signal station could be located and Gertrude now entered into conversation with her. The three boys themselves drew aside, and the girls themselves leaned on the rail staring into the heavy fog ahead and discussing their chances of seeing further action. All were to the agreement that the veiled hint dropped by general Vivian indicated that he had obtained a clue that the signal station was in the neighborhood somewhere. They speculated upon whether general Vivian's telegraph had provided the clue or whether there had been sufficient time for any thing else of good use to be brought into play.

"You see Penrod pointed out," General Vivian's telegraphic man intended to use sound detectors at several places pretty idly scattered, and it was or must have taken him some time to set them up."

"That's true," said Radcliffe "but the deal device required no time at all to put up. The time needed would be for making the trip from San Francisco Creek to the other stations. Say"—

His face lighted up.

"What?" he asked.

"Why didn't general Vivian say one of the main Government Telegraphic stations which he planned to use in the employ of the sound detector was behind a hill near the edge of the flood."

"I don't remember that," said Penrod, and Radcliffe also shook his head.

"Well that's what he said," declared Jack. "I'm certain of it."

"In that case," said Radcliffe, "perhaps through the use of these sound detectors at San Francisco Stream and in this hill station they were able to locate this great enemy station earlier than had been expected."

"Or at any rate they must have obtained some clue which induced general Vivian to move his army to join with Langdon," said Penrod. "You see he said he had moved his troops toward this creek and extended another portion of his army further up the stream, not San Francisco but some other spot near here which general Langdon's army touches, because he figured he could concentrate there more quickly—which too would be the only way to prevent any of Langdon's army from getting through any gap that would be a danger to the Christian line. Then too he got a code message via telegraph, calling him forward more hastily, and he telegraphed general plain night longer to cover him up."

"Are we not slowing down?" asked Penrod.

"The three boyscout leaders had been so interested in their discussion they had not noticed a small dark bulk looming across the waters in the heavy smoke fog. It was in any boat chaser coming toward the raft, and the huge raft boat slowed to a complete stop and lay rocking gently in the mild swell of the flood, while a boat put off from it for the smaller craft. Presently the boat returned, and general Vivian himself stepped aboard followed by a few of his staff. The immense raft boat, and the little vessel saluted each other with toots and part-d company, sooner than expected it had disappeared. After greeting Violet, and her sisters, and Gertrude Angelina and his friends general Vivian requested that they join the raft for Santa Barbara Junction with all speed. Then he turned to the little girl Jean, and the then said to Violet and her sisters, "Your little friends communication with me had done wonders, and with that you have told me about your many adventures in these very flood waters, I've been able to put two and two together and to arrive at the conclusion that we can capture the signal station but that we'll have to force Langley from Stenbolstead to do so and it'll cause a mighty terrible battle."

Before general Vivian decided to do anything on the matter it was also decided by Violet, and her sisters that they all should have their own morning breakfast on the raft. In the meantime of ring the line all were cleaning themselves preparatory to eating Jean herself however it was ransaging through her own wardrobe until she found and brought forth a light purple military girlscout a straw hat which was a new the spring before but which she had recently been tired of as she wore more other hats. Jean had seen the strange girl but as Susan had seen and she was determined to give her this one though she did not dare to go without Gertrude's consent in it was otherwise not right being a light military property and not positively her own. When she had found the hat, she had found Gertrude scrubbing her head and discovered over "like hydrophobia of the head" with soap suds and so Jean drew near, requesting her the permission, and asking permission to give the hat to Jean herself.

"Hurray on me," said Gertrude. "What won't you think of next Jean, and where did you even get such an idea. Why she's not a girlscout just a never mind do not you please with the hat, which though I believe you'll find as much too small for Susan as the one she now has is too large."

Jean felt fearful of this indeed, but then she suddenly realized that there's there's a will there's a way, and after considering for a moment, she went in quest of Jane Hallfort, who had one just like it but the right size. Jane did not desire to part with the hat but like good little Abbotism girl and boys she readily made the sacrifice, though she brushed away a tear as she brought the hat to her. Jean however did not want to take it for nothing and she brought forth a coral bracelet with gold clasps and she gave it to Jane for the hat. Then putting the hat over her arm she looked for Susan.

For a time she searched everywhere and could not find Susan, she set stepped up to Artherson's.

"Good morning again," she said as she met him the doorway of the cabin.

"Where has Susan gone. I would wish to see her for a minute. I've got something for it."

"You wish to see her," he said. "Why she's in this cabin and despite my protests she insisted in washing all those dishes. She's in that room yonder. She sure most love to work."

Jean advanced toward the room indicated by the boyscout where she was surprised to see Susan at a big sink, her arms immersed in dishwater, and a formidable pile of plates, platters, and bowls and all other kinds of dishes which she had already washed, and now all ready to be wiped stand near her. Throwing aside her bonnet, and seizing a coarse dish towel towel Jean exclaimed, "I'm going to wipe the dishes Susan, I know how, and then they are done I want to show you something."

"Good," said Susan. "Then we'll be through before breakfast. It's an hour yet."

However it was not any rate thing at all to see Jean Saunders in the kitchen scrub of the raft, and now the fact that she was there, and wiping dishes as usual too circulated rapidly bringing to the spot other girlscouts who started in helping and all worked away, assisting in scouring knives and washing all kinds of ptn and pans too until all was done, and then Susan accompanied Jean outside on deck where the latter opening her basket held to view a neat looking straw hat of military military color and far prettier than the one which had formerly been presented to her in the smoke lines.

"See," she said placing it upon Susan's head "This is for you. I wanted to give you mine but it wasn't big enough, so Jane let you have hers. It's real becoming too. It'll be your first step to a uniform for you have passed the test."

The tears which fell from Susan's eyes were caused not less by Jean's kindness to the little orphan girl than by the thought that the severe highly dignified girlscout leader Jane had given her a bonnet, however she did not realize the sacrifice which the noble hearted girl had made to give up the bonnet, and it was well she did not for it would have not only spoiled all the happiness she would experience in wearing it but she might have refused to accept the gift.

"Thank you Jean and Jane too," said she. "I am so glad for this, for I love to go to army churches and I surely could not have worn that other thing at home."

"I wouldn't either," returned Jean. "It seemed ridiculous for me to give you such an old out of a thing, though of course there was nothing else within the smoke lines to be had and therefore none of us could be choosers. But soon you'll get your uniform, Jane said so."

"Yes," said Susan happily. "I can't wait about deck for a while. It's half an hour before breakfast time yet."

In passing of the cabin the two girls met Angelina plioche, who had just come from the outside. As soon as she saw Susan and Jean, she said to the latter "Jean quick go to the signal station on the raft. Signal to shore to some official any one and have him sent over a doctor right away. Have the officer tell him to come right away for one of our girlscouts just now has been mysteriously shot down on shore and is dreadfully injured. We've been under fire."

There was a rumor in her voice, and she seemed much excited, but the two girls were taken aback by this news. The signal station was soon reached, the message given, and then they hurried back.

"In the telegraph office," said Susan as she saw the bedroom door open "Awful isn't it?" said Joan, as she started for the other part of the huge raft. "I didn't see one that snipers could find us even here, and I guess now there's peril even from the air."

"Come with me" she said softly. "And I'll show you the greatest sight you ever saw."

Wonderingly half fearfully she looked up to Susan for an explanation but the girl cut her off replied as they returned to the dining room "Yes indeed there's but queer doings sometime or other, its very evident, but I realize one thing, they'd like to attack this raft, but are afraid to try it."

There were but five for two who the sniper was who had killed the child, and his death was buried in the utter silence of the flood. A half hour after the scene and when male two had been over Ba gusan at under a cap and a snipular snar weeping bitterly, it was known that the same child would lean the war with her by now patied her cheeks and tried in vain various ways to draw her attention. She still slept on unmindful of the sounds of rapid footsteps upon the boards of the main floor nor until twice repeated did she hear the words:

A voice said "Hear!" Then insisted upon finding out what was the matter.

 Putting her head on his shoulder she sobbed out;
 "There's one, who's gone, and there's no one left but us here. Oh, dear, Oh dear."

"What for? Am I an animal or what?"

"Gertrude appointed me," she's got a sister in disguise as a boy in the army and boat. If now the one I cannot reveal it. He or she rather than come to get with her for a while too. They were speaking about getting a girl trainee, and I and Bill offered our services, and were accepted. Won't we have real nice times and then I've brought you something. I was on shore for a while and came back on the boat. Are you afraid of dogs?"

"He's surely a sanddog," said she stroking his smooth head. "What a hell he'll be, Jack!"

"Satan" Idan'and Violet then, in the morning after breakfast, "To have my own forces of evil and my servants and we even faced on not by hidden sinners and influences." And in her own hand she showed her displeasures upon the enemy in many ways, conjuring up all sorts of reasons, why more evil and boys should be treated and added to the force as often is possible, and wondering what the "world" was coming to, when young children hardly out of the cradle began to be shot at by blood-thirsty sinners just because they were "evil" sinners and girls out and so forth. It wasn't so even in barbarous nations, goodness knows."

St. Clair.

Much as Susan had learned to prize Jeanne's friendship, before the very time came for General Vixen to reveal himself she had cause to value it still less highly. She knew too how vast millions of people became of no account to him, and how he watched and despised, and Jean who had shared a rough deal in these horrors, for she had none to tell her, who she had never met, and who she had never seen, and who she had never heard of, these rare adventures for situations which she and Jean would have to take turns to bring into use for Susan's benefit so that as soon as possible she could be initiated into the earlmost circle, force, Susan had sustained a great loss and had to be helped and comforted.

Then commenced Susan's fur. Lessons For some time Susan listened to Jack's instructions and then she was given a milliner's code with strange notes written on them and she was asked to read and solve them. After some time she was given a while code but came to a question which she did not know. The time which she could not solve, she skipped to the next. Proceed further. Again and again, and still again, she skipped to the next without catching a single idea and was on the point of asking John to assist her, when Sol who had been watching her said:

"I see you are situated at no. 4444. Let me take that code now Susan."

"One thing Perrod himself thought frankly to himself—Why is there this difference, this contrasted and exalted situation between the Abniamian children and the children of the nations, the one I had, where they also have to be so much children of the nations, and the other, where they are not, while all the other seedlings getted and so forth whether forlorn or not, while all the Abniamian people and children were so good as to be on equal terms with one another as if in heaven already, and that the country even now stores with utmost desperation to bring these who yet were sorrowful and desolate and destitute because of being so long away from the happiness they once possessed, and to restore as far as possible."

And Radcliffe continued after our own soldier stated he could obtain about the exact location of Manila great signal towers that he was able to surround the suspected area with sound detectors but if we found our listening post too extensive it would be only dangerous. However, we could find the detectors by the markings of their operators. Operators could pinpoint the exact hub where the secret telegraphic station was in operation. But if we have brought only one or two detectors into play and--and--"

"Six" interrupted Penrod who had followed Radcliffe's explanation with interest. The main ones are at San Francisco Creek, at Ventura Junction and behind Santa Barbara Junctions."

"Then" said Radcliffe "the full probabilities are that while able to state the secret telegraphic station is somewhere in those localities but near the flood we nevertheless can not say where it is which one, which one do we consider the most likely?" he asked turning to Violet herself.

"I have not formed an opinion" she said. All are admirably adapted for the purposes of this Glandelinian intention to rout us out of here. They are thirty to fifty miles off flood on a shore. I believe there is a luncheon we could secure which could take us to Santa Cruz, the nearest from Santa Barbara. But no one can stray far from the land for fear of being hit and the luncheon demolished by enemy shells that night. Let us upon them, and also Hanley's own signal stations can and to keep their secrets without even fear of discovery by tourists and war correspondents of both sides."

"Isn't it strange we haven't caught sight of that Glandelinian boat which had us prisoners on board if it was heading for a refuge in that locality?" asked Angelina Richee Richee.

Artherson Arthursson answered.

"No the main thing for it to do would be to take an opposite course in the smoke fog, stand out toward the flood sea and run in under cover of darkness to night."

"Moreover" added Jennie Vivian "The Glandelinian signal station probably is on the flood side, while we are running down its channel."

"Yes" interrupted Catherine, who had been sitting opposite general Vivian, watching the fog from the cabin window, and conversing in low tones with some of her other sisters "and well soon be in good excitement. You understand" she added to the others "Go forward and watch the shore and see if we can soon be approaching a submerged or half submerged town. I and my sisters are delighted now that we all have an opportunity to see the sights of the flood especially from this viewpoint of solving the Abilene explosion mystery. This is one of the most tremendous floods ever recorded in the world."

The big raft had rounded a large point of land, and a curving shore of land with trees still running far into the water now came into view and a part of a half submerged myriad of houses. Nearest then was a six story structure of light colored stone which General Vivian pointed out as a sort of hotel. It was submerged up to the second story. A little landscaped park surrounded the structure and south of it must have been a boulevard once flanked by trees of noble proportions. Further down the boulevard and a variety of half submerged trees of every description rose a splendid hotel of huge proportions out of the deeper part of the water. But not a soul was to be seen and all the buildings looked as if they had been blasted as if by a hurricane. Back from the waters edge rising gently but steadily on higher ground not under water, lay the upper part of the city embowered in trees that had been shaken as if by an earthquake and all windows in the houses were out. Evidence showed by lines on houses that the flood had even some months before reached even to the highest portions of the rise. But foothills were crowned with great houses that in many cases amounted to no palaces and these were partly wrecked. Behind all lay on bygone forest. Everywhere was a profusion of color, red tiled roofs of houses built even in a fashion still vying with the flame of palm trees. All kinds of floating wreckage was to be seen everywhere and found in windrows on shore near the foot or against the half submerged buildings and over all was a dream of deathly stillness and dusty still while the flood waters here was covered with floating debris. This was late September it being about probably the fifteenth. Until this flood could drain out" General Vivian said the town would be still submerged in the waters with little relief apparent. The rest came as close as possible, and Violet, and her sisters and others decided to go off in a boat and inspect the flood wrecked town. The boat was launched they all got in, the general too, and the last star traveling some distance away into to a long partly submerged pier. The boat of the general's cabin was stilled for fear of attracting hidden foes. A sound then slackened and all present the cabin craft came to rest in the side of a floating house and as they passed this they looked against a floating pier. From the floating pier stairs led to what seemed the higher pier beyond and above but which this lower pier had been built. Beyond it was a third pier and on this lower pier the boat was made fast. Then a little ladder was found underlaid to the boat or floating pier, and the rest came up. A lone person remained in the boat to remind it.

Before this help had been made taken the boat had been seen and was seen to be a light weight boat of uniform and other articles of clothing for those on board the raft who had left their all on the Glandelinian ship. He had promised to return as soon as possible and had did so and now they all were at home in a more respectful way. All had praised his able selections, or they were investigating among the ruins as far as it had been possible but as the smoke fog had increased they had been compelled to return to the big raft and the entire group retired to the cabin where Sharring once again after Gertrude wounded him.

"All of you have been of tremendous assistance so far" said Violet, "and the last I can do in return is to let you know what general Vivian has discovered. And his own aide-de-camp had come with us fortunately."

"We all was good time too" said Penrod, glancing at his watch it is only half past nine now, and I believe indeed to have surely got them."

"We were supposed to see the Glandelinian general" said he general Vivian. He was to come in a military revenue cutter. He ought to be here shortly."

"Probably from the cabin windows overlooking the sea live expanse of the flood, they saw a huge black revenue cutter boat speed up toward the raft, and recognized her or himself as the driver."

"He had good time in the great" said general Vivian glancing at his watch. A few moments later the great Spy was shown to the cabin, and entered with an air of triumph and suppressed excitement.

"Well" he cried without even waiting for exchange greetings "we have got them."

"So there you are general target Vivian. That's what the telegraphic and detector have discovered. Human ingenuity could do more."

General Vivian, and Violet, and her sisters repressed a smile with the greatest difficulty. Gertrude since she could not even hardly hold a high laugh at larger child like almost overconfidence. Angelina piches greed in the face, and all the others made occasion to bow their heads. In reality however no one need to have attempted to even hide their slightest feeling for larger was so constituted that he paid no attention to whether they laughed or not. They were all seated in the cabin. Jack, Joan and Joan alone of the party were not present, as the three were teaching her that had been mentioned before and they did not know what was going on inside the cabin. Larger had spent a considerable space of time relating what had been learned through the medium of the telegraphic sound detectors. From the territory of San Francisco Creek he had gone directly to Ventura Junction and after placing one of the sound detectors in the Christian government telegraphic station at that point had turned back to the station behind Santa Barbara where he was fired on but not hindered in his designs. For twenty four hours he had been listening vainly in the attempt to catch by the telegraphic code messages which might be signalled and interpreted as coming from the secret signal station of the Glandelinians, but all that time he had to be kept inhaling as he was always under fire. Success however had come this morning, just after the fog came on and he had on his listening post at a very early hour. A shell explosion routed him once from the position, but then as he fixed his sound detector to varying tickers sounds there had come a message in code—a code unlike any of the mill many codes registered with any one before and of which he had obtained copies at San Francisco Creek through the headquarters of general Glandelin. A shell burst over his head and the noise for a moment had interrupted the conversation which had been carried on between Glandelinian signal stations elsewhere and a distant fixed station ending with some unknown ship on the flood.

The ship he now realized was some other than which had the children known as prisoners, the station the secret telegraphic concern in the code. To it seemed to him the sound detector located the fixed land station south, southwest of Santa Barbara which would place it somewhere north of Stomolotno. This coincided with some bearing communicated with or from the San Francisco Creek station which also had picked up the code. Then as he had telegraphed him at once the line along which they had come. Ventura Junction had not because of some conflict raging there been able to pick up the message at all. It was then he had telegraphed general Vivian, and caused the latter to move his armies forward for four general reason might be at any time violently attacked. Later however and very recently, in fact he had gotten information more definite. For since general Vivian had telegraphed him in answer to come and confer on the raft he had received another message in code in which however occurred the words "Letter of Abilene" several times and also "Lavin the Vivian girls and their dwelling copotes." I wish they were in— and other words several times.

"So there you are. Your excellency" he said it. "That's what the sound detector had discovered. And alone could do more. Violet and her sisters are in a danger everywhere even within the lines. So far they're safer on board this raft."

"...have certainly done wonders, General Burger."

"You have certainly done
"you with God's help I have."

"It's your opinion then" said Violet, that the signal station we wished to secure is near Stenboletso."

"No. It's north, north of there" said the Gemini nodding with vigor. General Pivian was thoughtful. The others remained silent waiting for him.

"I believe you are correct.".....he said at last. Gertrude Angeline said: "What do you say?"

"I have my doubts if it is at Sombolotze. There's no cove into the flood at that locality...it certainly looks as if Santa Cruz is the place where that telegraphic signal station is situated. I'm positive."

+ telegraphic signal station is situated "and you" are, line, picture, "I" "?????"

The latter smiled and shook her head.

"I believe the same as Gertrude," she said...

Then General Vivian turned to Gertie for confirmation. "Yes, I understand," he said. "Though they did not say

"Well, I've come to the idea that they have a proposition to make to you all. Velez, and her sisters told me that signal station, that it is on Santa Grise location, and will be a big telegraphic station, yet the main platform and framework and undoubtedly must be on the floodward side as I earlier explained, and there are not many places on the flood side where because of the nature of the inundation, where landing could, be made. I was fortunate to get in touch with a pioneer who is called Mexic Mexican Pete, a soldier and a citizen of this country now, the some time ago was in the same locality. This Mexican gave me much valuable information. For one thing I questioned him directly as to the possibility of trying to locate the station by water, instead of land, namely landing on the floodward side of Santa Grise. He told an account of the fierceness of the flood in that local there was only one place really practical and that was where the flood flows into the river near the certain extremity of the locality. At other places he said, the ground descends abruptly into the flood like cliffs and the current of the flood there is so dangerous that even our raft could not approach with safety. Now if the signal station is on Santa Grise, a stream that must be its location up that river comes says. The raft could go off shore while small boats could ply back and forth between the raft and the river, the Glendulinian signal station is flanked by a number of farms, providing whatever the signal station operators. Also another kind of signal station must be up there."

He paused, paused, and Alfred eagerly asked the question trembling on the lips of the rest.

"You said to had a proposition to make us general?"

"You said to had a pr
General civilian smiled

"Yes I have a proposition," he said. "Briefly, would any of you care to accompany Violet, and her sisters to night on an expedition to Santa Cruz?"

"Would we?"

"Would we?"
 everyone ex elled the exclamation simultaneously. General vivian then turned to Gertrude Angeline.

"Your boy and girl are all of them have shown such ingenuity," he said, "and have been of such aid to the country, cases that I feel, and their sisters feel they owe it to them to take them along. Of course, they must have your consent, and I would say they'd be delighted to have you with them too if you would care to come." He continued with emphasis, "and I don't know

"Do not think," said Gertrude, with emphasis, "and I wish about consenting to your request in regard to them all. It is very kind of you, Violet and I can see you sympathize with their adventures or adventurous inclinations. But won't it be dangerous to suicide? Won't the enemy put up a stiff fight?"

[illegible]

"Yes I know that is positively true," said Gerry de "Bill"
"Hoover" Gossard, and Jennie Viv an "Artily" I can sympathize ith your anxiety and if you object I will of course withdraw my invitation to the of us."

"Gertrude darling, have you got to let me go," pleaded Sam. "I'm a physician, and Violet's older kids there will be little anger. Besides, we are giving children not little babies. We have taken care of ourselves perfectly and our living circumstances during the war so far haven't yellow."

The ground there was a mud shore, having a depth of a few feet in places, and a few small stones.

"Indeed you and the others have Jane" said Gertrude. She suddenly put up her hands before her as if to ward off a blow and bent away in such a way from the placid official. "Don't kill me give me quarter! I surrender."

Yes, one parent shouted with delight.

"You are the first Christian 'Dog' who surrendered," said Wildred jokingly.

"But remember," Gertrude warned, "I want you all to go on this expedition, and since you'll go so will I, but you must hear the same advice the mother."

and since you'll go so will I, but you must bear the same advice the mother gives her children. You may hang your clothes on a tree limb but don't go

"And now, I'm glad to have the man who has helped me so much."

"And now, little Viola, bid the girls be here," said Angelina Vivian, "and my sisters have all arrangements to make. So if you will meet me on the Port side of the lift---or better in this big c---at seven o'clock to-night, we'll excuse ourselves, during all that time did as you desire."

Miss Violet, and her sisters arose, saying, general Vivian to accompany them.

"As for me," said G. Virade, when Violet, and her sisters and the general had left the room of the cabin, followed by Hendro Bargar-"I'm worn out and am going to take a nap the flap. You others have at about eight me. It therefore will do you all good to try few hours sleep as we didn't have any on board the ship as prisoners to amuse to compose your life. You would rather watch the distant forest fires."

"Couldn't be done Gertrude," agreed Jane. "We'll go out on deck and watch everything floating by on the flood for a little while. We can eat out dinner later with you, and then probably we'll try to sleep."

Probably few of the readers have even realized even to us that general of most of the inhabitants of the civilian camps, their Civil allies and of the Christian generals. This was especially so in portions of the camp held by general Johnstonia Hanley where hiscarries were like the "devil as a roaring lion going about eating whom he may devour."

Toward the end of the afternoon when we were on board the raft, all different shots during the scramble girl and boyscouts found themselves unconsciously fired on, and as the morning advanced one of the girlscouts whose name was only known as Alice, was shot underbarmly wounded and quickly began to drop, and the other world, she at first was determined not to tell it to any of the others, whose lives with the home of their adventure being a successful outcome now seemed to be a comparatively happy one. Susan herself knew of the outcome and as everybody among the girl and boyscouts had been kind to her, even the highly dis-familied Vivian Girl Progressives, Violet, and her sisters had even called her, and even Gertrude Ameline and the late Gertrude Ameline's friend Anselma Riches, whom she then once admitted that Susan was as good as any of the others any day, Jack himself had promised to be Susan's teacher during the time before her initiation into the scout force intending with the time thus earned in her military education to bring her brothers back to the United States and to become a good mother to the rest of them of them. Even during the course of Susan's instruction, nationalistic telegraphic notes had come to Susan which told that John Richey was coming back to

[illegible]

"No," said she to herself, "I cannot tell me one. We will all have yours enough to sate by and by, but I'll double my diligence and search for more now."

31. "What if the climate women would steal non-verbally to the room of the rapidly dying, child scout and bending over the little dying figure on either side, could we the child scout for her face and whisper in the unresponsive child's ear promises of love for the many other murdered children waiting for her in heavens. A love she others could no longer be delivered and at half past eleven when Alicia Alice lay sleeping on the bed Susan said to the doctor who attended her: "Doctor, wasn't Ail Alice growing worse? She do n't, even now."

The doctor laid his hand on Susan's head and replied:

"Poor child she'll soon be gone."

When then was forced to acknowledge this sad news to the mother, she no longer was so quiet, she suddenly much of her, before of them nervously clasped her hands upon her heart, as if the shock had entered there, and she sat down upon her bed and turning her face in the pillow sat there for a long time. But she said nothing, and she carelessly observed might have thought she cared nothing, as it became well known was so violent that she should count on a long rest. She knew not the long nights she when vainly wearing love she had set in her sister's candle is meant to her name and crying, and not the one I have her never a moment in this world. And all this time there had come no kind of word from her other sister who was a sup- first girl, her name was Ella. All of course knew not that. All of course her really wounded and lay dying. Oh, if she was not so far away and could only see and see her! thought Susan to herself for she was so sorry for the only remaining girl. "It could not be any half so bad."

Sheen thought of the idea to have her telephoned to for that many bring her back early. The young girl's older sister had no thought of this before, and now that she had found her writing book, and taking her p fountain pen she wrote hurriedly:

"Dr. Pitt: Jane won't let me see the chance to come and see our little sister Alice before she dies! I may or I may not, and you would love her better now than I could see how phase and faithful she looks. Oh, do get the General to let some General General in an Adventure, will let you see if Miss Sanders she is changing a new General."

[illegible]

they had the advantage, and not at Jack's suggestion, they faced about, deciding to push forward anyhow. A muttered exclamation came from Jean's lips.

"My boys, this big hill top could be won day or night for fifty miles. It's eight thousand feet high. We'd be hours reaching the top where that light was."

"We're going up anyway," declared Madcliffe. However her words were thrown away for even in that starless and moonless smoky night it was apparent that such was the case. The winding road, up which the girls disappeared, Gertrude Angelina and her own followers going to the aid of violet, and her sisters in their fight with the Glandelinian soldiers, was commanded for a long distance by this outlying forested hill on which the big signal station had been erected by the Glandelinian engineers. Also the other two of hills shadowy and heavily forested, and bulging black and forboding in the darkness stretched ahead on either side, and the road lay between.

"Courage!" said Penrod "our arrival and landing I believe had been watched" and he said this with conviction. Then too when violet, and her sisters set out with a Regiment of boy scouts, added by a force of men, that Glandelinian spy signaled from there by means of some light either a lantern or a electric blue bulb or maybe a signal came on, a fire, and so the Glandelinian in this neighborhood were informed and forewarned. Maybe that is the reason we are so frequently being fired on from different localities. Did you ever notice the rifle fire continues steadily but always shifts position. Sometimes don't any of you hesitate when we see a flash, fire in return and try to hit the mark?"

"Yes," said Madcliffe suddenly "and say—" "Madcliffe as we all know from first being acquainted with "him" did not often speak, but when he did he was times would say a lot, and it was always to the point. Violet, and her sisters called him the brains of the army. The two boys, and Jean looked at him.

"What is it you was going to say?" "Asked Jean. "What that child slave Markwick? I'll bet he's in on it. He's not a child slave for he's a thorn that does not deceive me."

"How do you know?" "Why I am well acquainted with Glandelinian boy scouts of all sorts, and they don't know me. Robert Markwick is well known to Leslie's one of the slickest Glandelinian boy scouts in the army. He was in charge of those slaves. He's leading Gertrude's force into a trap. I'll bet anything on it. I believe you've guessed it Madcliffe," said Jack his low voice taking on increased excitement. "Remember how he looked?" "Looked like a devil in human form to me," granted Madcliffe. "What do you mean?"

"On a hind of sky too in his eye, and something else in his voice too. He was too anxious to start in the expedition or lead the way. I tell you now that Madcliffe had suggested it, I believe that disguised enemy boy scout was planning to play the trick and lead Gertrude Angelina into an ambush. For several minutes or more all four crouched there beside the rocks thinking while their escorts waited. And indeed their thoughts were anything but pleasant. And too they realized their big party was split. Violet, and her sisters with one force was somewhere further inland engaged with the Glandelinian soldiers, and besides too it was evident from the firing that had recently heard the Princess had encountered a very large force, and were hard pressed. The firing had certainly grown more and more distant until it could no longer be heard, and that seemed to indicate that they were either being killed or were being driven back.

Then there was Angelina Gronburg with the second force. And too if their expectations were correct, the Glandelinians had been informed by one of the signal from the distant signal plant on top of the hill that attempts were made to capture and destroy the main plant, and Robert Markwick, however instead of being really a child slave was a disguised Glandelinian boy scout, and was leading Gertrude and her force into a trap, and then again for some reason Penrod's party was being either misled by some one on foot or fired on by friends by mistake.

"What could they do? To forge ahead would mean loss of life. What could they do? Indeed that was the question in each mind, and instinctively as always in a crisis, the others turned to Penrod....

"First of all," said Penrod, "we have to in spite of the resistance we are meeting, get to find who is in that signal station, and capture him. If an enemy soldier of course we'll show no quarter. If it's a boy scout of the enemy we'll see him as a prisoner. It won't do to have an enemy in the rear."

"What if there is more than one," objected Jack. "It couldn't be possible," said Madcliffe. "One man to spy could be so efficient, as well as to give a signal, more could be even to the enemy despite his big numbers, a sheer waste of men."

"All right then we'll go," said Madcliffe. Then act on was suggested, he above all others was ready for it. Jack considered.

"Listen everyone, with either hidden enemies firing on us, or friends shooting at us, asking us for enemies on their rear, we want to be absolutely careful and not run unnecessary risks for even ourselves nor the soldiers. Too we might meet a fire from the station. Of course it's only just a little box house of a station and not the main one we're searching for, and it seems to have only one window in this end nearest us a small door there in front, and probably a window at the other end. But the building might be loop hold life hooin in a swish chase. Of course I believe that window is too small for a man to escape through don't you?"

The two other boys and Jean agreed. Jean however said they may be big enough for only pigeons, and only that. "Well see what you think of my plan. We'll try to get in past those who are firing on us, and when we get up the hill we'll creep up to the door, have our men who can crouch to each side of it, then fling something at the door and call on whoever is within to come out and surrender immediately if he wishes to receive a quarter."

The three boys considered. "Sounds all right to me in one way," said Penrod. "But suppose he's a Glandelinian soldier. We're not allowed to give quarter you know. The enemy won't give us quarter you know."

"Why not break in," grumbled Madcliffe. "Give quarter to neither." Jean shook her head. "I don't know about the quarter part but it's best to be cautious" she said.

"All right," said Penrod. "Let's go." "Gladly and with infinite care as we as not to dislodge loose stones and set them rolling down the hillside or to make any betraying sound to those who had been occasionally firing on them, the boys and the girl whistled to the men behind who crept to their chosen positions, and finally after difficult work were up the hill without any mishap and a number of volunteers were surrounding the station while Jack and Penrod placed them selves on one side of the door, and Jack and Jean on the other. They held their revolvers at a readiness. There was not a sound from within. Was their presence known or suspected or did the signal man leave before they got up? Jack leaned forward with and with a stone struck the door and cried: "Come out in the name of Abbiennia and surrender. Your signal light was seen from the raft, harbor and by us on land and the station is surrounded by a troop of men. If you even open fire you won't receive mercy and escape is utterly impossible."

For two minutes there was silence, and the hearts of the boy scouts beat so strongly from excitement it seemed to them the very sound must be heard in that tense stillness. Then they heard the sound of footsteps within and the door opened slowly outward.

"I surrender," said a voice. Don't shoot yet. A small slender form of a boy scout of some kind appeared in the doorway, hands upraised. Penrod shot the rays of his flashlight full upon the figure. He was surprised. A boy scout dressed in American clothes appeared. He was wearing spectacles and he was freckled faced. He looked decidedly foreign and the Christian scouts couldn't tell whether the lad was an American or an Englishman or a Glandelinian with same features.

"Who are you?" demanded Jean herself. "I'm a boy scout." "Glandelinian?" "Yes sir." "Can you speak English?" "No."

"Where did you get the clothes?" "Took them from an American child slave." "Are you alone?" demanded Jack. "Yes sir." "Armed?" "Yes sir." "Advance and be searched."

"Right?" "No questions. Advanced and be "SEARCHED." The youth instantly stepped across the low sill of the station and stood still. Penrod searched him and he ran his hands over the store room, to find from him the pistols, and a long knife. "In that all the weapons you got?" "Yes."

"You, sir." Penrod spun the Glandelinian boy scout around, pulled out his belt, and tied his hands together with it. "Peep an eye on him," said Jack. "I'm going to search the station." He first cut the rays of his flashlight through the interior and verified the statement of the boy scout that he was alone, and then went inside to see more closely what he could find.

 Penrod, Maccliff and Penrod and others heard him exclaim and then he appeared in the doorway leaving a heavy silence. "A full equipment for a telegraphic station by wireless and some kind for field work. This seems to be the last equipment I've given it a most examination and everything is intact."

"What'll we do with it?" asked Penrod.

"I sure don't know yet but I'll bet it'll come in good for us yet. Well now I guess we had better go down to the raft and tell those on board what we have discovered and what we even suspect. Then we can talk to our prisoner too."

The latter's face was impassive. The glandelinian boy scout seemed to be an educated spy and by the choice of words he had employed it was hoped he could be made to confess something. Anyhow it was worth trying.

"All right," said Penrod. "Two of you men watch our prisoner, and we'll lead Jack a hand with this telegraphic outfit as it's too heavy for him to carry far alone."

"Good heavens—and great guns and little fishes, now that we have at last reached the bottom. I don't even see now we made it with this, and they too we had not been fired on."

Maccliff put down his end of the rope hatchel containing the telegraphic outfit, and Jack followed suit.

"This thing must weigh nearly one hundred pounds," said Maccliff.

"I believe the batteries are the heaviest," said Jack. "The poles themselves weigh very little and the coil contains not much more than a pound of wire. But there are eight batteries of twenty three and one half volts each and I believe they weigh about seven pounds apiece."

"I do not see what is the use of the coiled contraction anyhow," grumbled Maccliff. "Here can we use it. Glandelinian telegraphic stations are different from ours."

"Oh somehow. I'm sure it'll come in handy before we're through. Come on," Maccliff lifted up therefore his end of the huge hatchel, Jack did the same and the journey resumed. Indeed they had reached the base of the hill and were at the rear of the big warehouses. They then skirted this, without any one opening fire as usual, and had gone several yards when they were halted by a sharp challenge as they reached the front and stepped into the glare of the searchlight from the raft.

"All right," said Penrod. "Now we've got a Glandelinian boy scout whom we have made our prisoner."

The young man doing sentry duty in front of the building which formerly had housed the rescued child slaves, regarded them curiously as the three made their way out the pier toward the raft. The one whom was left in charge of the raft with two hundred and fifty men and all the rest of the boy and girl scouts, felt his responsibility and was at that moment on watch on the raft. He hailed them as they approached, then leaped to the pier. The boy scout, however, Jack and Maccliff at down their heavy burden, and then as briefly as possible Jack related their experience.

"So you did the signalling," said the officer sharply, turning to the young Glandelinian boy scout, whom the three boy scouts had taken prisoner. "And you're a foreigner too, an American?"

"He says he isn't but a Glandelinian," said Maccliff. "He stole those clothes he has on. Jack found that inside the signal station he had a powerful electric light bulb hung in the smaller window. It could be seen a long distance up the trail."

"I'm no American," said the boy scout curtly. "I'd hate to be one as well as a old Christian dog as they're the same."

"It's a good thing you're not an American as they're too good a people and you'd been a disgrace to them if you were one and sided with the enemy cause," said Penrod. "Besides if you want a good taste of this (he showed a doubled fist) call us a Christian dog again."

"Who were you signalling for?" demanded Maccliff.

"I do not now," said the boy (it could be a miracle of Glandelinians didn't tell one lie). "I was doing it for fun."

"Oh come now stupid," said Jean. "We now better than that. You Glandelinian would die rather than ref. ain from lies. You're lying anyhow. You would not signal for nothing."

"The Glandelinian boy scout shrugged. He looked defiant."

"You Nations may have it your own way if you choose," he said.

"But I won't tell any of you a thing if you were to burn me with molten iron," Penrod was exasperated. He made a fierce threatening gesture, but Jean laid a warning hand on his arm.

"All right," said Penrod in a surly tone. "I know it wouldn't do to hit him anyhow. And besides its against regulations. Wait a minute you other fellows till I turn him over to some aboard the raft."

Grabbing the Glandelinian boy scout by an arm he forced him along to the rail of the raft, where a sailor who had been an interested observer to went on forward was leaning. Returning Penrod said to the others:

"Now what is to be done?"

71
 Everybody respected and loved Penrod, and he respected the others of his friends because of their good qualities and quick thinking and courage in the greatest emergencies and he therefore also deferred to them. All four looked at each other in silence. It was a ticklish situation for even the best man. Finally Penrod turned to the man who was left in charge of the raft.

"The Vivian girls advised you not to leave the boat didn't she?"

"No. Sister Penrod, Miss Aronburg told me not to leave the raft."

"I see. It probably then would be foolish for all of us to go chasing off up that long trail without knowing the way any more than we do anyhow," said Jack.

"Look here, every one of you fellows," said Maccliff "to the soldiers on the pier. What's the matter with not taking the chances of going scouting up the trail led by the four of us. We all understand there is plenty of unseen dangers ahead, and have a pretty good idea of what it is, how great and so on, and so we ought to be able to guard against it. If you wish every one of you who have a supply may bring along with him as many land grenades as it is safe to carry. Three hundred of you men could easily make a fully reinforcement in case we find our two other parties hard pressed by the Glandelinians. But that signal station must be captured and destroyed. We can fire these barracks and the flames will make us plenty of light to find our way back."

"Yes, but as its exceedingly dangerous," the hundred men more would bring better results," said the one left in charge of the raft. "If there was only some way you could send back word, in case you find the two other parties bottled up, I could bring up the men outfit left on board here. There was no orders issued against that."

"Well I could run back," said Jack.

"No. He's some good speedy ostrich too," Penrod assured the young soldier. "You ought to see him in our running drills. He can run longer than all the soldiers even."

"Yes but suppose you get eight or ten miles inland," objected the captain. "You couldn't be back here in her an hour and a half and it would be more than double the time before we could get there with the help."

Maccliff himself looked thoughtful. Then he violently kicked against the side of the big hatchel at their feet.

"If this confounded outfit here were not so doggone heavy," he growled. "We might carry it with us and give you a call when we discover anything."

"I have it!" cried Jack delightedly. "The very thing indeed."

"What?" asked the man whose name was Bastonia.

"Why we can take that telegraphic outfit without any trouble at all. There's a stream of some kind running into this cove. We can set the outfit in a sort of reboat and go upstream that way. The trail I discovered is parallel to the stream. The soldiers can follow us on the trail and besides we stand a far better chance to proceed unobserved, for the enemy would be watching the trail, and not the stream."

"I do not like the idea," said Jean.

"Why not?" said Jack. "It sure is a good idea to me. What do you think, Penrod?"

"Well I'll try anything one time," she added.

"I'll right so. Good to me," said Captain Watson. "That is if you boys want to try it. Here use that big boat there, tied to the pier."

"Let's rig her up," said Penrod.

They reached the boat, and there was some one in it and he started to make his way away.

"Come back with that boat," shouted Penrod.

"Go to hell," came back the answer.

"You'll go there yourself smartly. So said Jean. "Halt with that boat or I'll have the raft run you to pieces."

This threat had its effect and the man rowed back to the landing. They took possession of the boat, the man was taken prisoner for his attempt to get away, and more so for his abusive language and then everybody worked desperately and enthusiastically and the telegraphic outfit was quickly in place, except for the aerial.

"There doesn't seem to be sufficient stretch for the telegraphic aerial," said Jean. "But just the same if we do get the chance to use the telegraph to call you sir, we can string the wire to some trees in no time at all, fix our connections, and be all set. I could say this would send about as far as the most distant city in the world, an outfit of this kind."

Penrod was stirring, and Jack and Maccliff at the oars. The boat shot away up the stream and almost immediately disappeared out of sight, so farward they was the night. The small aerial came from the distant forest first but they saw no glare in the air now. Watson listened intently, but the boat on the cars soon died down.

bursting out of the hull, around the sharp turn leading to the cove, they came upon a wild scene. The child slaves who had been brought on the raft were screaming in terror, and a full regiment of more of Glandelinians were striving fiercely and desperately to board the raft, and were being resisted just as desperately as they were assaulting, and the sounds of their devil yells, the shrieks of the child slaves, the crash of many muskets, the explosions of grenades thrown by those on the raft, and of the blows the Glandelinians themselves rained daily upon the sides of the cabin with sling shots came clear to their ears.

The girlscoouts in the lead of the oncoming party suddenly opened fire, then all the following soldiers opened with their rifles and the search light from the raft playing over the scene brought out every assaulting Glandelinian in very sharp relief, and they therefore were terribly exposed and more than half their number fell dead or wounded before they could reach the raft. The survivors realized that had happened.

They tried to resist however as for some reason or other the light went out but it came on again and the soldiers then leaped to the pier and tore down upon the Glandelinians, for a minute there was a desperate hand to hand fight in which the Christian soldiers though bigger in number got the worst of it, but then those on the raft also joined in, and the force following after Violet and her sisters came up to the scene, and these Glandelinians were surrounded and cut down to a man. Then the light was swung away and brought to bear upon the trawler. A Glandelinian officer appeared on deck followed by a swarm of Glandelinians and they opened fire upon those below. Gertrude was hit in the foot, and six boys were killed among the scouts, and ten scores of soldiers fell at once time. At first there was confusion, but despite her wound Gertrude ran rapidly and reached the pier with a full force of troops at her heels. She dashed out to the raft and leaped aboard just as a bullet cut away her yellow hair ribbon and another splined her hand, and six men fell near her.

More Glandelinians must have gotten down here," explained the raft guardian to Gertrude. "Look some of the Glandelinians being worsted are making a bid for us thinking I suppose to divert us. The attack would have come sooner upon the raft if I hadn't had some telegraphic warning but for the first two times we held them off. meantime the rest of their outfit must have swam to the trawler planning to get her adrift I guess. I also heard something that made me suspicious and put the light on them as you see, and here you are."

"Good enough," approved Gertrude hastily removing her shoe and tying a handkerchief around her head. Then advancing to the other side of the raft she called to the Glandelinians on board the raft to surrender.

"If you resist further," she called, "I'll train machine guns on your force there. Better surrender or we'll not give you quarter."

With a curse of rage and anstering "Go to perdition" the Glandelinian raised his rifle and fired. Gertrude leaped hastily aside as the bullet struck the deck at her feet. A shot ran out from the raft. The rifle spun from this officers hands and he jumped up and down grasping the stunned wrist in the other hand. The other Glandelinians had by this time disappeared.

"Who did that?" queried Gertrude.

"I did Gertrude," said Jack. "I meant to bring him down but I merely shot his weapon away."

"Very good shot," approved Gertrude, while the others a n near by also murmured approval.

"Listen captain aboard that Trawler a dozen machine guns is trained on your deck and you and your followers cannot escape," Gertrude continued.

"Our men are all ashore, you are surrounded and you and your followers cannot escape by swimming. Give up the fight, and call your men on deck to surrender and we'll give you quarter on one condition. If you refuse you'll be massacred. A strong boarding party is coming aboard under heavy fire if you refuse to listen to reason."

This Glandelinian officer realized the suicidal futility of further resistance, and when Gertrude Angeline herself mind you, and overtire hundred men gained the deck of the trawler the foe officer had his staff and all the men in surrender line on deck with ammunition piled on a table and rifles stacked.

At the sight of the boy and girlscoouts who had followed the foe officer came and implored mercy.

"You little girlscoouts are the cause of all Glandelinian troubles in this confounded war," he said. "I'm surprised that you're seeking Gertrude, don't leave me to the mercy of your own girl and boy scouts seeing they don't give us quarter."

"We don't give quarter during a fight," answered Gertrude. "Surrender and you are safe, but no more lip out of you about my followers. The cause of their country is far more sacred than your cause and you know it."

Gertrude then approached the boy and girlscoouts and of course addressed her also, and sister, the two boy scout leaders and crew.

"Look here," she said kindly. "All of you have had a pretty good time of it. It's a warm night, and I'm going to keep all the foe prisoners aboard the raft under close guard. As you boys and girl scouts object to turning in on the trawler."

"Not at all," said Jack. "We slept there before you know."

"Yes, and so did I and Violet, and her sisters. That is why I propose it now. Well if you want to turn in now, I've got the boats ready to lift you over."

"Not at all," said Jack. "We slept there before you know."

"Yes, and so did I and Violet, and her sisters. That is why I propose it now. Well if you want to turn in now, I've got the boats ready to lift you over."

"Neither are we," said the youths.

And merely kicking off their shoe shoes they tumbled over on their backs and almost immediately fell asleep. Violet, and her sister, also without undressing followed suit, but didn't even remove their shoes.

By the following morning General Greathart who had suffered the slightest consequence from a small round returned to his command. The very next morning while he was dining a certain section of his army suffered from a slight attack which though lasting quite through the day was not severe and there was more firing than readily any infantry assaults or artillery duels and the Christian commanders by means of throwing in fresh troops, and the use of a number of machine guns had no difficulty in throwing off these slight attacks. This day because of their strenuous night the boy and girl scouts slept through and as the petty conflicts were only a mere trifle even though continuing through the day, they made not enough noise to wake them. On the following morning September the Fifth at about nine o'clock General Greathart's position suffered from such a severe attack that the officials sent quick demands for help. Troops were sent in to his aid but for a time the Glandelinians were totally victorious and drove all before them that a fearful sight. The Glandelinians were yelling and attacking with a fury as only the damned in hell could assault and yell, however all the Christian officers were aware of all that too place, even answering questions of others, sending in troops and artillery where most needed and throwing cavalry to the support. At first the extreme violence of this drive upon Great hearts army puzzled General Plain right Linger greatly but soon it became clear that the Glandelinian General Shoemanna who delivered this assault was up to some sort of scheme for the columns in gray were moving as it seemed on two fronts. All troops available at this spot were put in action but General Plain right Linger noticed no effect. He sent a courier to General Linger to warn of the danger and threw the last reserve of his left wing under General Oliver Barbucks into the fray. Barbucks was wounded early and two of his assistants killed and his army driven back.

General Linger went in person then to report the case to General Linger, and when he returned, he noticed that the whole Christian line in the action were recoiling, while General Andrew Gump was making all his best efforts to hold the Glandelinians back. Plain brought up his machine gun batteries from the center and opened a terrific fire that drove the enemy down in numbers as thick as flowers in a field. A counter charge was then ordered and it had not even started under way when the enemy recoiled and retreated hastily toward their own position.

This conflict of course was not very long in duration but very severe and violent and the losses for both sides were great. General Watson came up with his flank the enemy had recoiled from the Christian front but the firing for a long time did not stop. General Plain right Linger felt actually as if he wished to go through into the round he was so dumb-founded, and the fight so fierce, what stupendous power faithful prayer must have to accomplish such a feat against a raging hellish assault as that had this continued in surer throughout the whole day in this style it could have turned out one of the fiercest battles of the war so far.

But by ten o'clock the firing had slackened and stopped altogether and then later General Plain went to see General Watson and asked him how he was getting on and found his hands were not relaxed. The general was so tired that the situation of that conflict and the fact and not even the slightest other optical about the fighting of the enemy in this fight, for he had spent his last night in long that the general felt truly and completely exhausted. He was in control of the Glandelinian situation and was in a state of mind without a doubt to drive the Glandelinians from the territory, however nothing further of consequence happened that day except that continually there was a slight firing.

"How far does the flood extend south from this point?" asked Susan, casting apprehensive glances toward where it extended far toward the northwesterly direction, and the once graceful trees that rose half way standing out of the water if as if the flood was some great impersonation of the great American crabs or the big, leaf-foot lily.

"I couldn't tell how far it does extend back from here," said the boy, "but here we are at the little old lady's—this house right here." And the boy about pointed to a neat, handsome cottage almost hidden from view by some dense pine foliage which enclosed it, and within easy sight but some great distance away to the west lay an immense gray tented encampment which was understood to be the army's left wing of the foe army... There was a long lawn in front of the cottage, and into it a carriage road on the right of it turned, and down this and into the arched yards the two of them rode, and then reaching the front door the boy said to Susan, "Come jump down now, and I'll help you dismount." Then as he did so he called loudly:

"Hello, Marie, come here."

In answer to his call a well formed pleasant faced woman appeared in the doorway, and as if fresh from the regions of cockdom wiped the drops of sweat from her round jolly face.

"Here, Marie," said the boy, "show this little orphan girl the way in will you? It's against the law for me to go too close."

Marie complied, and then after saluting Mary and telling her he'd come again in a few days to bring her back the boy rode away, leaving Susan standing by the entrance door.

"Come in, little girl," said Marie, pushing a chair toward Susan. "It's not so hot in here as it's outside, it's more like an oven outside. I have already made some cranberry sauce and gingerbread, and if you're hungry you may have some later, but sit down and make yourself at home."

Susan took the proffered seat and then the cook left the room for a few minutes, saying then she returned that the lady of the house was not yet home, and that it was probable she wouldn't come home until a little before or after dinner. "And continued in Marie," she told me to entertain you until she returned but as you are only an orphan girl and not a scout yet, I don't know what I am allowed to say or do first. I have to be careful as patrols of Abbelesians stop here often, and this is the first time for years I have ever had a little girl to talk to. Can't you think of something to say, your experiences with the scouts and your adventures? What have you been used to doing when with the boy and girls scouts?"

"Scouting, until a few days ago," said Susan, "and making sure that on this occasion studying the appearances of the room, and making sure that on this occasion there were no Abbelesian patrols about for she feared some of the soldiers would recognize her as the Abbelesian government had placed a big reward for her destruction because she 'knew too much' about the Abbelesian explosion disasters."

"Well," answered Marie, "I guess you would have to meet with any hero, because I know all your secrets, they'd give anything to secure you, and therefore if I heard any coming there are secret places in this building where I could hide you until they're gone. One night when some of the enemy soldiers were in I heard them tell their officer that many of the government officials of Abbelesia are searching for you as you have some secret of Abbelesian that is exceedingly dangerous to the Abbelesian nation if you ever happen to let it out, and then he said something about you not having an equal chance for life if you were ever seen. Your parents were killed because of the same reason were they not?"

Susan replied in the negative, and Marie continued, "Well, now you have got over the first of the horror I reckon you'll be glad when you are a girl scout for you can pay up to the enemy some how or other for your loss."

However Susan's two thoughts flew back to the joyful time her parents had been alive and covering her face with her hands she sobbed.

"Oh, a papa and mama I wish they had not died."

Marie looked on in blank amazement indeed, and for want of something better to do placed a fresh coal into the stove muttering to herself:

"How I never saw thought I didn't know what to say, well, why did I bring up that substance. What a pity that Abbelesian of thousands live her in the same house, I'll give her that big piece of cake the minute she comes in. If I don't."

Accordingly, when the big Abbelesian came Marie therefore placed it in her hands, and she took it quickly and then she saw the nice round face of the woman had changed for her.

"If you please," said Susan rapidly, "lifting the hot cake from one hand to the other," "If you please," said Susan rapidly, "lifting the hot cake from one hand to the other," "If you please," said Susan rapidly, "lifting the hot cake from one hand to the other."

"To my come, then," said Marie, and leading the way she conducted Susan up the staircase, and through a light airy hall to the door of a small but comfortable chamber which she opened saying, "Look isn't it beautiful?"

However Susan's heart was too full to say even a word, and for several minutes she remained standing there and very silent, with the exception of Gertie, an Abbelesian pleasant parlor in her own headquarters at times Susan had never before seen anything which was so cozy and cheerful as that little room, with its simple bed, snowy counterpane, muslin curtains, clean waiting convenient toilet table and what to her was fairer than every other thing, upon the mantle piece there stood two small vases filled with sweet will flowers whose fragrant filled the apartment with delicious perfume and filled some of the empty and small coming from the outside. All this was so unusual that Susan shook lest it should prove a dream from which she would awaken from too soon.

"Oh I wish this was Gertie's headquarters," was her mental exclamation and as some of the readers may wonder why this little old lady is I may have to explain to them that Miss Marie Mason was one of those who was always doing her best to help the Christian cause in any way possible. The reason she chose an orphan for the war seemed singular and yet that too can be the main explanation. At the time or years before the war opened, she too had been a lonely runaway child slave, hiding and weeping everywhere she goes as often, since as Susan had wept then a fugitive, and though the lady really was not old but only twenty years old she did that is a disguise of her hair and yet it was the memory of those sad gloomy hours, which so warned her.

"And toward this little girl she had taken under her charge to bring her through the last test as she could become a girl scout. In fact Miss Mason was an instructor for various camp fire girls. No one of course knew anything of her history, and never knew her parents, was a slave since a baby, and then when she grew up to twenty she had been married, but her noble husband died in the war, and the day following his burial her fortune was gone, also because of the enemy. One by one as misfortune came upon her, did she lose many of her best friends and relatives, until she was left alone, bitter at heart against the foe and with none to lean upon except The God of the widow and the fatherless, and in him she found a strong help for her dark hours of need. Bravely however she withstood the storm and low losing hope and all in the flood retired with the small portion of her fortune to this obscure neighborhood where she did already lots of harm to the enemy. She had taken a particular fancy to all child scouts, and also of Susan, and in giving her a chance to pull through her test had she had thought more of the good she could do the child than of any benefit she would receive in return. She had fully intended to go for Susan herself but she had been called away on some important mission, and it was not until three in the afternoon that she returned, and was then able to see her. Then calling Marie she had her bring the little girl into her room, and leave them alone. Marie obeyed, charging Susan to be very polite and tread on tiptoe, and be as still as a mouse for Miss Marie Mason was very strict and did not like the slightest noise... However for Susan in this caution was not necessary for the little orphan girl had been so much accustomed to cold and wounded and sick soldiers and the life that she always knew what to exactly do, and also when to do it and therefore her step was so light, and also her voice was so low and sweet that the lady of the house involuntarily drew her to her bosom and kissing her said she'd give anything if she was her own child, and if she was not going to be a girl scout she would not wish her to never leave her, then, laying down on the long lounge for she was resting herself after a hard trip, she remained perfectly still, while Susan alternately sat down beside her and then the lady being very tired fell into a quiet slumber from which she did not awaken until it sounded the bell for supper which was neatly and promptly prepared in the dining parlor opening into a large flower garden.

To Susan there was something so very social and also very cheerful in the appearance of the dining room, and the arrangement of the table with its glossy white cloth and dishes of the same hue that it reminded Susan of her own mother's home and she felt like weeping as she did on the night of her loss. But the lady seemed to know exactly how to entertain her, and by the time the meal was half over there was hardly a happier child in the world than was Susan. As soon as the evening Supper prayers were said and Miss Mason arose from the table, she took Susan up and taking hold of the dishes removed them to the kitchen in a much shorter space of time than Marie had ever accomplished. "What are you doing little girl?" said that lady as she saw Susan starting to wash the cups and saucers. "You don't have to wash them it's my work. You need a rest."

Accordingly, she returned to Miss Mason, who wished to retire early, and therefore did not then wish to tell of the mission she had for the child and therefore dismissed her to her own room, where she for some hours tried to amuse herself with watching great rolls of rolls of clouds from so far in the distance, she saw the far off fire glow and turned her eyes in that direction. That she would give if there were stars to be seen in the evening skies. But this night there shone nothing but fire glares and the smoke clouds were all colored by it to red and pink. Involuntarily stretching her hand she cried: "Oh Mother and father, brothers and sisters, I wish I could be as happy as you are now! And to the child's imagination shapes seemed to form in the smoke clouds and smile benignly upon her, while the evening wind as it roughly moved the boughs of the tall pine trees seemed nevertheless like the rustle of angels' wings. Indeed who shall say that the spirit of her parents and brothers and sisters were not there, to rejoice with guests over the glad strange future opening so brightly and wonderfully before her?"

Hardly had the same morning started for a same trip that general Plain Nightlinger wasn't called to help Grathert again. The same style of Glandolinian assaults, the same terrible results, the same great loss of life and all the symptoms of a conflict. When general Plain Nightlinger brought up a portion of his own army this time general Lautlein cried:

"Bring me a machine gun battery and I'm sure all will be well." Plain Nightlinger did so and the Glandolinians were repulsed with unusual loss. All that afternoon the Christian line everywhere then was quiet, and two o'clock came and nothing striking happened. General Plain himself did not understand it or know what to make of it. If the assault does not recur, what was the intention then? That was what general Plain should be asking, what was the intention then? That was what general Plain was saying then. But that very same evening, Plain Nightlinger himself was suddenly struck and driven back with fearful loss twice within two hours, and had an unusually hard time each hour to recover his lost ground but managed to bring his troops into their own position again.

In this sudden squabble general Lautlein was mortally wounded and Grathert received an injury in the foot. While the conflict was on general Plain Nightlinger said to himself before the assault of the foe was repulsed:

"Whatever the cause I'm going to question my generals about this. He approached close to one of the sentries who was directing the defense along his own front and said:

"What Glandolinians are they moving all this trouble, and who are they under?"

The other general answered quietly: "I do not know, sir. They attack like an army of avenging spirits. Along my left they have destroyed one of my brigades, and general Horn no longer is able to hold his ground, and my own no longer is able to even resist the enemy successfully without help."

This then was the gravest danger, that the Glandolinians had swept this portion of the Christian position of all evidence of Christian soldiery and help. Therefore was needed badly. Then general Plain said:

"General Grathert, there is your reserve!"

"I have no reserves. Then he said something peculiar. How is it that formerly that we could get any advantage of the Glandolinians and now we can not? I heard rumors that somewhere in engaging battles at Stark creek General Grathert was defeated with half his force destroyed."

"This was impressive to have this Christian general admitting that though the armies were formerly able to throw back the enemy they had no longer the power to do so since the great war disaster had stopped the movement of the armies greatly needed. General Plain Nightlinger said:

"This is such a fine situation indeed. With the help of God and His blessed mother I'm going to expel the enemy from this locality."

At this time the Glandolinian assault had become more severe and the devil yell of the devils more intense. The fury of the assaults increased greatly as Plain Nightlinger put into action more troops, and it was some time before the enemy could be repulsed. After dark general Plain called to the assistance of general Charles Brown. With artillery and a good strong battery of machine guns the enemy was repulsed there also and the rest of the army was quiet that night while those who could stay, up storm heaven to obtain more better results in the case these frequent petty assaults over later turned out to be a general conflict which finally is the case.

The following day there was a gathering of officers wearing gray uniforms at Miss Hudson's. This gathering to hide its true nature had the appearance of a tea party, and appeared also more as if it was a sort of pleasant visit for by their noon every guest had arrived, and the south room was filled with officers whose tongues like their hands were in full play. These officers brought with them large old fashioned fashioned geographic, while another apologized for the singularity of his book, saying that it was important he should have it as when he found Miss Hudson was not to be there he had just thought of bringing it along. In spite of her pretending to be crazy before the Glandolinians Miss Hudson was regarded by the Glandolinians as something suspicious and this suspicion to her immediately turned the very conversation in that direction.

"How that do you know?" said an officer by the name of Miss Perkins, vigorously rubbing his snuff box and passing it around. "I wonder if it is true that that old lady has found some orphan girl whom they say was going to be a Christian girl scout in the army?"

On being assured that such was the fact he continued: "How indeed I will not be the first one to give it up. Picked as she is for things, what could have possessed that insane woman to do that? Why General Hanley would give a fortune for the destruction of that little girl dead or alive. What she learned from her father of the Abbeism disaster is plenty believe me. And think of it the little type has the nerve to come here so close to the Glandolinian camps."

"I was not aware that she thought of bringing such dangers upon herself for bringing the girl there," said Colonel Knight, whose way of thinking and manner of expressing himself were entirely unlike general Perkins.

"Well she is in peril if she doesn't watch herself," was general Perkins' reply, and then turning his chair closer to the group of officers near him and speaking in a whisper, he added: "You know of you mustn't speak of it in any account for I would not have it to be known. I said something but Colonel Hann was over there the other day and neither that Mrs. Eddie Mason and her housekeeper was home. Colonel Hann has a slight of suspicion. I don't know nothing under the sun where he gets suspicious of her for I'm not—but as I was telling you there was no one home and Colonel Hann got into the house by slipping down into the cellar, and went through the house examining every paper she has written on, and as true as you live, there wasn't a sign that could prove she was ever giving any secret aid to the Christian dogs. Now then nothing can be proved then I said that Colonel Hann was an meddling old fool."

And general Perkins finished his speech with the largest pith of snuff he could possibly hold between his thumb and forefinger. General Perkins said an odd officer who was known for occasionally rubbing the Christians down. That's just as many think. But Colonel Hann probably didn't see close enough. I'll bet she carries something secret about her which no one knows of and then too I'm suspicious because she took to that little orphan girl. She has no intentions of adopting the Christian but brought her for some other purpose. "What is it?" he asked. "I don't know," said the conversation and Perkins with his eyes flashing fire replied: "I suppose its true as you say, Colonel Bates, but how can any of us do anything when we have no evidence and besides her cottage is nearer to the Christian lines than to us and if she realized that she was under suspicion we'd be in for it and not here."

"If she is not making all the trouble who is," whispered a rosy cheeked girl looking off her.

General Perkins however did not notice the interruption but proceeded with his vicious theme. If she is not of course those hands of girl and boy about under that one calling herself Gertrude Angeline has done us plenty but there's something wrong somewhere else not caused by them and if I kept them so carefully on the go I guess my committee would not have come to the first one."

Colonel Perkins here's the point (providing its not sharp) said Colonel Bates dropping his chin up on the table in his seat to explain matters. "You see these Christian boy and girl scouts can hire any one to do some work for them. The further they accomplish the help the longer they'll progress in their progress. I'm even suspicious of that orphan girl herself. I bet she is that queer Carol every Glandolinian sees a reward to kill. Don't you understand it, can't you see the light?"

Captain Knight said: "I'd be glad if we could find out what really transpired in that old lady's house, between her and the little brat."

"So would I," said Colonel Bates. "For we all suspect that the old lady is got as crazy as she pretends to be, and has been taken that little brat for some other purpose than having her as her own, and we should look in into the matter and get the proofs though before we strike."

"They do say," said Colonel Bates. "They do say that general Hanley and his generals are moving a death over throughout the country to try and erase all evidences of the explosions at Abbeism, and really expects to have all those girl and boy scouts dumbounded when he's through."

Colonel Bates himself had fancied himself that general Hanley was up to something queer, and he felt an unusual interest in the danger that the Christian girl and boy scouts was threatening him with. He one replied to his words and he continued: "It really used to make my heart ache to see so many of those confounded Christian girl and boy scouts mixing things up for our armies. I saw in disguise once that one called Angeline Pritchard or Pritchard or whatever her name is printed out like a milliner's show window a pucker and twisting and when she happened to catch my eye and saw I was watching her, she moved she turned up her nose at me and Colonel Bates's small organ went upward in a groove in imitation of the look which he said Angeline Pritchard gave him. "She would have even come up to me and demanded of me why I'm rubbing it her as if I hadn't gone away. It's wicked in me perhaps added Colonel Bates, but the Christian dogs may some day have a fall and I do hope I shall live to see the day when there won't be left a single girl or boy scout to the Christian dog armies."

During this conversation James Ella had remained listening at the keyhole and as the voices grew louder and more earnest too, Susan was able to distinguish what they said. She was too young to understand it fully, but at times that are some human indignities, but she understood the conversation enough to not only wound her deeply but also to realize the peril she and the lady was in. The lady that evening after giving her the details of why she called for her, brought her back through a secret route to the christ ian lines, and when she reached her own room when back to Orthodox Headquarters a little chubby face looked in at the tent door and a voice which went to Susan's heart, exclaimed:

it was Dolores McCallister herself, the captain of girlscoouts, and female Superintendent of boyscoouts, and in a moment the girls were in each others arms.

"I lied it very much," answered Susan. "Is it isn't that however, and then she told what she had overheard, and why the lady brought her to the camp to begin."

Susan was not so sure of it, and then Dolores proceeded to let open her package of news concerning things of the camp, and of the scant adventures of other soldiers. "Daily your friend," said she, "the prediction I made of others being crazy since it is found out you are in our section has been coming true, and planned to send secret soldiers within the Christian Church, they frequent; youtub it is impossible for them to get in, for none of us coming to see you frequently changing counter signs." I told her then she will be ready to take the first step of her litigation. Tell her then that who is safer here, and that we all etc together as comrades.

"I'm indeed so delighted," said Olga "for we need all the help we can to keep the enemy running out. I don't see Dolsire how you want to work through such problems as you girls do - not help from outside or anything, and floods and fire cutting off all communications."

"Oh yes indeed," said Olga with one of her accustomed smiles, "they however are good and well enough but they are not the kind of scouts that we would recognize in your own regiments. At least they don't belong to your set, and besides are not so well educated in their military work as you are." "Speaking to Dolores," she replied;

"But when I come here to see you girls and the boys too" said she (singing in a waltz) "I never seem to know when it is time to leave."

"I don't now but I believe I'll stay for a taste of those delicious looking blackberries I saw your aide-de-camp carry into your tent..."

"let's bring him in. That's his place."
"yes, wh6?"
"let's bring him in. That's his place."

THE boy went out but came in again saying saying:
"Why there is what?"

"Didn't you call her?" demanded police.
"No I only glanced around."

"I didn't now we had a girlsout by the name of Susan" protested the boy. "I--"

The meal went on for a time, and suddenly Olga took up her fork and said "Why this fork has the words 'From Campbell Silverware Company, Abbeville' stamped on it."

"Indeed" said Bob, and she closely examined the silverware and said-

"Indeed" said Joe, and he closely examined the "Silverdale" article. "That flood must have swept in, in its course all articles for which we never can account for. But then I suppose there will be lots of articles as yet unaccounted for even when the flood overtakes us." "Recovered?" asked police and Olga answered herself, "Why didn't you note that the flood demolished nearly every building in every town in its path sweeping everything before it, your general mailer Starling had even received lots of articles already from the flood, and so had his soldiers. He has recovered enough for a large fortune, and it is said that nearly everybody among officers and standing armies are straining every nerve to recover as much as possible. Starling can be found articles of property that belonged to the dead parents of Susan O'Brien there, and as soon as it is possible she can reclaim her property. He says that he is going to make her a great inheritance. He is only waiting for the conclusion papers to come."

There was no reason why given should blush at the mention of Walter. Starting still, however, she did so, while Polores shyly stepped upon her feet. Her position, however, her embarrassment was not observed by any one else, for what did she, a poor orphan girl, know or care what the result of the passing of the flood would be as long as it brought good results for the nation and satisfaction for her loss. She smiled and said she thought it might be possible that any persons will recover lots of things for the remembered right is that the duration of the flood couldn't be over five hours in duration. "It's about that in duration," turned Olga "but it might be longer in days perhaps."

"No Olga," interrupted Jane who was no good in the keeping the track of the duration of the flood "it was about five months and six days." "Really," rejoined Olga, "wouldn't wonder if the enemy didn't have some downright in the cause of the flood himself, for the Glandelinians are so terribly anxious to win the war at any cost."

"Oh yes," returned Olga, "The flood was begun by Manley himself. I'll bet anything on that."

"Polores frowned and turning to Jane said 'it probably can be so but we have no proof against any Glandelinian general and we don't even now yet if the enemy did it or not.'"

"and pray how could general Manley ever be responsible for this?" Olga and Polores replied.

"Why he could be suspected for he's mean enough to do anything. There is something wrong for he wouldn't be here trying to prevent us from discovering the clues, and now he's concentrated before Stomolates you know." "But he's working against us," said Olga, "and I discovered he's going to concentrate stronger, and I heard one of the enemy generals say he deserves a great deal of credit for his efforts, and that Manley his father, and two brothers are the smartest of all."

All the others laughed at this, and Polores wondering why given wasn't saying anything, raised the subject of what articles could be recovered from the flood saying "I think it could make the country glad. For my part I'm perfectly well added to the country's cause, and positively I couldn't be happy again without this disaster having been a thing of the past."

"But Polores," interrupted Olga, "Howard town wasn't injured by the flood nor touched by the explosions, and I don't believe it ever had fun once then we were there didn't you remember the town is on a good high elevation—forgot the name of the hill."

"It's called Howard Hill," said Polores. The supper being over Olga announced her intention of leaving before it was too late. Finally they were on the way. Could Polores and given have listened to their remarks as on a piece of white dust and their horses kept side by side for a mile or more she would have felt simply repaid for the small knowledge of given's peril.

"Dear me," said Olga, "I never could believe that given could be in such dire peril. I whispered into her ear at supper never to get into any out of the way place where Glandelinians are combing the country in their desperate effort to capture her."

"Nor I either," returned Olga, "but I believe she's far safer with those child scouts under Gertrude than anywhere else. I suppose you understand she is a little orphan, her parents being murdered because they were more sojourner or other of the mystery of the explosions at Abbeism and given learned the details from her. Still she is a wise wary sort of a girl and it is well enough and more safer for her to learn to become a scout. Were those not delicious berries Polores gave us. I guess though we must return something to her."

"I suppose," said Olga, "no one expected that given is in such danger as she really is, and I suppose she told me a lot about it." "No," said Olga, "I don't believe she can do any harm within Gertrude's camp. I'd like to see any Glandelinian try it. Those scouts are sure to go into her camp to get given. I'd like to see a fly crawling into a hornet's nest. She's safe enough, so don't worry." "I never knew before that Polores had so much spirit," said Olga. "She really can do wonders, and she'll be given's guardian." "And chided in Olga who was angry at all the Glandelinians for the war horrors, and angry too because the fires and floods could not subside. "Don't you think that some one can prove some day Manley was responsible for all this?"

"It might be possible he was the cause of it all," said Olga. "I wish I was a clever spy I would have tried my best to find at the mystery but so far I'm only an inexperienced jump like girl."

at this spot the road became very narrow, and as the eastern sky showed indication of the "forest fire" hurricane approaching now from the terrific north they decided to ride back to their own camp as soon as possible. Since given and jessed more than two tests very readily and without failure, Violet, and her sister advised Gertrude Angelina to form her plans regarding her. She had always intended doing for her whatever she could, and finding but that that as far as given had been going to school she had received a fairly good education she determined to give her every advantage which lay in her power. "To become as good a girl as any of the best and greatest and have been educated in military, religious and educational ways, and therefore given was to go to school immediately. Accordingly by the morning morning following given was to become a regular attendant at the military school where for a time she will learn her to show the results of the recent expedition for the capture of the signal station. This was simultaneously with given being with the army old lady."

The afternoon of the 10th of September, Gertrude Angelina was beaming on the gathering in her cabin again on the raft. The party also included Violet and her sisters. Angelina, whose duties demanded her attention and was not there. Lady's worth and life's list were left for general Aronburg's army on some very important military mission.

"Well girls and boys! can't tell you how relieved I am at the safe outcome of your adventures," declared Gertrude. "During it all I was worried and feared some of you would suffer a loss. Indeed there is no denying it. When we all went on the expedition through the lands surrounding the cave, everybody within the camp said there would be no danger and that there is charge of the Glandelinian signal station would submit without a fight. But I had a premonition of trouble and believe it or not, when you were expected. Besides she added twirling "I knew that where there is a day's trouble with the enemy a little more is sure to be in it."

"We were all in it indeed," said Olga, "and her sister said it hadn't been for your followers Gertrude, I can easily imagine how matters would have turned out. Knowing you had danger, the Glandelinians kept having isolated in the defenses, called a stand, the enemy though not even this being able to enter, he there might have any, finally captured the big raft anything else might have happened."

"The boys and girls of scouts stirred comfortably under this tales. Violet and her sisters too, would you mind telling us now how you and Gertrude Angelina came to be surrounded in the stockade defense? I asked her to divert the conversation for you and your sisters have been busy for some matters and we haven't heard the story yet and are anxious to hear it."

"Yes," said Olga, "to tell you as we brushed from Santa Cruz this morning but the questioning of the Glandelinian prisoners kept me and my sisters so engaged it was impossible for some of them would not even say a single word, but I was sure they had some valuable information. But it is too bad Frederick Dargat is on the enemy side. If it wasn't for him we'd still been prisoners ourselves."

"He's a pretty good scout even though he is a Glandelinian," said Penrod thoughtfully and he took quite a liking to him, but somehow a boyscout that even approached him to try to hit him with some stones with me."

"Not on this occasion," it shouldn't be said, "I was telegraphing in this case there are more favorable circumstances to turn traitor to Glandelinians cause is indefinable because because its turning traitor against the enemies of God. There are also extenuating circumstances but its too long to explain now at any rate if he even was captured I and my sister's will and would have it right for Dargat."

"It would be a happier circumstance if he leave the Glandelinian army and go over to our own side," said Redcliffe. "He did us a good turn when we were held prisoners aboard the ship and he, Dargat, brought us aboard the ship to get us out of reach of the angry Glandelinian fighters who menaced us immediately after we landed one of the Glandelinian and killing another."

Violet herself then explained for her sisters that after landing from the huge raft into the cave and marching the troops on the north side of Yerona that night she and her sisters had led the remnants of men and the boy and girls who followed through the low mountains. After reaching the headwaters of the little stream they followed down the trail until entering the valley where the position was located. This they had then expected to be used and finding it unoccupied they had proceeded on down the trail. When still some distance from the landing they had encountered an advancing Glandelinian force in very superior numbers and during the fight were worried with some of men and driven back and forced to seek shelter in the defenses.

"That was when we first heard the firing. Then they grew more indistinct as you and your sisters were forced to retreat," said Penrod.

The note had read from the Princesses' availing, then there was too had written that she and her sisters would be, for military reasons, be unable to meet them near the headquarters and conduct them to the entrance, but that they would meet them near General Amonburg's tent.

Later the enemy carried forward their new assault howling terribly with their devil yells, and they rushed across the roads, and into the positions, where they immediately received the fire from all points, and where plain Nightlinger stormed on the rear. That evening, however Christian generals were happy because the enemy had failed again; storm that same night the christian line had it's first nights battle storm. What the gendarmes does not express it. Every general engaged treacherly by the afflicted portions of the christian line, they tried everything for the afflicted portions of the christian line; and depended all artillery storm. They used the formula of courtier charging; and they even laid a carriage to drive the enemy off. The end was just as they saw: And a carriage to drive the enemy off. The end was just as they saw: And a carriage to drive the enemy off. The end was just as they saw: And a carriage to drive the enemy off.

Next night general Blain, Nightlinger asked me a question, "But he seemed to know the enemy so suddenly made this attack?" I said, "It is dangerous to answer this statement; it is possible that they could operate also from a great distance, and the enemy may one understand." It is dangerous.

Susan warmly approved of this plan indeed and after a few extra flourish flourishes just for a courtesy, Ball started for her camp. A few minutes

751 later Jonny Riches came galloping up to the girls tent declaring her intention of staying until the time for Sumans departure, and having a good time. "I was going to the cinema with you last" said she "as she's

"It's a long, long time since I seen you last," said she as she gathered every day. This morning they have all gone on a scout patrol, but I felt I'd rather come here, as I do not feel like having much excitement on such a hot morning."

At this very moment happening to think that the boy and girl scout class in goldens were being the "mark" so squarely would perhaps wish for a chance to show the efforts of their work and Jenny said to herself near the tent opening; and removing her hat and hanging it on the top of tent pole made it for herself and some little harassed boyscouts by tickling their nose with the end of her riding whip, and very one were assembled for portly of the army was going to move closer to them, the lines being nervous because of the expected petty terms of the enemy, the two little girls were alone and Jenny entered at once upon the great object of her visit.

[illegible]

Instantly Sumner thought of Angeline Jennings, the Girl Scout School Commissioner. "I haven't the permission and "I wish I could," said she, "but I can't. I haven't the permission and only Angeline Jennings could give it to me and she's not in general. Vivian's army just now."

Angeline Jennings could give it to her army just now." "It wouldn't hurt to get the permission from one of the Vivian girls returned Jenny. My last term Miss Johanna got the permission easily enough. Violet and her sisters don't refuse anything." The girls were suddenly interrupted by the returned Jenny. "Why last term we don't refuse anything," enough violet and her sisters don't refuse anything." At this moment Jenny's remark was suddenly interrupted by the loud galloping of horses, and the call of many children's childish voices going to the tentider shes and Susan was coming down the company street at a gallop into a squadron of girlsacouts, who had been out patrolling and for some reason or other were returning to camp in the highest glee. Violet and her sisters were at their head, and so was a girl looking exactly like Jack Brads. The horses were fantastically trimmed with ribbons, ferns and evergreens which dispured to be of course to make it more striking, a number of the girlsacout were ornamented in the same way. Conspicuous among them among the noisy squadron were violet and her sisters, and Angeline Reichen. General Evans broad brimmed soldier hat was resting on the long curls of violet while her white uniform sabonnet was tied under his chin. The sobnet Jenny and Susan appeared the whole party set up a shout as deafening as that a swarm of soldiers came out in a price believing there was an attack. No sooner did he of one of the boyscouts get sight of Susan than springing up and standing in the stirrups even while the horse was on the full gallopand swinging his sabre around his head he screamed "Three cheers for the little Orphan scout, and her handsome girl companion. Hurrah. Give three cheers everybody!"

In the third and last hurrah the whole company joined and when that was finished, Penrod who was there struck up on a high key.

"Oh why don't the enemy come and get us to day.
Oh why don't they come on. "

Some one else shouted, "Because we'll send them to Hong Kong."

Every one had joined in with him and Susan appeared surprised at, she knew it was intended as an insult to the enemy, and when she heard the voices of hundreds of girls about joining in with the boyscout, she could not stay her to tears.

"When's that song chanting" said Jenny when at last the column had disappeared from view and the noise and dust had somewhat subsided. Then as she saw the tears in Alvin's eyes she added "That's wrong. Why the tears."

"It isn't that," said Susan smiling in spite of myn herself at Sunny'd question: "It isn't that." But every time Abby, she brings up anything about the Glandolinians it annoys me because I know what the Glandolinians did to my parents and also know what they want to do to me."

"That is certainly wrong for the Olandelinsians to be so mean," returned Jenny, "but the soldiers are not so much to blame as their leaders, who have acquired a great influence over them all. You understand too the Olandelinsians are really aroused and I dare say the dangerous bandits have fully gratified their wish in every respect. For general Vivian says the Olandelinsian soldiers are that their leaders make them. But now, there comes Hettie Kottmann; I guess she wonders what is keeping you so long."

She wonders what is keeping you so long.

The moment Hattie entered the tent Jenny commenced talking about the girlabout training camp in general. At length at her tongue's flicking at last purposely that it entirely prevented any one else from saying a word until she stopped for a moment to take breath... Then Hattie very quietly said that if Susan really wished to go to general training she could do so. Susan looked up inquiringly wondering what mine had opened up so suddenly at her feet but she received no explanation until Jenny had bidden her good bye and gone. Then she learned that Hattie had received word that Susan wished to go and now Hattie there is no reason why you should not go to general training girlabout training camp if you wish to. But be careful it's closer to the enemy and we fear a great battle any time. There's lots of things to do everywhere and it has not stopped yet.

The gas tears which came to Sumner's eyes were indeed a sufficient evidence that she did wish to go, and therefore immediately a note was forwarded to General Laidan who promptly replied that though he had no room at present he was willing to receive her nevertheless in the training camp as a new recruit.

All this time too a good part of the whole army camp was thrown into a state of fermentation. Juan was going to General Vivians lines, and what was more unusual and marvelous still, petty assaults by the Germans being hurled upon Johnsons lines at certain times at random and more than one good girlie had declared her intention of giving up if the enemy continued these attacks and came on too fast. There being a danger of an long a trip between Hansons and Vivians was the thing of which Juan heard most frequently now that her prospects were getting brighter, and even Angelina Alchae when told that Juan was going to General Vivians said to Dolores Micholister who was with her at the time:

"Why in the world does she want to go to general civilians when a big storm of war-time persecution is upon them? Isn't she getting a real fast for talking episodes with G.I.s and sailors for one who has been rescued when a orphan refugee." Ida, Gladys and Joy Bet Claire and many others were greatly surprised, and, proved so because dangers must threaten at such a time, the former desiring she would not send any of her girls-out recruits, to a far distant girls-out school, which was so near the region of a "Mr Storm" and that Missie Sanders and others too were going seemed also strange. Everyone was afraid, for G.I.s early and said she should be going with a guide, or a protecting retaining squadrons. Jenny please however thought differently.. She was delighted, and she came to Angelina Jennings to talk the matter over and tell what good times they'd have providing they did not meet with any of the glandelinian soldiers or foe boy and girls-out patrols.. which she believed they would, just because there were so many of the few patrols around. However Angeline Jennings assumed a very resigned indifference, saying:

"I don't meddle with any one's business no matter what they do, and I therefore shouldn't begin by meddling with Susan, but it's a miracle if she will reach general Vivians army safely. Listen to the firing. Somethings wrong somewhere."

All the boy and girlscouts felt very much worried and troubled, and as there was no attention paid to their remarks they gradually ceased, and by the time that morning that Susan's preparations were complete, the protests seemed to have subsided altogether. She was an unusual favorite in the whole army, because of being an orphan, and on the hour when she got ready to leave came there was a kind good bye and a word of love spoken by everybody who could see her off. Colonel Knight brought her to the wagon train, where they found Sally, accompanied by the boy scout called Henry, also her constant attendant and friend. She also knew that Susan was to leave that morning, and had rode all that distance on horseback from the south part of the camp for the hope of seeing her and giving her a little parting advice. It was not quite time for the wagon train to pull out as all the horses had not yet been brought up to be hitched to the carriages, and the boy scout knight who had to be, had at his part of the camp as soon as possible said he "couldn't stay," so squeezing both of Susan's hands he bade her good bye, telling her to be a good little girlscout, and get to letting the enemy carry her away. Scarcely had he gone when Susan's attention was attracted by the sound of the coming of a squadron on horseback, and that of many voices, and looking from behind a tree at which she had placed herself to fix her stooping which had come down she saw a large group of camp fire girls advancing toward the wagon train. Among them was Violet, and her sisters, talking and laughing very loudly. No matter what they went through or suffered they always seemed to be cheerful and gay. Susan's heart beat very rapidly for she realized or thought Violet, and her sisters were coming to bid her good bye, but she was, nevertheless, Violet, and her sisters and the camp fire girls she noticed were carrying an unusual supply of arms, and not dressed at all magnificently but in the oldest uniforms, and she found that they were even giving orders now to a squadron of soldiers coming up. The group of girls nearly a number and the soldiers were going to escort the wagon train to general Vivians. Violet at the moment had no thought of Susan being with those going and she dismounted and after glancing about without seeing those waiting for the train to come turned her back, and looking across the river, which was hardly a part of the river section of the flooded directly in front, she said in her own tones:

"Why don't Rose come? I haven't time to see her at all. I'm afraid."

Susan in astonishment, and then said to Violet: "Princess, isn't that Susan Carol?"

"Susan Carol? I don't know," returned Violet. "Susan laughed, and then Violet facing about exclaimed: "Why Susan you here so soon? No wonder we couldn't find you. I even forgot that you were going this morning. I thought you went last evening."

She walked to where her sisters were, and there was a moment's consultation and then she came back saying:

"Susan you'd better ride with us. We saw your army commission and you'll do as an addition to the escort till you get to your school."

Before Susan could reply Susan arose, and passed her hand carefully over Susan's head. Partly in fear, Susan drew back, who said "don't be alarmed Susan I thought I saw a bad mark on your head. I felt sure it was there."

Didn't that shot fired at you last night when you fired the shot? I don't know," said Susan, "but I got the man myself who fired the shot. I don't if any of his comrades found him yet, or whether he's dead, or not."

Just half smothered laugh was more surprising to Violet, than supposed, for she had not seen that Susan had outwitted a Pandolinian shipper but she soon recovered from her shock for the wagon train was reported to be on the way and another squadron was coming up. A boy scout by the name of Henry, upon a spring nimble from his horse, leaped his hand to Violet, and her sisters and all the rest, who blushed, and then saying to the girlscout escort leader Rose Palm said: "Well we are ready, but what's delaying the train. Or are they afraid of horses? We late enough already."

"I guess you'd pass about as good an examination now as any others who have been to school," said Rose, glancing toward Susan, who Jenny noticed was eagerly talking. "I don't see why you want to go."

"But it's better for me," said Susan.

"At such a time," said Rose slightly with severity. "Why Susan it's dangerous. Why not do it here?"

"I'd rather in general Vivians. Gertrude and my friends are all there." This directed Henry's attention that way, and almost simultaneously his own and Susan's met. With a peculiar expression of countenance he stepped toward her saying:

"Good morning Susan. For what part of general Vivians are you bound?"

"The girlscouts military training school," Susan answered politely. "Well did any of the Princesses say they need you as an escort addition?"

"Yes," he said.

"Good." He turned to ride on his way.

"Listen isn't that the approach of the wagon?" said Jenny, as a low heavy stealing sound fell on her ears, but she soon ascertained what it was, for Henry who had picked up the blue umbrella which Sally had brought with her for fear of a hot forest fire wind and which had been lying upon the ground he answered to Jenny as he handed to her the umbrella, "no that is the sound of some distant battle. Listen."

"In an instant the growling sound changed to a strange far away bar ing roar, and it was at this time that the enemy was rushed toward a section of the Christian lines but fortunately was being stopped by the defenders just in time to prevent the enemy from doing any mischief. With a muttered "Oath" of some sort which included "The dirty old Pandolinians as well as their murderous ways of assaulting a Christian line at this time, the boy scout was turning away when Jenny said:

"What part of the Christian lines is the enemy feeling?"

After assuring himself by a glance that Violet and her sisters and the Camp fire girls were all still some distance mounted on their horses, Henry replied with a look of dread in his face: "I don't see why we should go to general Vivians to day. The enemy might come between him and Hanson and we will be sunk."

Instantly Sally said:

"And yet Susan wanted so much by the enemy, is going to be the escort. She's a good girl, so why do you fear?"

"I beg your pardon," he answered, "but I fear by her own account. I never forget how much the enemy would desire to put her out of the way."

The approach of the wagon was now being heard, and in a moment they were right up to where they were waiting. The day the Vivian girls had invited Susan to be one of the escort thrilled her every nerve, and Violet now called out to her, Jenny all of you I'm so glad you are ready. She was afraid there would be some delay, and we'd have to go without the wagon. But here they are."

"Isn't your father the emperor with you Princess?" demanded Henry bowing so low that he almost kissed the ground from the platform.

"No answered Jenny. "I wish he couldn't leave her home either, so we'll have to be the escort. We've got quite a strong body of troops with us, so we never need to fear about any patrol of the enemy."

"The mischief," said Henry, "now are we going to go. The enemy is playing idly with general Hanson's lines somewhere and if something goes wrong what's to be done. General Palm Nightingale is being driven to southbridge to day, and he sent me a telegram bidding me to put the girlscouts under your fathers protection but as he isn't here, do you really have to go too. Please don't throw yourself into danger again Princess."

"No we won't either," returned Ida Rosemary. "Violet, and her sisters are as good as the leaders of escorts at any time, and can look after a wagon train as well as a troop of soldiers, even better."

"Those are the Princesses. Are they not pretty?" whispered Jenny to Susan. But Susan hardly heard it. She was gazing admiringly at the animated faces of Violet, and her sisters and tracing in it a strong resemblance to the mannish features features of the great Abaddonian emperor.

"All aboard the wagons quick," shouted the shrill voice of the captain in charge, and Susan was aroused from her reverie, and twining her arms around Sally bade her good bye.

"The Good Lord be with you," said Sally, and be sure you pay strict attention attention to the orders given an escort, and you can easily feel the enemy."

"Susan next looked for another girlscout friend Ellen, but she stood at some distance, looking lightly with Henry the lead boy escort, and Susan was heading for her when all aboard was again shouted in her ear while at the same time one of the boy scouts helped her lightly up the step she she so she could easily get into the wagon from the back.

Rose and Jenny were standing near by.

"This wagon is brim full," said Rose looking over her shoulder "but I guess you can find a good seat in the wagon I'm to drive."

Susan too the hint and found in the wagon indicated there was a goodly number of empty seats. As the wagon train moved rapidly over the long level road and passed the edge of the flood, Susan looked out to catch a glimpse of the battle she had heard of; and then in the thought how cold and entranced Mandolinia was to the holy Abolitionian country she drew her veil over her face and burst into a loud laugh.

"Who is that young lady?" asked Angelina who was riding back ward and consequently directly opposite to Susan.

"That young lady," said Susan, "is Angelina; replied."

"The one who kissed Sally, and then followed you and Jenny into this wagon."

"That is Susan Carol," was Rose's polite answer. "She's a friend of mine."

"Susan Carol?" repeated Angelina as if the name was one she had once heard before. "Who is she, and what is she?"

"She is a little orphan girl," answered Rose, "and as of Jenny's friends, at all of us are her friends. You see Jenny is sitting beside her."

"She doesn't seem to be an orphan girl," said Angelina. "I wish she would show that veil I want to see how she looks."

"She's the imitation of the Queen of Hearts," was Rose's reply.

By this time Susan had dried her tears, and when the wagons came to the first stop to rest the horses as it was dreadfully hot she removed her veil disclosing to view a face that was just almost the same in beauty as Angelina's, though she had black hair.

"He doesn't seem as if she were an orphan," said Angelina, "and Rose replied."

"Well she has been, and what she went through cannot be told her to our number."

"From what part of the Christian Army did she come?" continued Angelina, "I'm beginning to grow very interested."

"I suppose you remember the visit of the Virgin Mary. Well, Gertrude Angelina decides to adopt her as her sister. I believe Sally, but I don't hear much about it, and hope just the same that it is true. It's a fine girl Susan is."

"Gertrude Angelina," repeated Angelina, "why violet, and her sisters think the world of her, why even by friend Mildred and her, Gertrude wouldn't sleep so soundly if she had Gertrude's new basket was in the same wagon with her, I mean to tell her. Mildred, Mildred."

But Mildred Greenburg was too fast asleep to heed Angelina's call, and heavy sleep was necessary to her to arise from her sleep, when she became fully awake, and found out why she was aroused, she started up and going toward Susan said in her own peculiar sweet way and whispering manner:

"My friend mine, she tells me you are going to be Miss Archibute adopted mascot, and Miss Archibute is the dearest friend I ever had. I am delighted to see you."

Jenny immediately introduced her to Susan as Miss Mildred Greenburg whispering at the same time that she was Gertrude's friend, then rising she gave her seat to Mildred taking another one for herself. Rose and Jane, without seeming to be curious at all Mildred had a peculiar way of drawing little girls and boys quite to talk of themselves, and by the time they reached the vicinity of General Vivian's lines without any misadventure after all and where they left the wagons for the army camp she had learned a good deal of Susan's history and simplicity of her young friend, quite pleased with the freshness and simplicity of her young friend, as Susan did with her polished and elegant and eccentric manners.

GUSAN'S EXPERIENCE AS A STUDENT IN THE GIRLS' CO-OP MILITARY TRAINING CAMP. THE CLOSING OF THE FIRST DAY OF THE SCHOOL. SECOND DAY OF TRAINING FINISHED.

"Oh what an enormous looking encampment," exclaimed Rose from the rear of the wagon she was riding. She first obtained a view of General Vivian's lines and then looked at the encampment. Rose because of all the disasters of the war, of all she had heard, of the dreadful hot weather caused by the distant fires, and because the awful floods would not recede, was in the worst of humors. Susan was by some blessed breath some sort with herself, and she noticed that Rose appeared distressed. She however felt it was of no avail to complain of it to Susan as she realized her fault finding spirit against the army until she visited at the outskirts of the Christian where she heard news that came in for a share of her displeasure.

That is the army, Susan said, but put it off. In the continuously as the wagon train began entering the line. Why that lady's army hasn't an encampment half as large or as handsome. Oh horrors, but I'm afraid we won't be able to stay here long."

She had often been within the enemy lines and the approaches of the tents and the method of the enemy resting. I say, and the tent furniture had been very offensive to the young girl scout, and she had styled Manley as a half-glozy, daisy-looking general with a neck which really belonged to an ostrich. However she should always see the bright side of everything and she completely shut out with the appearance of the camp, the reception she and all the rest received from the scouts in general Vivian's army, and with the sweet smile and placid face of the general himself he well remembered by all who have seen and known the general who is loved by the enemy.

After some conversation between Rose and a girl scout Directress it was decided that Rose and Jenny should tent together as a matter of course and that Susan should room with Mildred. Rose had fully intended to tent with Mildred herself, but she was ready to agree with the intention of the Directress. Hearing of what the enemy had been doing elsewhere, to try and flank general Vivian's army made Rose very angry but there was no help to it; and she was obliged to submit to the outcome.

Now in this case the reader may be aware that even to become a girl scout requires an examination. It is a very necessary even before a pupil can be admitted into any girl scout school where the course of instruction embraces only one year, and three classes, junior, middle class and also senior. Rose who had studied very hard in her younger days had passed the senior, and she hoped that one of those she had brought along would at least be able to enter the middle class. Rose of course was one of the scouts, and was not without her. All of these new experiences had been excellent. Military school and had passed the senior class the year before. Susan and those who had followed her to go into scouting, though there were only fifty new recruits had aspired or expected nothing higher than admission into the junior. She was greatly surprised when Mildred Greenburg who after all turned out to be one of the Directresses, after questioning her as to what she had learned proposed that she be examined for the middle classes.

"Oh no indeed I cannot do that I haven't the chance," said Susan quickly in a positive way. "Sure I would be a failure, and therefore it wouldn't be right for me to try that for all the world."

"Have you ever for any certain purpose tried to study English?" asked Mildred Greenburg. Before Susan could reply Rose exclaimed: "Oh study English. Now Susan, my dear Susan, that she can read English very good. She would be a great use for all girl scout leaders."

Susan then answered that for more than three years she had been studying English under her own Aunt's instruction and by the aid of other friends.

"And you could not have a better teacher than any of the Virgin Girl Philosophers," said Mildred Greenburg. "Go try to get one of them to do your teaching by all means."

"Yes do try," said Rose and Jenny in the same breath, and after a time Susan finally but reluctantly consented.

"I'll warrant she'll make general Manley think he's a sitting pull," said Rose to Jenny.

I suppose it would be very welcome to give the reader any description of the examination. In detail, as I will only say that at its close only one did not pass had and had to go to what was called the girls' scouts winter garden class.

and low spirited gain seemed to be. Indeed she had tasted of military knowledge and now thirsted for more and more, but it could not be for many days at present, she was to be initiated as a scout a few days from hence and she must leave the school temporarily.

and she must leave the school temporarily.
"How much I shall and will miss my flag drill lessons, and how much I shall miss you," she said to him, who was then giving her a lesson.
"It's too bad you haven't a flag," returned him. "You are so fond of flag drills and improve also so fast that you astonish many. I am very fond of such drills too, but you sure do make very fast improvements." Then after a few minutes of thinking she added "I'll propose a very good plan to you, and between us both, we may do well do it now as any other time. Now we are released from school to morrow, to morrow I suppose being Saturday you must spend with me within General Walker Barracks camp. Olga and I arranged it the last time I was at her own camp and we even selected your tent, which is to be next to mine, and opposite to the camp of the fire or camp fire girls. Now what does your little self say to the proposition?"
"Yes," she answered, "I will."

Girts: Now what does your little self say to "Answered Rums."?
 "I don't believe I could be able to go," answered Rums.
 "You cannot go," repeated Kirk. "Why not, then, Mr. Stimers will be in that part of the camp and he will give me Aquilina, and so are always happy where Jack and Jack, and the others are, besides you will have a rare chance for making flag drills lessons of our best flag drill teachers, and then to you will be in the same camp with general Starring, and that alone is worth going to that part of the camp for I think. Besides, man, men this is too a military proposition, and the military laws would not accom-

 "Your reform unless you wish to become a court-mart was the strongest object your return, unless you want to become a score-line little suspected that her last argument was the strongest objection to Susan's going, for as much as she wished to meet this great general at Walter Blumling again, she felt that not only any on any account go to his own camp, lest he should believe she came on purpose to see him and she was slightly shy of so great a guardian of the Virgin Girl, Princesses. There were other reasons too why she did not wish to go. General Jack Evans would be in the army and too she was fearful of him. The glorious too when she was refused with would miss her and longed to have her return to them, but she could not resist Miss's entreaties, for the matter was brought before Mildred Greenberg, who was sure that this was not merely a proposition, but a military order, and it was rebellion to not obey and so much had to agree with the proposition.

Susan had been surprised by receiving a proposition, to agree with the proposition. During the afternoon, rebellious Susan had been surprised by receiving two telegrams, letters and from some by young friend of her in an army more than two hundred fifty miles distant, and one from her second Aunt who was in the highest section of Angelina. Amelia the latter of which contained advice as how to do her duties to become a girlabout, but on showing the letter to Mildred Greenburg how she was surprised to learn that many others had known of her and wrote to Angelina Amelia concerning her. For a moment a faint faint sickness stole over Susan for she instantly thought of her lost parents and brothers and sister. Then it occurred to her how impossible it seemed to be that any one could have sent a telegram from Angelina Amelia over that wide stretch of flood and as such as she could trust her, raise to speak she wondered who it was that was thus doing all this good for her. Of course Mildred Greenburg would not could not tell, and with a secret suspicion of Jean (for she could make a telegraph note go anywhere disaster or no disaster) and who had seemed so much interested in her and her ways Susan returned to her room to read the other telegram which was still unopened. The telegraph had written to her, (as they have) in her and her ways. Susan returned to her room, and which was still unopened.

It was some time also this boy could had written to her, (as they have) much time in the army, and with more than her usual curiosity, she opened the envelope but her heart grew faint and she seemed dazed as she read the passionate but plain outpouring of a heart which had cherished her for months, and which though fearful she might be rejected from the girls' camp army, because of the enemy's attempt to frustrate her, still told her how much he loved her as his sister for he had her nearest cousin. "The dangers you face" in no sudden fancy "he writes" at which conceived the deadly afternoon your parents found out something so important on the library after noon when in your little room at home, with your parents dead, you still in my lap and wept as you told me how lonely you were, how you face come before remember it, dear, I had not I do, and here I now down your face come before.

In my thoughts but I think of you even as you were then, and of the peril you face now, and the child which a nurse comes to my heart that you were some place of great safety. To be a day out in war, and to be a girl out too, but your life will be one of great peril. Morning, noon and night too, I thought of the peril you face every moment and no place for your better future have I ever been able to form which was not a direct reference to what is coming upon you and your dearest Aunt. Oh Susan I wish you to prove your affection to be returned to me by not for your own party safe hold back the secret you have too long. All the situation for you is changed greatly changed. Your dangers are more than you see, and when I search around for the cause I am led to fear that I was deceived that its safe to hold the secret. If I am mistaken tell me so but if I am not if you find its more dangerous to let it out I will have to submit to fate."

This telegram indeed produced a strange effect upon Angelina. She remembered numerous times how much she was already indebted to many of those who had stood so faithfully by her when even the whole world was dark and dreary. She thought of the kindness of her friends to those who had died at the hands of the enemy and that appealed more strongly to her sympathy than anything else they had ever done for her. There was no one to advise her and acting upon the impulse of the moment she sat down and composed a letter the very nature of which she did not hardly understand herself, and which she decided to have Jean telegraph to Angelina. Again she had written but one page, when she had suddenly the strange feeling that persons alive whom they are ill from overhead, or several days before she had not been well, and the excitement produced by this telegram of her cousins increased her illness to some degree. There was nothing when she had attempted to rise that she had thought herself seriously ill during these hours when the days schooling was finished and when she was alone that evening she had ample time for reflection, and she finished the telegram letter to her cousin Michael in which she told him how much she loved him, that it was not proper for her to give away the secret until the Virgin Girl gave her permission to do so. This note caused them so much effort and so many bitter tears, that she felt weaker and gave up all hope of being present at the first day examination.

When she told of her illness to her friend Ella she answered, "If I
"Oh that is too bad for he's coming this evening and I do so want you to see general Starring, and I'm afraid now that he'll be disappointed too for Hubs is a girl or boyscouts over observed anything of the interest he has in you."
However Susan felt so tired and ill that she had to go and lay down on her cot, and a few hours afterwards as Susan was lying half asleep and yet feeling the heat more than ever, and thinking of John, and others, and wondering if she had done right in writing to her cousin as she did, refusing to let out her secret without the consent of Abbot, and her mother, a girlabout whose name was Alice Wilkey came running into her tent wild indeed with delight.

with delight.

"My own father a soldier in the army was outside, together with Ida's uncle, and officer in the army.

"The first thing I did when Ida was to inquire after Perrod and Redcliffe, I guess my aunt who came to see to see he was ~~shoes~~ shoes. I showed at the night of no much fire and flood, for she asked, so quiet. General Starring laughed, and General Vivian said he was doing better than ever and was one of the finest of all ~~Wynnes~~ ~~Wynnes~~ in the whole christian christian army. But why don't you make inquiries about ~~Wynnes~~ Starring. I heard him talking about you, to some plum who is here again just as I came from outside. . ."

Sam however decided that any information of her which pose might therefore give, would be more than exaggeration, and indeed she thought right, for when these unasked questions concerning "the little orphan girl" she sat first misinterpreted his questioning being utterly ignorant of ~~some~~ ~~some~~ history, and then when after Starring explained more correctly she said "I . . ."

"Oh you mean the new recruit Susan. I'm sure I don't. How much about her excoriated as far as I am acquainted with her, and that much of her however shows she's got good quality to be a good girl outside. It's a miracle or something of that kind. If she was my sister I couldn't be sure about or love or more."

At these words there was a peculiar smile on general Starrings face, but he again replied, "Oh, mild."

"If that is the case she ought to be a very, very good and studious girl, and that that she pronounced she was."

"As nearly as I can judge of her," returned Rose "she is most remarkable for her brilliant talents, and she has certainly good way a lot of proving her worth quite on her own merits, and perhaps I might be mistaken in regard to her if I say that some day instead of trying to get her, the ones I'll keep out of her way instead."

Very much stronger still is the description of her given by Ida who now came to the general's side,, extolling Guain highly and lamenting the illness which would prevent the general from visiting her. Many others within hearing spoke a string of words in Guain's favor at the same time endeavoring to confirm the rumors of Rose whom they thoroughly honored and loved as a good woman, and whom the enemy had feared. She was the only daughter of general Augustus Plim of the Abyssinian general and she was very much of a favorite with her father. Rose was not only unusually pretty but she also possessed a peculiar faculty of being more than usually agreeable than ordinary children. Daily are even having all these good children of Abbeinnia, and for her manners and good and obedient ways she was an unusual favorite with all the generals, the scouts and all soldiers who were acquainted with her. It was toward all boyscout officers and companions however that her prettiest and most son acquittal ways were practiced. However she felt that Susan was the object that she would secure, and when she heard Susan's sad history spoken of in her presence she in her heart fully could not forbear expressing her contempt for Susan's particular and unlovely. Knowing that all others would feel just as she did with regard to Susan's flight, and the low brow rebel who were persecuting her, she made the statement that when Susan gets the real scouting ways that wanting should be will to remain out of her reach instead of hunting her down like a prey. As for Walter Starring it was difficult for him just to consider about the matter though the last time Rose was in Susan's camp rumor had said that some sniper had tried to shoot Susan and instead winged, Susan's hat from her head, and she had turned, saw the smoke still and got the man before he could escape, and and still Lincoln, one of the girlscouts, who was very sanguine hinted to her that the probability that the battle would soon sweep rage between the scout forces of both sides.

Rose however was careful not to hint any such thing of Susan's knowledge of the explosion, of Abbeinnia, in her or Ellen's presence, but she was quite willing that all others of her boy and girlscout companions should fancy that Susan might be the settling of the question between the nation of Abbeinnia and the situation there. Consequently she had not been in the girlscout school ten days before she was pointed out as being the future redeemer of Abbeinnia, which great disaster had become a subject of general remark throughout the whole world. During the whole of Starring's stay in this locality Rose managed to keep him at her side entertaining him constantly with all the good and perfect doings of Susan, the successful results of her adventures, who she said was undoubtedly "if forgiving her sickness" because she was too "silly" to come down and see him, but said Rose "as soon as the time comes I want you to come to her tent and see her, and she'll get over her bashfulness fast enough, and won't regret having met her. You a second time. She's a little girl as she can be created."

Rose of course was mistaken in believing that Susan was playing ill just to keep out of Starring's sight from shyness, for when the evening came Susan was too ill to ride back to the other section of the Christian line and it was decided that she should remain until some one could come for her. With many tears Jenny and Ella and others bade their girl friend good by, and Rose when asked to go and see her said "Go and see her, what do you think I'm going to stay with her until she gets better. She's ill because of this heart."

The tent in which Susan lay commanded a view of the camp through the entrance, and after her friends had left, she arose as best as she could and stealing to the little tent window looked out upon the company as they moved off. She could easily throw her arm, while Rose herself walked close to his side, apparently engrossing his whole attention. Once he turned round, but fearful of being observed observed himself Susan drew out of sight and thus lost a view of his face. He had nevertheless seen her, and asked Rose if that was the tent in which Susan was ill from the heat.

Rose said it was, and then told of the many trials which Susan had endured at the hands of the enemy before she was rescued in the Christian line, and congratulating the little girl upon her escape from those combing the country in their efforts to get her and her aunt. Starring was an attentive listener. He was greatly disappointed at not seeing Susan and thought it strange but when Rose had brought him toward the tent the army do stop seeing her that he had come thus far from his own command, and in spite of Rose's endeavors to bring him to say a few words he was unkindly silent all the way. On her return Rose told one of the boyscouts to bring to Susan tent some clear cool water from the flood, and he for a blunder highly offended the young girlscout by because he had his and too much set upon something else, brought a pail of dirt, and a basin of mud.

"I should like to know what you are thinking about," she said rather pettishly, as she glanced at the mud and dirt. "Do you call this water?" The boy blushed and looking intensely embarrassed answered "that he didn't realize what he was doing, and he then brought the water."

In the meantime during all the morning of this day while Susan was receiving her first day of training both the enemy and the Christian armies of the actions which had been giving and receiving trouble were in a sort of a half quiet state that looked like a temporary calm but more troops had been placed where trouble was feared, and artillery was put into position near the Junction of Clara's Crossroads. Of course that morning every Christian general and their troops available was there in Mass formation, after Mass and Holy Communion for all the soldiers never missed a Church Service in the camp nor Mass and Holy Communion and neither did the child scouts. This day the Christian line however was facing the enemy most of the time, but the assaults seemed more lightly delivered, sometimes only piques, sorties, and forays. Of course just at the time the Mass call was sounded the enemy would start some demonstrations, and the Christian officials would have the funniest things to say against the foe, and one could have actually been convulsed laughing at the funny things the Christian officials did in their mockery and what they said. Then about two o'clock then suddenly on came the enemy, and they struck against the Christian line like a many demons. Impossible to tell what would have occurred had the enemy been permitted to rush on without ever's resistance. In the course of that day the enemy generals learned a number of things they did not seem to know before through spies.

They learned which part of the Christian line was the thinnest, and would hurl a petty assault there. In short they tried every sort of scheme to demolish a certain section of Hanson's army. In the beginning a demonstration was a sign without a slight mistake that the assault was going to be made but the Christian generals gradually realized that the Christian generals relied on this sign, so they would give less demonstrations, but start up an assault more suddenly. Machine gun usually had more effect on repulsing these flaws more than musketry fire. Of and on the assaults would be made slightly of course, being repulsed by machine gun fire or by means of a barrage of artillery shells or grenades, by pressing heavy numbers to the endangered line or by hurling forth a similar counter assault.

General Plivan had written to general Hanson: "What kind of an action do you call that the enemy is so constantly demonstrating against you anyway. They've been doing queer things lately, the demonstrations are not at all like those usually performed. Better be on your guard. The enemy is up to something."

In Gertrude Angelina's headquarters, but selected in her own pleasant little dining room parlor that came evening the tea table was neatly spread for fourteen while the boyscout aide-de-camp, in his best handsomest uniform, and large white hat bustled in and out, and occasionally changing the position of a window curtain, and then a chair, and then would step backwards to see how it looked. It was a large rocking chair of some sort, with three extra pillows was drawn up to the table indicating that some one who might be an invalid was expected to occupy that seat, while near one of the plates was a handsome bouquet, which Jean had her self had arranged most carefully, and brought over as a present for her young orphan girl friend. Half a dozen times one of the boyscouts had been told to go and take a peek down the road and see if they were coming, and at last sitting herself resignedly upon the outside front steps. Gertrude began to wonder "What in the world had happened that they were not yet coming? He had reminded her for about an hour if she the sound of the galloping of horses was heard, and a group of girl and boyscouts came riding up and drew rein near the entrance. Susan who was now heartily well, sprang from her horse, and bounding up the steps seized Jane hand with a grasp which told how glad she was to see her, as she first had come down to meet her.

"Why you ain't so dreadful sick after all are you," said Jane peering long into her face.

"No I'm not sick at all now," returned Susan, and then she saw the chair and almost felt like having a good hearty cry when she saw how kind every one was to her. She had been too to Gertrude's camp only a few hours when she was solicited to take charge of a small select girlscout school for a while. But however Gertrude Angelina thought it best for her to return to Miss Greenburg's class as soon as possible, and accordingly Susan declined her friends offer, greatly to her off disappointment, and that of many others. Jane Mallory was the loudest in her complaints saying that "that select girlscout school was without a proper girl scout leader, and Susan could

"I'm too thankful to see him."
"And you too I'll guarantee feel some interest in him." Returned the boy scout and again his large blue eyes rested i on the little girl's face with a curious suspicious expression. But she made no reply, and rising up a few minu minutes later, said it was time for her to start back to her own camp for breakfast...

"I am in a room, and she was going to tell how she came to be acquainted with her, when for some reason or other the boy's count suddenly changed the conversation, and in a moment or two more they were near or at the entrance to Jean's camp." Jean seemed delighted to have seen this boy, and to receive the message which he brought, and she was so excited over what she had heard that she did not seem to notice the boy at all, and that a party of boy and girlscouts had gone out on only what may be called "a sight seeing tour" and that when they had reached a certain meadow, they had been heavily fired on from an unseen location and many of them had been shot down ten slain and the others wounded, also they said, that Mary Robinson had to nurse the wounded herself with Willard ending them and

On the night of the 22nd, the enemy had come this far to us again. I only brought the two girls into the large tent where the wounded child, Robert, lay, and saw upon a long bench lying all the members of the Red Cross girls and boys, and Angeline, whose was standing near the head, bowed with a look of very becoming resignation, and then, as if quite overcome, left the tent. Just then one of the boys, who was superintending affairs, approached the group, spoke in Spanish and Cuban, requested that Mr. and Juan Fortunate said you had better stay in here tonight all night with me, and there is no one there but Rose, Jim and me. We have such a nice time. You need to be there because I saw some one shadowing you.

she took Susan by the hand and led her to a large mirror of gilded frame, the beauty and neatness which had been greatly improved. Emily took both Susan and John and her own father a strip of faded blue carpet was lying before the set. A low rocking chair stood near the tape opening. There was an old barrel in the tent too, and its contents had been neatly piled away in a large round box, on the top of which, in a worn port-

However, given did not at that moment hear any other eyes were riveted upon something else at the foot of a far distant hill, but within plain sight of the wall of heavy brown clouds which made its all appearance as if the mountain was a volcano in violent eruption, the huge human had seen several dreadful volcanic eruptions in his day and night.

11 They returned Jean that it was no eruption, and neither is the mountain a volcano, it's a new forest fire on the east.
Budden afterwards learned that forest fires raging on hilltops or hillside could cause a volcano if a volcano was literally bursting its entrails.
Just as she stepped on the sound in the distance as if the rocking of a candle could be heard, then came a sort of terrific cry which rose to a shriek for a moment into the company street to have another look at the forest fire on the hills base and then Rose asked Jenny what she intended doing with "usn."

"To be sure it may do well enough," said she, "for the day to pass by without too much efforts and excitement, as the weather is too hot, the air too stifling and too smoky. It is better for all to take it easy. I do not want a list of heat prostrations on my hand. I've had w already."

"I don't want any of my followers to work now, none of you are even obliged to work, and you shouldn't work. If any of you get overcome it'll be your own fault. The generals won't allow the soldiers to do more than necessary either. We can't do not a thing until this hell subsides."

From what it was when she first came to General Vivian's army...
Poor Jane Mallfort who usually so full of life and spirits and recklessness was cut short in "hundreds expression of surprise and disdain by being told the heat was affecting her a great deal too.

"Why Jane, what does make you so red and so thin," said the distressed girl scout leader. "I know it's the heat," and she gave Jane numerous lectures of what to do to prevent heat strokes, and when two days later M'Kird saw her

I had never before, I am sure, passed a sentence as close to seeking forest fire drooping in the hot, unwholesome atmosphere produced by the "red plague" which had not long after the camp's movement when I had wanted to observe the scene. At the same time Johnny Russell wrote to Susan in a message an amazing account of angelic visions and of how he had been moved from the east to the west and then to the whole world.

expedition was supposed to. The boys and girls, and waiting their turn, how more attentive than usual. He accompanied us to a gathering held at the home of a friend, where we had to give a report that we had done all kinds of things and came back with our chests bursting full of shells, and how angry she got when she asked me if I wasn't trying to get rich by throwing it all away, and I said, "No, I wasn't doing anything for the country, or the people."

he is just like General. I don't think I look ever so many girls and boys uniform but I think he's more military looking. over the whole country. This incident hinged upon the government's ability to continue payment to all the soldiers dying in the armies.

"First the World's point of view," said Jack, "the present world situation can hardly be blamed upon all the situation of resources caused by these great catastrophes and flood disasters."

"It does not seem hardly," said Jack.

"Maybe not to you, but the Galverinian authorities are very firm in their belief that such awful losses caused by the floods and the wars own destructions are directly traceable to the 1919-1920 famine. While the general public is waiting with dread the results of the main deliberations of the banks for international settlements at the request the government had already appointed a commissioner interested with the fact of strengthening the affairs of the bigger banks in Prussia and Germany."

"This commissioner seems unimpaired," said Jack, "James Gandon, who is the head of the bigger banks in Prussia and Germany, issued a statement according to this effect: As far as he hoped the banks would come together to be formed and resume business, a stronger basis he said something must be done to alter this awful situation or it will create very heavy the advantage of Germany. It is all looking for it is also understood the emergency decree enacted by the various cabinets amounted a full per cent. got guarantees to all depositors."

"Yes, but this man admits that withdrawal from the banks totaled over a billion dollars. While the banks present foreign debts were over $12 billion."

"That seems to me in a hopeless case," said Jack, "but after reading the report for all Galverinian banks are expected to be decided by the government of Galverinia. The papers somewhere have the all Galverinian stock exchanges are almost closed and no one knows when they will open and according to the information written here all details stop at the banks of London, will be wait the arrival of the president who left for Galverinia about eight or ten days ago. However the authorities had been and are considering since the independent mission of the bank president to Galverinia an emergency decree to protect the property and giving a public statement to Galverinia."

"Yes, and it is believed that a decree is in effect and that it is also promulgated by emperor Vivan as soon as possible," said Jack.

"They read on that the emergency decree had placed dictatorial power in the hands of the authorities. It was expected that it would not only curb the flight of capital from Galverinia but Galverinia would be enabled to restrict the trade of the biggest banks of the country to conditions laid have been demanded by the Galverinian Federal Reserve Bank as a first step of participation of in a huge loan. Faced by the many dreadful disasters and dreadful loss of life on the one hand, and the raging fury of the mad Galverinians on the other, the moderate center Galverinian cabinet decided to try and use every means within its power to save Galverinia from going to bankruptcy. Emperor Vivan himself had issued the emergency decree believed to have been already drawn up by the cabinet under emergency clauses provided by the nation."

Continuation much longer of the dreadful floods, and the vain efforts to relieve the homeless; and the devastation of such immense stretches of the forests would mean the certain downfall of many banks in Galverinia and the Galverinian that if the fire progressed much further without being checked in the present circumstances would mean the ending of the most immeasurable disaster ever known in all history, and that the war would be a measure that would be shocking before Heaven itself."

The Galverinian cabinet reported also a decision to make declarations of an economic dictatorship with the purpose to lower the banks reserves to a danger point and that there was no further delay in expectation of other big loans of three to five billion dollars believed possible. One of the Bank Presidents of London reported to the cabinet that the many Galverinians think the war had to be finished better than it could and find almost nothing better in future where it could be continued. The Emperor had begun to be heard in various quarters and his observers declaring that it has actually had the effect of starting the worst dictatorial era in history. Despite the fact that he had left Galverinia, when it is on the verge of a nervous breakdown one of the Bank Presidents was called back late on the Night of the Twenty first of July to the conference of all Bank presidents and officials. On him indeed was expected the degree of action to reach some sort of understanding of the immeasurable extent of the various war disasters and see whether there was any hope of bringing it under control. The Galverinian press continued to demand the cabinet to take action at once.

over the whole country. This intention hinged upon the government's ability to continue payment to all the soldiers serving in the armies.

The fifth and worst point of view was taken the present world situation can really be blamed upon all the nations of the world caused by these great earthquakes and floods disasters.

"It does not seem hardly," said Jack,

"Maybe not to you, but the Galverinian authorities are very firm in their belief that such awful losses caused by the floods and the wars own detentions is directly attributable to the 1914-18 banks. While the general public is awaking with dread the results of the main delinquencies of the banks for international settlements and movements the government had already appointed a commissioner intrusted with the task of enlightening him the affairs of the bigger banks in various continents.

"This very disaster, however, in the United States, James Gordon, who is the head of the bigger banks in Europe at London, had issued a statement according to this matter, desiring he hoped the banks would come forward to be forgiven and resume business on a stronger basis, and something must be done to alter this awful situation or it will create very serious advantages to Galverinia is all looking for it is also suggested the emergency decree suggested by the various cabinets embraced a full per cent gold guarantee to all depositors."

"Yes," and this man admits that with travel from the banks totaled over a billion dollars with the banks' present foreign debts were over $12 billion."

"That according to me is a hole-in-the-hand," said the emperor, "but sharper restrictions for all Galverinian banks are expected to be decreed by the government of Galverinia. The papers announce here that all Galverinian stock exchanges are closed and no one knows what they will do and according to the information I received here all details stop at the banks of London will wait the arrival of the president who are not Galverinian until after a week and a half the authorities had been and are considering since the unimpaired mission of the bank presidents to Galverinia an emergency decree to protect the property and prevent a panic throughout Galverinia. Also was and it is believed with a decree in the United States and other countries."

pronounced by emperor Nivian as such as possible," said Lady.

They read on that the emergency decree had placed dictatorial power in the hands of the authorities. It was expected that it would not only curb the flight of capital but would also have a restraining effect on the banks' restriction of the credit of the biggest banks of the country two conditions laid to have been demanded by the Galverian Federal Reserve Bank as the price of participation in a huge loan. Faced by the many dreadful disasters and dreadful loss of life on the one hand, and the ravaging fury of the mad Galverinians on the other, the moderate Galverian cabinet decided to try and use every means within its power to save Galverinia from going to bankruptcy. Emperor Nivian himself had issued the emergency decree, believed to have been already drawn up by the cabinet under emergency clauses provided by this nation.

Continuation much longer of the dreadful floods, and the vain efforts to rescue the homeless; and the devastation of such thousands of stricken Galverians would mean the certain downfall of many banks in Galverinia. It was estimated in Galverinia that if the fires progressed much further without being checked in the present circumstances would mean the setting of the most immeasurable disaster ever known in all history, and that the war would come to a measure that would be shocking before Heaven itself.

The Galverinian cabinet reported also a decision to make declarations of an economic dictatorship with the purpose to lower the banks' reserves to a danger point and that there was no further delay in expectation of other big banks of three to five billion dollars believed possible. One of the Bank Presidents of London reported to the cabinet that the many disasters during the war had so demoralized matters that it would be financially impossible to continue where it would be necessary for the emperor had had to be heard in various quarters many conversations declaring that it has actually had the effect of starting the worst disaster ever known in history. Despite the fact that he had left Galverinia when it was on the verge of a nervous breakdown one of the Bank Presidents was called back late on the night of the Twenty First of July to the conference of all Bank presidents and officials. On him indeed was expected the duty of attempting to reach some sort of understanding of the immeasurable extent of the various war disasters and see whether there was any hope of bringing them under control. The Galverinian press continued to demand the cabinet to take control of the situation.

"We can get him from the overhanging branch of the tree nearest to his comrades," she said, and she pointed to a tree branch about six feet above the endangered boys, and, a little to one side, stretching from a still taller pine nearest the one the boy clung to.

"Yes, it seems a miracle to do it," said Gilford anxiously, as she eyed the branch. "anyhow, it looks like a fair play hope, and besides a girl or boy would have to have the arms of a gorilla to reach the boy from there."

"Never your mind about that," responded Gertrude. "That's climb up the other tree quick, that is hope of you, who can, and it'll give you an idea what I am going to do."

All of them however could do very, and they all climbed up the tree until they reached the stout branch indicated by Gertrude. They could not tell for sure whether it was really as strong as it looked but finally it was discovered it would hold four persons easily. They began to see them and hailed them evidently as big game, for he broke into a storm of wails.

"There," said Jean, regretfully, "I told you we would be too far up to help him. He leaned down, as far as she could without danger of falling from the branch, and the boy was still three feet at least from the stripe of her, but stretched for longer."

"Can't I reach him?" she ejaculated as she withdrew from her vain hip hope.

"There's just one chance," said Gertrude. "One of us will have to hang from this branch head down, till the other full length, while the rest grab by the legs and hold on for dear life."

"I told you easy to say," but in the girl who gave the alarm, but who is going to hang by the tail."

"At it," said Gertrude, "as she threw off her uniform red jacket."

"Oh now please don't think of such a foolish thing," protested Angelina, who was taking the time to think for such a simple attempt to take to see the poor boy go down, but his life time with you, and as he was so crazy too at times with his blunder blunders, and it his fault too as he knew he was not allowed to climb without giving orders."

"Besides, you, Jack, when you get hold of James Green, he would probably be so frightened that even then he wouldn't let go, and you couldn't pull him up alone."

"Out over the tree," talk comrades said Gertrude. "Jack, you and George sit on the branch as tight as you can, I with your left legs hanging down and then hold onto one leg while Angelina and I sit tight the other. I'm going to try the stick."

"For the sake of leaving the boy there, we can't do it with her, and therefore two of others of the group Jane and Angelina joined the quartet of helpers, although with great inward quaking, for they felt that if anything happened to their girls out leader they would be in part responsible for not having forcibly detained her from such a risky undertaking. A minute more and Gertrude had lowered herself from the branch and hung at full length, while the other girls pair of arms looked at each other. She found herself on the level with the boy but too far to one side to reach him with her extended hands.

"Start swinging us you see," she called, "until I am able to reach the boy."

She swung Gertrude gently to and fro each time slowly bringing her a few inches nearer the frightened boy whose strength was rapidly giving way and who seemed to be slipping. Gertrude made one grasp and missed. Her next attempt however was far more successful, she managed to grip the boy by the neck and shoulders, and ordered him to work himself upward as far as he could do, which by her help he managed to do until he was even with the branch. However it seemed to the frightened boy that the saw only open space below him, but in another moment Gertrude said to those holding her:

"Now draw me up. Can hold him. He's not heavy, and in another moment the seven above had pulled her up to the branch and she was again scared, shouting and panting and breathless, with the boy still in her grasp. He helped him to get a foot hold on the branch, his sides heaving, and his eyes still big and wild from the fright of his late experience.

"And the boyscout came back," blurted the girlscout.

"Indeed this 'ain't thing is on the subject that Gertrude came back," said Jeanie. "I tell you that Gertrude, that was the most dippy thing to do any one could ever think of."

"Indeed this 'ain't thing is on the subject that Gertrude came back," said Jeanie. "I tell you that Gertrude, that was the most dippy thing to do any one could ever think of."

However that was easily solved, two boys climbed down on either side of the trunk with James holding onto each and making headway himself as much as possible until they finally reached the ground, though to the three children it seemed a year's journey.

"Both you and Gertrude are lucky to come out of it whole," said Jack to James. "If Gertrude hadn't been strong enough to hold you, she and you would have fallen."

"Well, now let's get back to the section of the camp," said Gertrude, leading the way, while Angeline, whose brought up the rear with the rescued ones, and somewhat chastened boyscout, and it would be safe to say that James never dared to climb another tree alone. As the crowd of girl and boyscouts came trooping into their own part of the camp, Gertrude was alone had kept on her way, looking up with a reproful smile at the boyscouts.

"What do you girls and boyscouts think this is, a business office, or a playground?" she demanded. "We were awaiting you for drill hour, where in the world were you?"

But the querulous look and tone vanished, when he heard the story of the rescue of the boyscout from the broken branch, and as he turned to the line of boys who were drilling again, the boyscout veteran entered to himself:

"It seems as if the very American spirit is in those girl and boy scouts. I wish we had many Americans in our army. If we had them, it would be heaven here."

Three hours went by of stern or stern reserve and fearful expectation.

The troop of girls and boys called "the Thirty Seventh" under Jeanie Turner had come back to general William from Angelina, Angeline, the boy and girls, and as the child scout Regiment, swung through the company streets, headed by the child scout band, keeping step to the strain of martial airs, the whole camp went wild with enthusiasm.

From some of these, in coming boy and girls, the real news was brought as to the extent of the forest fire disaster, and the children had this opportunity to see themselves near a number of refugees, mostly men and boys who were within hearing.

"There's no use," Frank said, as with the other young refugees, in the camp they had thronged forward to see these splendid boys and girls in uniform go by, "I'm going to join the Forest Rangers in fighting the fire, and I won't need to be afraid of anything."

"Here's the one called Frank," said Jeanie, "he's a little fellow, but he's a big heart."

refuse to do it the crowd will be allowed to have you at its mercy. You will now stand at salute, and sing: 'Fair songs, Abbleannian forever, God save the King, The famous French Song, and the Star of the Glandelinian which every day of the Abbleannian's life doth sing, for the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, who through all the four verses at your left hand and with all the expression I know your love for the Glandelinian will prompt.'

The Glandelinian refused again, and a desperate assault the pressure he before from Jack being in the crowd accents the stirring measures of one of the old songs of Abbleannia.

It was in vain to stop him, they punched his face, and when he finished Jack shook him like a rat put in the crowd surged meaning, meaningfully forward and it seemed as if Jean's hammer and the others made the crowd to even say a word this time or interfere, and the crowd saw the rope, and knew the madness of a mob, he finally let this time gave in, and sang the four hymns as commanded.

"We won this time," shouted Jack. "We'll try the other stunts again. Jean take down the flag and place them where they were. He'll pick them up or we will turn him loose, to the mob."

She did so, but gently placing first a large white cloth which she found in the tent on the road and she stood there at salute. Again the Glandelinian as stubbornly as before even showed his refusal, but this time the crowd started forward, and was about to even brist, the boy and girls came roughly aside to get at him when he bowed and cried:

"For mercy's sake don't let me go and I will do it. Don't let them get me for their ferocious looks scared him."

flaming eyes. "Every one will be fighting for Calvernia and her sister States."

"That sure is the case Susan" cried Jack, his whole soul responding, to the kindling spirit of her eyes. "For poor Calvernia, it won't be the first time Abbleannia came to her aid. She did in 1841 too."

"I know that," replied Susan proudly. "General Vivian and all other brave men helped Calvernia win and I'll only fight that now when Calvernia is hard pressed and looking to her blood for Abbleannia like water. The noble animals should fight side by side with her and her other sister states and humble Glandelinia."

"You a true daughter of Abbleannia Susan" said Jack admiringly.

"Ah, fair Abbleannia," she sighed. "I love her with all my heart and soul. How many times have I desired, even longed to go back and see her sunny vineyards, her beautiful green covered mountains, and her beautiful cities."

"You told me you and your parents were planning to go there before the enemy killed them were you not Susan?" asked Jack.

"Yes," replied Susan. "And for two reasons. I was glad to see the dear Abbleannian home land again, and then too I felt I ought to go and see the beautiful scenery. But now papa and mama are dead and I have a heart to go. For could I have gone anyway had I wished, for the war is too extended and makes it impossible."

"Well don't worry worry. I'll have a chance yet," said Jack. "And yet, he added a little more thoughtfully, as he still held his prisoner. "It wouldn't have been a bad thing if you had been able to let out your secret so that our Government could work on it. It might be safer for you too."

"Don't worry about me and my secret," replied he girl. "I'll let it in a tone that strove to be cheerful. "You know I have the true Abbleannian say—you've said yourself that I'm a wonderful manager of secrets. The only reason I reveal nothing was for to obey the advice of Violet, and her sisters so that they could do something more about it when it comes out. I don't say either that the enemy did it or not. I know nothing. The secret does not go to that. I don't know now that we can ever get the secret out what really destroyed Abbleannia and caused the flood it's tangled up too in a sort of lawsuit and that was one of the reasons why I ought to keep it secret until the day comes, Violet will tell me to reveal it."

"Never mind little girl," replied Jack gaily. "Something will be right soon."

At this moment there was the sound of galloping horses, and the crowd opened up, and the vivian girls came riding through the gap.

"We've heard all about it," said the vivian who was in the lead. "Where is the man who insulted the flag?"

A hundred fingers pointed to the captive.

"Six of you soldiers take him to the Guard House," she commanded.

"And the rest of you disperse to your work," said Joice. "Will attend to the prisoner to-morrow."

With this they rode away, and Jack gave Susan a quick embrace and kiss and hurried out of the crowd for he had been away from the drill considerably longer than usual.

But indeed (you are interested) as fast as was the time he made in getting back to his Regiment the news of his exploit and got there far before before he done did it, and he found all boys and girls and soldiers too, huzzing with admiration and excitement. Jean who had been ahead of him and told every one the story, had not lost anything in her telling of it and she gave him a resounding thump on the back as he came on.

"Here's the right kind of boy that made the Glandelinian do something three times which he did not like."

"And from all accounts which I have held it didn't agree with the Gray Coated starfish," grinned the German boy George. "It was splendid of you Jack, and it is regrettable that I was not there to see you make the Glandelinian hobb like the four flags. Don't them off and hang them back where he found them."

"Oh Jack," she cried. "You were splendid. If all the Glandelinians are like this—"

"They are Susan," replied Jack grimly. "Glandelinia is a nation of men like him. I thought you knew that by your experiences. What he even did to our flag the whole Glandelinian empire is trying to do to the Christian world."

"Then Abbleannia will go into the war," cried Susan regarding Jack with

At this event Max Anderson, the on-scene manager of fire-fight officials came riding on the bus a stout girl with a pretty but sensual face and bearing and was generally liked by all who knew her. With her was Angeline Jennings. Her eyes twinkled as she saw the authority with which all the young girl and boys bowed to their father and formed in line at the rear of the bus to meet them and then dissipated.

"Don't worry folks," she said. "I truly will though your minds are not much on business to day, and I don't wonder. To tell the truth too I'd be sorry if they were there. There always comes times when there is only one important thing in the world, and this is one of the times. I've just got to say to all of you things went on. I don't know what each of you is just planning to do in connection if a battle breaks out or if General William needs to go to Hansons at Fort. Each one of you must decide that water for themselves from things I've heard, seen, and experienced most of you are eager to go on whatever your duties are. I shall be very glad if the battle comes in to lose you girls or boys in any given hour by death, death of dismemberment for we were never more threatened by the fury of the war than now but I should be still more sorry to have any of you stay here in the rear, when Violet, and her sisters will need you at certain strategic positions during the battle if we come. I and Miss Jennings have been talking this thing over and we want to say to you that as far as duties are concerned you must not hesitate. We are not however going to let you do anything too risky by following your patriotic instinct because the enemy is mad now so we have decided that your duty will go as usual as long as there is no war even. these battles, we can do here again.

It was the brightening of morning that closed part of the middle of the month of the year—in the latter half of the rainy season referred to brightened and the day for some unknown unknown reason grew extremely hot in the east and north in the coming of what cried to be day, but was not. A young soldier looked out on the busy Indian encampments about him with that feeling of water degradation and loneliness which can appear before the human immense camp where all is new and strange to him suddenly—both upon or more had passed, since the noise of a falling bell had fallen and it took his ears—and he had asked into a grave where they said his mother after she had been taken from the place in which she had floated for a month. He saw many others had perished in the flood; and this young soldier by no means belonged to some other army and not those under Grouard at the time as was now a orphan, and alone in the wild, wild, wild world. He knew that a great violent war was raging, and after getting his mother killed and finding the flood had not let anything for him he had fled from the army, but had seen sent with a message to general Givins, and has therefore come to this great army and therefore on the hot dingy dark morning with the smoky atmosphere had copper red skies in the west, and during the last went forth along to bear the message, seeking the hollow jaws of the great fire, pursued frequently by javalined and patrole, and with no other recommendation than the frank honest expression of his handsome face, being pursued as often by the enemy, being fired once every spot of observation dimmed over ten hills, and threatened with death by fire it had been rather very discouraging, and it had been wearisome work, and once when there had yet been no sign of rain or any of the previous kind in sight his heart had begun to misgiving him as the day after another he went through these adventures which though exciting was not to him liking.

"It was very foolish in me to make it this attempt," thought he as he had finally reached the tent of general Starring which was that general headquarters. Just then his eyes caught the sign on the flag on the pole and the name of the general he was to take the message to sounded to him verriir

He did not know who he was, but he was struck by a tall, thin man who looked like a soldier, and who had a sword at his side. He was a tall, elegant looking man, and he was looking at him with a look of surprise. He was a tall, elegant looking man, and he was looking at him with a look of surprise. He was a tall, elegant looking man, and he was looking at him with a look of surprise.

All all little girls will, why it was in if he did think of her so much why he didn't say so and come and see her. All boys and without any question about it had the strongest claim to her love, as well as of the other girls, but then Walter Starling, though young, too, was a general of high rank, a guardian of a lot, and her sisters, and could he have known how much real satisfaction she felt in thinking that he still remembered and felt interested in her, she then should have felt like a sister to him.

At this moment Susan remembering Angelina Jones's command, decided to see what she wanted. Gertrude offered to accompany her, and therefore both set forth on horseback. The German Street because of the heat was hot and dusty, and they and their horses were covered with dust before they reached the outskirts of Angelina's camp. A company of soldiers was passing by, mostly officers, and one of them was General Hance, and he saved his hand to Susan who bowed in token of recognition.

Soon they had reached the destination of Angelina Jones's headquarters. Leaving Gertrude at another part of the camp Susan proceeded at once to Angelina's headquarters. The guard looked kindly on her, and asked whom she would like to see.

She answered the guard kind of timidly for she fancied that Angelina Jones must have heard falsehoods about her, and that she had treated her with some coldness, and therefore she felt some anxiety with regard to the reception she was likely to meet.

"Is Miss Jones at home?" she asked of the guard.

"Yes she is home," replied the guard, "but is busy holding a meeting."

"She told me to report here at one o'clock. Tell her Susan Carol is here if you please," said Susan trying hard to think of the "friend" which always came upon her when she found herself before a superior girl scout. The guard conducted Susan into the parlor and departed with her message to Angelina Jones, who had just about adjourned the meeting. The door of the meeting room was open and from her position Susan could hear distinctly every word which was said.

"Angelina Jones said Susan," she said as you wished to have some word by the name of Susan Carol is in the parlor, and said she had not seen her."

"Susan Carol," repeated Angelina Jones, "Oh forlorn I've almost forgotten that I told her to come. Why didn't you tell her to come in my name?"

"I didn't want to have her disturb your meeting," answered the guard, "while one of the girl scout officers who had attended the meeting in disguise surprised me."

"Susan Carol, the orphan girl, why didn't she come in?"

"In a half vexed half laughing tone Angelina Jones replied,

"Why, thought you knew the orphan girl."

"I do not to speak to though," returned the girl. "Well if I ever she adopted her."

"We one did so far," was Angelina Jones answer.

"The girl then said, I must see her, for if she is anything like the others, I shall love her instantly."

"Oh she isn't like me," said Angelina Jones with a smile. "I hope she will be though, as she is smart enough though though believe me, and she sure has a fine, polished and refinement. She doesn't come here often but only when she is sent for, but I sent for her because I have something I wish to talk to her about, something which brought me to the girl scout school this morning."

"I guess it's best not for me to go down until I'm properly uniformed," returned the other girl, and Angelina Jones throwing in her thin arm black descended to the parlor where she met Susan first with the simple "Ah Susan how do you do?" then after several common place remarks remarks Angelina Jones asked:

"How did you know I was home at this time. It's only twelve thirty."

"I told you to come at one."

"George Zimmerman told me," said Susan.

"George Zimmerman," repeated Angelina Jones, "and pray how did he know where I had placed myself since I changed my headquarters?"

Susan told her and then Zimmerman said:

"I told you to come here for one reason. Do you know Margaret Jordan?"

"No I do not," answered Susan. "Who is she? I do not believe she is one of the girls of acquaintance."

"Do you remember the man who accepted you one day, and Margaret was in the camp?" asked Angelina Jones.

"Yes," said Susan, glancing nervously toward the door. "There was some one following me when I came here with Gertrude, and it isn't necessary for him or her to know who I am."

By this time some of Angelina Jones's officers had come into the parlor. "This is the orphan girl I was speaking about," said Angelina Jones.

The girl scout officers showed a great interest in the little orphan girl but one of them lifted but, "I don't believe they are coming here. It is after quarter to one."

"It is likely they are detained," returned Angelina Jones. "I wish we had asked that good general Hance recently which part of the camp he was going to do next. Then by the way of saying something more to Susan she continued, 'Oh you ought to know what an adventure I had yesterday. It was the most miraculous escape ever had for me, and my squad should certainly have been captured or killed if the most magnificent magnificent looking gentleman of a general hadn't dashed up with a large squadron of Abyssinians. With a Cavalry and clashed with my horse. Just in time. My horse was shot, and he had rode up just in time to prevent me being thrown or caught under the horse as it gave way and fell. You ought to see or ought to have seen the scene. It was the grandest skirmish ever known and the Gaudelians were beaten and had to retreat for dear life."

Susan replied that she herself thought he was a rather handsome general. "You want there did you see him?" asked Angelina Jones in great surprise.

"He visited me in school this morning."

"Sure that can't be the one," returned Angelina Jones, "while one of the other girl scout officers too said:

"Certainly not, our cavalier never saw the inside of a girl scout school yet."

"I know positively sure he came and visited our military teacher, Miss Maud, Angelina said Susan, and then she related the circumstances of general Fredrick Hance meeting with her at the spot too just where Angelina Jones came so near having a fatal adventure with the Gaudelians' Cavalry.

"Did he go to Gertrude with you?" asked Angelina in a tone plainly indicating that a negative answer was expected.

Susan understood the drift of her superior's questioning, and promptly replied:

"Yes he went with me to Gertrude's headquarters, and stayed to dinner. And he was talking long with her and when he said anything he always looked toward me."

As Angelina Jones's friends lowered, while one of the girl scout officers officers whose name was Florence, an exclaimed:

"I declare, what is in the wind, for the general would not come to speak to you that way for nothing."

"Pshaw," said Angelina Jones, "He just came to see her. Nothing wrong in that" while Florence again turning to Susan asked:

"Did you learn his name? If you did, you are very fortunate, for he and his party came all the way to camp and home with us too, with Miss Jones on his own horse and he doing the walking and you a general, and besides that he said a good many words too."

"His name," returned Susan, "is Fredrick Hance, he told me, on the way to Gertrude's, and he is in general kind of things I believe."

"Fredrick Hance, Fredrick Hance," repeated Angelina Jones. "I know him, never heard any one mention him, anyway we know this general then for when he aided us he, or we didn't go get a good look at his face. It was one of the better generals of the Princesses. There is something up his sleeve or he wouldn't come here."

Here Florence again looking down the road, exclaimed:

"I believe he's coming now."

Both girls rushed to the window, but it was somebody else, and when they were retreated Susan very gravely remarked, that he probably was now in general Hance's army as she saw him with a troop of Cavalry officers headed that way.

"Why really," said Angelina Jones, "You seem to be well posted in his affairs. Perhaps you can tell us why he came visiting your class. He said he had some business to transact."

Susan knew nothing about it, and Angelina picked up, thinking aloud continued. "Well, Susan, I called you here, because I'm suspicious. I don't know myself who that Margaret Jordan is, but she has been telling things about you that every one of us know isn't true. She's been shadowing you like an eagle or a falcon shadow its prey. I've got a hunch to give you. You too, Susan, keep your eye on her. Maybe she is not what I think, but never theless she needs watching. She may be either just trying you to see what she's up to, or she may be only a stall on her part, or she may be one of those smuggled Glandelinian scoundrels in our ranks. If she is well, well, find out, soon enough. And there comes Little Turner, and the rest of the girls. Susan, I guess you'll have to go or if you'd rather remain or not, you'll have to choose me. For I must pin up and change my uniform. By the way, wouldn't you like to meet them if you would just remain by the door, you can stay that long as school begins. I'll be there." Susan went out toward the front door meeting Little Turner and the rest of Miss Pickers staff face to face. Florence was in the parlor with Angelina, who was refreshing and quickly questioned by Little as to whom was the new girl scout they met in the front. "That's Susan Carol, a girl scout of our own Rangers' said Florence. Then, entering her voice to a whisper, she continued:

"Don't you believe she'll make a good scout." "She certainly looks the part," answered Little, but this little girl, who does she come by?

"In Miss Jennings' company," she should be a fine girl scout all right. "Well," returned Little, "she should be a fine girl scout all right. I heard she is facing unknown dangers." "How can you say so?" "Our camp," explained Little, "is in a breath and Little replied, "Perhaps not. It's only what I hear. She knows a secret which is a danger to Mandy and the new government. If she ever lets it out." "Why don't she tell Nellie contemptuously. It's serve Glandelinian right." "The better," answered the staff, and Angelina Pickers having accomplished her change of uniform came tripping down the stairs in time to welcome Rose Glum whom she embraced as warmly as if a little eternity instead of a few days had elapsed since they met.

"I had perfectly despaired of your coming," said she, "oh how sweet you do look. But where's Jenny?" "She's with Susan."

"I forgot to ask her," continued Angelina, "how does Susan come to be wounded?" "Her life he cutled so fearfully as she replied: "Why a day or so ago she met a company of Glandelinians in the road, and you know how Glandelinians are to us kids. If it was not for me and a company of soldiers under Starring, we'd have no Susan here to day. She just now has met Jenny your sister in the company street outside your gate, and I couldn't drag her away. She wants to go back to school." "And who is Susan Carol?" asked Miss Little Turner. "Rose," answered Angelina, "she's who said, 'Why she's the little orphan girl you met going out the yard.'"

"Oh yes," returned Little, "she's to be here? I have noticed her in camp. With all of us every morning at 8:30. Communion and should like to get acquainted with her. She has a fine eye and a forehead forehead."

Angelina Pickers though she wanted to dare not just then tell Little Turner that Susan was shadowed, so she answered that Susan couldn't not or would not stay during the afternoon as she desired to resume her schooling. But if she wished she'd sent after her and have her brought back.

Jenny now came bounding in her cheeks glowing, and her eyes sparkling like diamonds. "I'm late I know," said she, "I met Susan in the road and I never know when to leave her. I succeeded in taking her home with me as there's somebody somebody one of two who seems to either be shadowing her or us. I called and commanded but no one showed or answered." Instantly Little Turner's eyes were fixed upon Angelina Pickers, who had colored scarlet at the report, the others looked at each other, and then Angelina Pickers quickly changing the conversation, after whispering something to her side-de-camp she commenced talking about her almost fatal adventure of the evening before, and of general Mance's rescue in time.

"Oh," said Jenny who generally managed to talk all the time. "Yes," Susan told me about him. He was in her school class this morning. He was watching her too, and the first suspicious character that moves toward her, well I wouldn't want to be that party. You never did see general Starring, did you?"

"I said Angelina Pickers," I do not believe of you. I did too, I guided him through the Abbeian district. But it seems to me, I said, and her sisters do not seem to be so dreadfully anxious to solve the mystery of the explosions or maybe they're discouraged and have given up."

"No they ain't discouraged," answered her sister. "If it seems impossible for any one to find it out, I told Susan that I rode past the camp school grounds this morning, and should have called had I not seen a general there in don't know with the military teacher. Of course I asked who the general was, and she told me about him, and how he saved you and your squad from the Glandelinians who had attacked you."

She had known all about the situation, the progress of the disaster and so forth, and because of what she had seen and heard so far during the conflict though she did not cheerfully and jolly jolly Angelina Pickers temper was never the best, and when she heard many other bad details it was fast giving way and by the time all the staff officers were all gone she was fairly in a fit of the pouter, gunning upstairs, and throwing herself upon the bed, she burst into a flood of tears, wishing wishing herself back home and saying that that was the way, no one was trying to do anything to do anything against the enemy.

Florence who was terribly distressed, of course rightly guessed that what Angelina felt mostly had about on this occasion referred merely that no one could solve the explosion mystery of Abbeian. Angelina Pickers was always strong willed, and had had her exposed some good news from the Abbeian region, seeming to consider it the only chance to win the war hastily and consequently could not bear to know that even her friends, Violet and her sisters still had not accomplished anything. The fact too that nothing could be done by a military man to stop the "Red Plague" of the forests was a sufficient reason why she should be thoroughly angry. Florence however knew that the surest way of calming her out of her peevish fit, was to encourage her, and accordingly she repeated at least a dozen complimentary speeches on the situation some of which she had already heard from others, while others she had made up for herself. In this was therefore the cloud was gradually lifted from her face and ere long she was laughing merrily at the idea that Violet and her sisters could not succeed on anything if they really made it up tatten their minds to do so.

"Oh Jane won't you please do me the kind favor and take this old pillow from my head and remove some of this thin blanket off of my feet, and give me some wa' water or something! Oh dear dear, but this wound sure pains!" groaned poor Rose Glum, as with aching head, and aching wound in her shoulder, she did penance for her imprudence in crossing a country road outside the christian lines in front of an oncoming squadron of Glandelinian wheelers and caused a desperate battle for her life between her followers. Jane who knew nothing of how she got so fearfully wounded loudly lamented the extreme danger so many of the girl and boyscouts usually ran into, imputing it wholly to the fierceness of so many of the Glandelinian patrols, and wishing as she often had done before, that she'd been wise and made Rose remain within the christian lines. Jenny and others wished so too, if by this this means the Rose's injury could have been avoided, and she too did all she could for the girl who tossed, and turned, and fretted since her injury, somethin sometimes wishing the war was over, and then crying when the wound pained the most, and her head and neck ached from the inflammation set in by the wound.

"Oh dear, oh dear," said she, that evening after the commencing commencement of her illness produced by the wound. "How provoking to be obliged to lie here moping with the dullness of all dull company, when I should be out on duty. Why in the world did this had to happen at such an ungenious time as this. They only yesterday shot and wounded poor Susan Carol, and now they got me the vandals."

Jenny knew that whatever answer she would make would not now be the right one, so she said nothing, and after a moment Rose again spoke: "I'll go and report to duty sick or well, I'll show the Glandelinians. I would not miss service for my country for all hell."

"This time Jenny looked up in surprise, asking why Rose was so particularly anxious to go on duty in her condition."

"Because," returned Rose, "Susan Carol and others will be there, and you know

"Yes," answered Jenny, "that is why the Glandelinaps wish to capture or kill her."
At this time she got very angry, complaining that that was exactly the way that the enemy was the same with the Vivian Girl Princesses. It's too bad that I'd like to see Manley place a price over my head. I'd fling it in his sleepy face."

"You've changed the old story concerning your thoughts about that Manley general, and with regards to Susan," said Jenny.
"Why shouldn't I," answered Susan. "I always thought Manley, a sleepy faced foolish, and how he persecutes Susan and all of ours because we want to find out what really happened at Abbeville that I'm thoroughly disgusted. Because there was good general Friedrich Nante and his companion, Ned Perkins, now at Susan's headquarters, where they sleep at night. A special favor too.
The old was dark and smoky, but nevertheless looking out. Jenny saw Ned Nante, Perkins, and another man, mounting the steps that led to the headquarters headquarters, where they sleep at night. A special favor too.
It's funny that the two should be together on the same errand with another man. I thought she said she continued to see him. I thought she said she continued to see him.
Nothing will surprise me now. If those two generals are going away, and get her to tell her story. I'm glad, idiot, and her sisters are away, the present, though I fancy we've got too much good sense to think that Susan will tell anything without their permission or advice for she remembers their warning well."

General Vivian who had been wounded in the foot, had always expected that some day or other the Glandelinian general might strike a blow at him, and therefore that was the reason why his own army had not been caught napping, but neither he nor his officers had ever expected that any attack should be made, have been surrounded with such force and violence. He felt sure he could hold his ground till night fall in the assurance that general Raymond, Richardson Federal did not come up to join Manley, and therefore thinking it the best plan he decided to strike back before the discomfited Glandelinians could recover from the shock. And the fact that he had received a notice from General Hanson, who had received word of Manley's plans from Radcliffe, was with him on the way to help him give general Vivian encouragement for his plans. A go though he was wounded in his head, he did not think he had been hurt. General Vivian was the word for the whole front line to go forward. Immediately, advising General Ochsman to try and strike Manley on the left flank. The attack was made, the battle was renewed with redoubled fury, but all the fiercest Christian attacks availed nothing, and brought on dreadful losses. The enemy position was maintained most stubbornly and though six successive onslaughts were made the enemy resisted gallantly with little loss to himself, but with great loss to the assailants.

During the afternoon Manley tried his most energetic efforts to drive general Vivian's whole army from its position but also failed on this occasion. General Manley not forgetting that general Hanson's army was present, all would have probably fared well in the end, but toward the close a portion of that army had arrived in the field and general Vivian was again reinforced. Matters, the other portions of Manley's army not engaged with general Vivian had been struck by a portion of Hanson's army, and though it fought three hours most desperately along a wide front, it was a fearful loss. A portion was captured or forced to surrender, and the remainder drove from the battlefield in a hasty flight. The night was a fearful one for the Glandelinian army. General Hanson sent word by telegraph to general Federal that Manley was attacking general Vivian, but was in danger from general Hanson, who had sent him word up on time, to take the Glandelinian general at a distance, and by night fall, Manley had been forced to withdraw his armies to their positions with the hope of renewing the conflict with better results on the morning. But by night general Hanson's army also had made a junction with general Vivian, and on the morning the battle was renewed by general Charles Brown, who by night general Manley's army continued to give way. And by noon the conflict was over, and Manley had retired to such secure positions that it was too dangerous to attack him further. That night on the second day of the conflict, Federal had arrived, but the battle was over and it was useless for him to try to retake any lost positions. Had it been he had desired to do so, Manley cautioned him not to try, for it would be disasterous.

General Federal who had believed in "preparation" for the attack, he told general Hanson that general Johnston Jackson Manley, but he was not a little doubtful of general Johnston's plan, and therefore during that night following the recent action planned to strike general Hanson the biggest blow of all. Federal had decided to try it at midnight but all of his generals opposed the idea feeling that it would mean disaster, for they said that the Christian generals are this early being able to see in the dark, and so it was that at midnight ten thirty the following morning before he moved with his army to strike general Hanson first, while he prepared to strike general Johnston's army.

General A. Vivian's army was driven from its position, the main line stood its ground, and with the approach of night fall the battle ended with the situation on both sides the same, the Glandelinian army entirely exhausted, and discouraged.

The way this battle resulted put general Manley and some of his generals in some trouble, give anything if his own general Johnston Manley were there, but for some reason he had refused to move forward after this disastrous results of the battle of Battle of Evangeline St. Claire. Manley indeed was desperate. Seeing how Federal had tried and failed, showed him all was waiting. On the following morning the Christian decided to try and cut Manley and Federal away from their strongest works. Consequently, Manley was voted to strike first during the night, and therefore at six A.M. in the morning, the whole force moved forward, in three strong columns many miles long, and the heaviest attack of the entire battle at that quarter was made against general Manley's front, while a fourth column moved against his rear and flank. Strong as was the Glandelinian position in the center an enormous wave of Christian troops broke through, and partly carried all before them, but the main body of the enemy closed with them and they were hemmed in and fell fighting to the last. As some could surrender, the battle raged furiously till noon time, when general Johnston's army notified general Hanson, that to take general Manley's works by direct assault was absolute suicide, and that his losses had been fearful. At once the Glandelinians led by general Jackson, Thompson, Jackson, and others made a terrific general counter charge upon general Johnston's army. The attack was general all along the line, but the Glandelinians were moved down in waves for every thrust, and though it therefore was impossible for general Johnston to take the enemy's works, it was equally impossible for the enemy to take general Johnston's works; they could not get within one hundred feet of general Johnston's works, though they tried to hold them. The losses of the battle on this occasion were indeed very great, and many of his officers were wounded or killed, and a battery had been captured and changed off.

Hanson's assaults upon general Federal had been equally futile, but were stubborn and persistent, and for a time the Glandelinian army was in confusion and disaster increased because at the hottest part of the day general Federal was wounded and driven from the field in a critical condition. General Johnston's army took general Johnston's place and killed his portion of the line, and held the works firmly against the desperate attack of Hanson's army, and then ordered a Federal "off" to the attack, and led it in person only to receive a wound himself in the first movement, by this general attack general Johnston's army was out of commission, and general Johnston's army in general, the place had to send him strong forces to restore the destroyed army before the enemy gained too much ground. Up to this time of the war duration this battle lasting for the first ten or eleven days action was the most bloody and stubbornly contested battle of the war, but after that was suddenly ended, neither side would give up, and neither could take the other. Manley hurled his armies upon general Johnston's army after the other, in endless succession all day long, only to suffer a loss of sixty thousand men, and five hundred thousand wounded or captured every time. Then the Christian side counter charged their losses was equally as terrible. General Johnston's army saved his own left wing from a Glandelinian attack of terrible force, led by general Jackson, Thompson, Jackson, and Johnston's army, though at least twenty minutes to do so. The Glandelinians had struck on both flanks of the left wing simultaneously, and it took the bringing up of heavy reinforcements and orderly supports to check the charge, even the light and most steady cannon and machine gun fire, though it killed the Glandelinians down in great numbers for every discharge failed, as these guns were finally captured.

General Johnston was killed, however, and thirteen other generals wounded, and at six o'clock in the evening these Glandelinians having lost one hundred thousand men gave way leaving three million wounded on the field besides. The widest attack of the battle occurred at seven o'clock in the evening, and it was directed against only Hanson's whole line this time, while it was all quiet elsewhere. Hanson repulsed his assailants this time at every quarter without further help and rolled up the Glandelinian wave of assault all the way back to their position positions, but all his efforts to take the enemy's works was unavailing, and he was driven back with fearful loss in men and wounded, and a great number captured. Master at this time would not fully have occurred to him, but general Johnston's army came up in portions, and the assailants were tearing Hanson's army to pieces gradually.

"Again Mike, I suppose you go down the Company Street and get me a new jacket for my coat? I didn't have it--for I'm back upon going; and the cold--thought less--I'm back--spring lightly upon the street floor, and walked half way across the road to the room to show how well and strong she was. However, she understood that this little protest was useless, but however, knowing she couldn't get it, and refused to go for the jacket, and she also--she was sent with a note from me saying she wanted a nice looking red jacket."

if Jones heard the last part of this statement, she did not heed it, for to her the general's fall or his other falling was preposterous when the breakfast call would be all the time. She then, at her girl's look and went to the mess hall and despite the pain of her wounds chattered, chatted merrily with a group of girls and officers who had called to see her at home, and on when General Viviani's troops go busy in earnest. The messenger, who had been sent to the Habsburgs, returned with a letter from the Emperor, in which he was informed that the Emperor had decided to send a large force to the aid of the Italians. The messenger also brought back a letter from the Emperor's wife, in which she expressed her sympathy for the Italian cause. The messenger then returned to the Italian camp, where he was met by the Italian General. The General then ordered the messenger to be taken to the Emperor's camp, where he would be able to deliver the Emperor's letter. "You sure do look the part, and God bless your undertaking with success" said one of the boyscouts. When all was complete, Bob stood up before the camp.

Just then the door opened and Jane again appeared more simply arrayed than before but looking as fresh and blooming as a rosebud.

There, then, came a hail from the outside, and a cry from one of the boys that the horse was waiting, and throwing on their thin army cloaks and hoods

With authority from George, I replied: "General Vivian has my permission to let Stanley go as soon as he pleases. I shall visit him from time to time, then taking his hat, he left the tent to make the rounds of his part of the camp while Patro continued his spiel as follows:

who put that good-bye thing in there. I was in everything right as they were, I was a sergeant and he was a captain and wrote to Gertrude in England. I never wrote what he could not tell her about. The situation was that I had there been a lingering doubt of her acceptance of the idea of her marrying me. For her worry he would undoubtedly have wasted at least a dozen sheets of the sheet, tiny gilt edged paper, but as it was one was enough, for he was a good writer. He would send General Vinton the warning almost before he really read it. So the note which contained a so invidious warning of the dangers lurking in the plan of his marriage was written, sealed and directed. And then there was a general way on the door. Henry wished to push it in, but his father which was lying upon the table, had been received as a gift of his friends.

Jonny said he, grasping at her dress as she passed him on the way from room to room, "I don't hardly want to tell you something like that, but I'm sure you'll be able to handle it." He then turned to the left and walked at the fragments of glass from the picture frame; then at Petro's flushed face, and then instantly conjecturing that he had been on the left wing said a most reproachful name to his mother.

The sudden exclamation of joy, the cries thrown so affectionately around him, the hot tears upon his cheeks, and the kisses and warm hand-shakes outstretched upon his lips, helped him to justify his purpose, and not for his sake alone there had been made, but for the sake of the country, the road for the men off he said.

"I suppose" said Penrod angrily "that Marley will be proud as Lucifer because he'll hear that general Brian is wounded. I could tell you something alive, but that which the world would know would bring his pride down a peg or two. But answer me, why couldn't general De Chambliss Brown do it. Why couldn't he answer me, why couldn't he have come down here and looked Penrod fully in his eyes and said, 'I'm sorry, but I can't do it.'"

"You know as well as I," answered Jenny, "that General Viviani left his men driven back two miles from his position. Besides I wouldn't and one and tell you gold will help me succeed if nothing else will," said Perrod something up the note and hurrying away... For a time, after he had left the room, Jenny amid the clamor of distant battle sat in a kind of stupefied despair. That Perrod couldn't get the message through to its destination she was absolutely certain, and she trembled for the effect, direct, the failure would probably produce upon him. Other thoughts, too, crowded upon the young girl's thoughts, mind, and made her tears flow very fast. Perrod had hinted of something something else, that he would tell her, later, when he had the time, and her heart far too well comprehended what that something was. The heavy sound of so many distant cannons, the wild, like sound of us yells from the enemy assassins, and other confusion of sound, and the sound of some generals' footstep in the room next to this one, which recently had kept her awake the long night, the generals pale-haggard face in the morning, and the nervous and anxious manner of the vicar, and her sister told her that apparently ruin and disaster was hanging over the whole of the Abbeinnian states of the south, that all had to be closing, that was a dreadful unemployment situation, and a depression hanging over all borders of the borders and devastation of the war. In the middle of her sad reverie Perrod returned. He had not succeeded in delivering the note, and in trying to make the tip had "narrowly escaped from death" as his horse had been killed under him. Everywhere he had seen horror and panic as a head of the disaster to general Viviana, left, and that general Brown was striving his best to carry the whole christianian line, which was shattered. He then had telegraphed it and yet could not get any answer. It was like a rejection.

future prospects of the country. But who did not reproach the carelessness of some of the government officials of the Republic nor hint that their recklessness over confidence in the belief that the enemy could not make any big disaster or that other means of over confidence had hastened the calamities which might otherwise might possibly have been avoided... Finally she stated the extent to which three of the States, California, Angelina and Assiniboia were involved adding that though an entire failure might be predicted in a short time, it would come at last, and that another such disaster would leave the three States helpless, and at the mercy of the banding.

All this time Pedro did not say a single word, but he had been busy at work with his thoughts. He could not be busy in himself, he had no energy for that now, but he could not dare try to carry the message through hindered

He decided to petition Gertrude in person face to face. He reached the place in no time and as the curtains were being drawn back he could see

"I wish she was not so confounded by particular thought he, and, after he had been allowed to pass by the guard, he hastily rang the doorbell, however Gertrude was instantly realized who it was, and she sprang up immediately, and when Gertrude entered the parlor he found her across a ways her way standing in the middle of the room, where the full blaze of the chandelier fell upon her childish features lighting them up with radiant beauty. Her eyes were raised up to his and

Gertrude however noticed how excited he really was, and as she was always afraid of the dark, she began to slightly tremble, and without knowing what she said asked him:

"I glad I am to be able to make it. It's a hell of a thought. I'm glad, as he reached the open air and began to feel the fresh air more freely. Goodness, he won't lead a glorious adventure, eh, with the 'Landlithins' if they see me going through with this message. Now if she had hung back a little more, maybe it would be disastrous. But no, she said yes before I fairly got the words out; but her cause is good and must be saved. I beg your pardon Miss, she he quickly, as he became conscious of having accidentally but fairly jostled a young girl out of the way turning the corner of the house on Poughkeepsie, up he met Jennie Turner, large, eyes fixed rather inquiringly upon him. He was accompanied by Misses Macmillan and John McElroy, and he felt sure she was going to visit Gertrude Angelina. Of course, he thought Gertrude would tell her all, and what Miss Jennie Turner think when she learns he was going on this glorious adventure. In all the world there was not an individual for whose good opinion Turner really cared half so much as for Miss Turner, and the thought that if he really failed on his mission now damned him. He desperately carried it through and by his determination succeeded and through his plan saved the day, but never, nevertheless that night he himself watched and wept over General Vilyan for never before in the war yet had General Vilyan been so heartily wounded.

From one of the not too luxuriously furnished chambers of Gettruss headquarters Susan herself looked mournfully out upon the thick angry clouds black and gray white; and brown which the live long day before and now also this morning had obscured the September sky.. Dreamily to for a while she listened to the long continued roll of distant cannons and the strange pattering roar of musketry and the sharper noise of bursting shells and snappell as it sounded here,, and there, and then to recede, and then to come on ever only to go back again, and then with a long deep sigh she turned away and wept.. Poor Susan! the battle was again raging, and the way itself was smoky, dark, and dreary, but darker far were the shadows stealing over her own pathway and the pathway of hundreds and hundreds of others. Indeed turn which way she herself would there was not one single ray of light in the which even her buoyant spirits could gather, from the surrounding gloom. Her friends were too, as dying, slowly but surely, from the wounds she had received, revived; and when poor Susan, and even many others had thought of this that they felt that if poor Susan only live she would try and bea-the rent, try to forget also how much the very situation was. He knew the enemy country spurned Abbigannia with contempt.

"No, rather see the whole army dead, than beaten by such an enemy," said she to herself, and she knelt at the altar of the blessed Virgin and pleaded for the cause which she almost believed like a girl was fast slipping into the clasp of ruin. However Susan knew the Christian struggle, yet for some reason or other her heart grew faint, and her eyes dim with tears as she thought of the danger of the enemy conquering the cause she loved too well to sacrifice the love of society which had grown with her growth, and strengthened with her. At this point of her country, there was another reason too why poor Susan should weep as she sat there alone in her room. From Gertrude Angeline, and also from the conversation she had overheard from others she had heard of all that was about to happen. She heard of California's Bank, Rapture, and wonders in the wild world was there a place of refuge for the countless numbers of refugees, who were even fleeing from forest fire, flood, and the enemy and facing countless unseen horrible disasters and dangers, and yet by the score she had heard of enemy victories in other battles. It was all this, that poor Susan was so madly thinking of that dreary night morning, and when at last she turned away from the window her thoughts went back again to her friend Rose and she murmured, "Oh, dear God, if she could only live."

But the doctor truthfully said it could not be, she had been mortally wounded and Rose like the fair summer flower of which she bore must fade and pass away, and already she had received the last sacrament. For several days or the day after rather after she had defiantly gone out to view the battle, Rose had tried to keep up, but the laws of nature had been outraged, and now she would have to lay all day in a darkened room moaning with pain from her wounds, and also wondering why the fates of so many of those she had seen passing by and those around her were so sad and mournful.

"Susan," she said after the physician had left the room without a single word, "I hope you don't fancy I'm going to die so soon, of course I'm not, but suppose I am why fret over me?" Here she had suddenly a coughing fit, and after a few moments she continued, "Don't Walter Starring your friend, expected baby?"

"No," said Susan, "he is in command of the army to day, General O. Charles Brown is said to be wounded also."

"Good news you bring to me, well I must, and will be well before the battle is over for it will never do to yield the field to that Manley Jabber who they say is conspiring every way to get general Vivians out of here so we'll never learn the cause of Abbigannia, for he is striking like mad to day and all that. But how'd you ridulous General Hanson Vivian with his bigger army let General Manley beat general Vivians army? He has that that's rich, and the sick girl's fading cheeks glowed, and her eyes indeed grew brighter as the awkward idea just then one of the lieutenants entered the room. He had been consulting with the second lieutenant about the proposition of Gertrude Angeline of the plans of bringing Rose to some other part of the camp where the noise of the battle would not disturb her and where she would be safer, for there would be no telling when the enemy would suddenly burst through this portion of the camp and too would thus be saved the sad knowledge of general Vivians failure should it really happen as it was feared, and which could not longer be kept a secret, and besides that all of the boy and girls would sooner or later would be compelled to leave this portion of the camp, and Gertrude had judged it best to remove poor Rose while she was still able to endure the journey of those several miles. At first Gertrude Angeline wept bitterly, for if her whole force would have to be transferred she would also go, and because of threatening danger all the adventures she had dreamed of in the future had now no charms for the day girl's leader, who turned with disdain from the thoughts of what the future would bring, bidding her tearful eyes to the lieutenant's face, she said,

"Oh we can't go to that part of the camp now. Why don't Violet and her sisters bring us to the army of the West near Glenwood Village. Elsewhere the Glandelinians are attacking so fiercely and wildly that we could never endure the scene should our Christian armies get defeated here, and again Gertrude buried her face in the folds of her dresses thinking there was never a country in the world as wretched as California.

"Don't Gertrude, please don't," distressed me to see you feel thus," cried Penrod, "For as troops to move to a better location would be far more safer than remaining here, and then too—here she paused as if to gather courage for what he was next to say, and then too we can get Mary Glorinda to take care for poor Rose for her soul as well as her body."

"Yes Gertrude, we not need not decide ourselves longer, Rose per Rose is mortally wounded and she sure must die, and you know as well as I that you do not want to lose any more girl or boy accute than we can afford, though we been not able to afford even her, it's a good thing too that our training of them all has been such as to beat fit them for heaven."

For a long time Gertrude Angeline was silent, and then in a more subdued tone she said,

"So as you like Penrod, only you must tell poor Rose for I cannot do it."

Fifteen minutes or so later Penrod entered the sick girls room and bending affectionately over her pillow said,

"How do you feel to day Rose?"

"Better, better, almost well, but my wounds do pain," returned Rose training herself in bed to prove what she had said. "But I'm afraid I'll not be alive in a few days, and then what will you and the rest do. All the girls I believe are worried about, no more than how the battle is going to turn out, and here it is almost the time for noon."

Oh how Penrod indeed could hardly hold back and yet was afraid to tell the dying girl that she would not live to see the end of the battle. He longed to tell her but he could not have the heart. He was also the much in the hope that God by a sort of natural miracle would spare her to his troop, and therefore his confidence in God prevented him of speaking of her last days, therefore he would leave that in Marys keeping, so without answering her questions he said,

"Rose do you think you are able to moved to some portion of the camp further off where it's safer? The enemy is coming this way soon, having won and broke up a portion of general Vivians main line and we'll have to go or meet fate."

"What the enemy driving on to?" stammered that horrid brat Manley. "I thought we were going to win the battle?"

"No I cannot say we are going to lose it, but nevertheless the enemy might strike at our lines in this direction and we'd be in the midst of the horror. So it'll be better off to that part of the line where the bright eyed Mary was her camp. The army physician thinks you will be more quiet there, out of sound of the terrible battle, and she maybe able to pull you through. You know though a little girl's heart she's a great little Red Cross Nurse too."

Rose looked earnestly into Penrod's face to see if he meant what he said and then replied,

"I'd rather remain here and die with them all than see our army defeated in such a situation as our country is in now. You've no idea how I hate the Glandelinian and how wicked it is of course if you desire me to be moved all right, I like the bright eyed Mary's they call her she's so cheerful in all difficulties and the things in her tent are so homely and beautiful. But to think of the enemy breaking through, makes me feel as if some one I thought good to me coming and striking me in the face for nothing."

Penrod could hardly repress a smile at Rose's peculiar reasoning but perceiving that he must be decided he said,

"Of course you cannot remain here, the whole troop has to go, Gertrude said so, and every one accordingly are already making the necessary arrangements to move off and two are coming in a few minutes to take you. Jean Sanders and others will stay with you too, will be there till you either die or recover then not wishing to witness the effects of his words, he hastily left the room passing in the hall to wipe away the tears which despite himself would come to his eyes as he overheard Rose angrily wonder, "Why the enemy would be getting away with things just because she was wounded and not able to get up."

"I can't even bear the thought of such a army like Manley's ever winning."

"The slightest advantage in the battle never," said she laughingly and spitefully,

"and then to think of the ha-ha the enemy will give to find out the force of girl and boyscouts were forced to move because of dangers—oh its dreadful something I won't stand."

Jenny Rhodes heart too, was well nigh to bursting, for she had seen lots of trouble before she came, but she forced down her own sorrow, while she strove to comfort the wounded girl, and telling her not to worry herself if worse, for she really could not imagine what she had seen, though the enemy was breaking through, she could fancy how strong and able the main Christian line was, and then turned to the topic of how when her fever was on would be the clear cold water which gushed from a spring near a big tree by Mary's tent. Then she spoke of a beautiful little water fall not far from Mary's tent which made angels like and music all the day long, and as if soothed by the sound, of that far falling water, Rose forgot general Vivians trouble, and soon sank into a sweet refreshing slumber (pumper lumber) in which she dreamed that the joyful peaceful times had come, and that she and all her friends she had known in camp were well and strong, and that even those she had seen die had only been a optical illusion. While poor Rose was sleeping Jenny rushed stole softly down the stairs and throwing on her uniform cloak and hat, went across the company street, to confide her troubles with General Capel who sympathized deeply with her friend, but nevertheless was not surprised, for from her slight acquaintance with Rose, she could hardly believe a christian army so powerful and so well versed in the art of suffering a disaster in battle. All she could do to comfort poor Jenny who did bidding her to wait patiently, pray a hard and a long hope for the best for "said she" the battle was young yet."

After a few more remarks from Jenny she said it "Because they are not winning, now you are blue and dispirited and a little strol will do you good. Suppose we ride around a few blocks, or so, for see it is getting lighter and the sun is trying to come through the smoke, but see, how strange red the sky is."

Jenny consented, and they had hardly gone over half the length of this partly deserted company street, when the boy scout James Greene joined them. Therefore rightly guessing that for this time being her absence would not hardly be noticed, James suddenly turned into some other company street, leaving James Greene and Jenny in conversation among the pines. From that street Jenny returned to camp much happier than she had left it. She had seen this "strange" boy who had taken in all of the battle as far as he could observe it with personal safety had talked with him of the "last results of the day before," and of how the conflict was now turning out, what may happen for the future, and as light from his hopeful spirit the belief that all would be well for the christian army in time, and therefore therefore she was in a far more cheerful frame of mind as she reentered Rose's room, and when Rose, who was awake on account of the increasing noise of the battle had noticed the change in Jenny's appearance, and as she asked her, Jenny therefore told her, Rose heard her through, and then very kindly informed her that she should better wait for developments and not listen to everything not proved."

In a few minutes more preparations were commenced for moving all of the camp belonging to the girl and boyscouts to the glenview section of the camp and in the excitement of getting ready, Rose in a measure forgot the disaster threatening the christian line, and the fury of the enemy attack, the thoughts of which had at first gave her such a mighty shock.

"Oh, let me see that uniform," said she to Jenny, who was packing her military girl's bag with the purple cashmere one faced with yellow satin, and don't forget my best purple shirt, the one with so much work on it, for when the officers come to inspect us when we're in line I shall want to look as well as possible, and then too I like to see what will happen before to-morrow."

"What makes you think the officers will inspect us at such a time as this?" asked Jenny as she packed away uniform dresses the poor girl could will never wear."

"I know and that's enough," answered Rose and now Jenny before you forget it, put in my big cockaded hat for if I recover I shall want it, and see how nicely you can find the uniform dress only were yesterday."

"Why, Rose what now can you possibly want of that at this awful time?" asked Jenny.

"I will never wear it is, it is true but I want to show it to 'Bright eyed Mary' but for the love of God I wish to those men making about outside predicting that our army will yet come to ruin."

Jenny thought that if Rose could have seen the two wounded generals that morning and how wildly and furiously the enemy was going so wildly at the attacks, she would have wished that the actual battle was over, or that the chance of it was forever removed from her sight, for Jenny had heard how many soldiers would never return home. Early that morning two general Evans himself had even that all had pressed christian divisions should be reinforced, but of the situation then happening happening he knew nothing, until reports reached him that general Oliver Warbucks division was half destroyed and that the general had been brought from the field wounded severely and half blinded.

"I can't do nothing for that now," said he promptly to the officer who had brought the news. "General Hanson must be informed though. Tell general Dargenly will see him in a minute or two."

The officer who took the note had heard of the fast circulating rumor that a good portion of the christian line was about to smash up? and now afraid to confirm the report he rode back swiftly to his gender who muttered, when he received Evans message "Just as I expected" I'll damn our army anyway for what

I canfor the army of ours, and that I hope will tell on the foe by and by. My officers can't afford such losses to their troops, and I'm not going to take any such chances."

Of all this poor Rose nor any of the child about did not dream, and in Rose's estimation there was no end to the strength of general Vivians great army, and the possibility of his failing had never entered her mind, as she sure was being hard pressed and general Vivians left was being swept from the field in a second time general Henry Lincoln who was supposed to have come up to the support had failed and was wounded, and general Joseph had once hinted to Rose at the occasion of her once asking him how he could fancy any one could hold against General Vivian when there were so many troops to support him in his counter attack."

"I'm not making any guesses on what will happen," was his prompt answer, "and I assure you little girl, we are in need of general Hanson's assistance more to day than you imagine. The enemy is pouring all his strength against him." Rose however had not paid any attention to this speech and when she found that the enemy was demolishing the whole of general Vivians army she shuddered, swept herself into convulsions, as declaring that some of the officers may have been to blame for not having been watchful, that general Hanson and his soldiers were tired and had hearted, and that if she was not had ridden she'd do her part in saving general Vivians army."

"I should like to know what's to become of all of us if the enemy should rush in here now," said she. "Jenny is out scouting and it seems an unpardonable carelessness to allow an army to meet a single force without help. I'll not stand for this and that ends it. If the enemy want to get rid of me I can die fast enough here. They kill kids anyhow."

General Vivians had nothing to say, for she well knew she had trained her whole force of boy and girlscouts to a despise anything pertaining to what he called death, and not of God, and therefore she had a full array of fighting child soldiers who even when flying of wounds still wanted to fight."

During that early morning too "Bright eyed Mary" was busy in her preparation for the coming of the wounded girlscout. It that early morning did that little active girlscout nurse sit from one part of the big tent to the other dusting the faces tables and doing a thousand things which she thought would do to cheer the comfort of Rose. Her tent was at the foot of a small forested mountain and near a glenview junction was a small sheet of water left there by the flood which had been easily from there and with careful thought Mary had arranged the bed in the tent so the injured girlscout could look out upon the tiny lake and the mountains and other scenery beyond the sheets which covered the bed were snowy white, probably the last that Rose would ever rest upon. The tent also got and down were the pillows, and the patchwork quilts. The tent, rocking chair and an old fashioned carved mirror were placed in the tent, and then when all was done, "Bright eyed Mary" gave a sigh of satisfaction that it was so well well done, and closed the tent against any one else until Rose should arrive.

Through the rich curtains which shaded Rose's sleeping room the strange golden beams of a distant glaring forest fire were flickering and dancing lighting up the thin bandaged features of the wounded girlscout and a glow so nearly resembling health, that Jenny when she came to wish her good morning before the before the force of children moved on the march, started with surprise at seeing her look "so well." "Why, Rose surely you must be getting better," said she joyfully kissing the fair cheek on which the ray of forest fire light was resting. Rose however had not slept at all since she went out so early and she knew that this was the appointed hour for her dreaded journey to "Lemmy" for she feared every one would be attacked when they started away, and she burst into tears wondering.

"Why the 'Andelinians would persist in tormenting the christian army like this."

"It's only a pretended attack to fool general Charles Brown so to get him away from sending up reinforcements, I know," said she and you may as well confess it at once, you are all discouraged. I heard one officer say before you came that he had been in three wars since the last forty years, and never saw or met with a more cruel attack from any foe."

"Maybe that's true," said Jenny but general Evans told me that the army under General is tight and strong in its position."

"Yes but with the rest of the line already broken we are at the mercy of the waves of the 'Andelinian attack' and unless the situation changes we'll all be driven from Stomelotte before night. Listen to the firing, it's awful."

"You are only getting discouraged," said Jenny.
Gertrude Angeline now came into the room, but all her attempts to soothe her were in vain. She only replied:
"I am in the way. I am dying any way. Why not let the rest go forth, and let me stay here in this room, my own room. The enemy cannot do any more to me than he has. I am not in any more than in sorrow. I am trying to live as long as I can to see how the battle ends. If it is God's way, for I know the enemy would like to see a girl of my age as much as we can. No, that we would be out of their way for I know we are more dangerous than any of the soldiers to the enemy, and what is what the enemy wants to see us all destroyed. But that is why they are attacking general Vivians army so fiercely now."
"Oh, good," Rose, "none of us deserve that," said Jenny, raising her hand as if to say her friends should not think less words. While Gertrude lay, laying her face upon the pillow, and that her golden locks mingled with the dark tresses of the child, Rose, bitterly, very bitterly.
And still she could not dare tell her why she must leave this part of the camp. She would rather hear anything else than have her know what she was threatening to do. From a sudden shock the army doctor said night at any time and her life. Rose always had loved her comrades almost as if they had been her brothers and sisters. And when she saw Gertrude thus moved and saw what the cause was, she felt more sorry yet and laying her white arm across her chest said:
"If it pleases you, I will go with the rest to deliver her. But will I live longer there than here?"
"Much longer, Rose, much longer," said Gertrude, and Jenny rushed away as she feared not. Rose.
And so with the hope of escaping the dangers of the enemy, she was with the belief that she might live longer or recover entirely, she was with the suffering them to prepare her for the journey, which was to be performed by wagon. For the first time since the battle had begun, Penrod had this morning some what free for a while from duties. He had heard many say that Rose, or his about six weeks ago, was going to die, but he had believed it as a very unpleasant dream, but now he found it to be a reality. They had brought her down from the upper chamber and laid her on a stretcher in the part where Penrod was now. He had not seen her for over the five hours and when he found her lying there looking so pale and still, and saw her long white hair resting upon the colorless cheek and her small childlike white hands hanging listlessly by her side, he softly approached her, thinking her asleep, kissed her brow, cheeks and lips, whispering as he did so:
"Poor little girl, poor Rose, not a young and beautiful flower the enemy's victim of the enemy."
Poor Rose started, and, piping from her forehead, the tear the boy had unconsciously left there, she glanced anxiously around. Penrod was gone, but his words had awakened her to a new and startling idea. Was general Vivian really losing the battle? If so, she didn't care, whether she died or not, did they think so and was this the reason of Penrod's unusual kindness and sinking back upon her pillow she wept as only those who love and love as a cause as she did, she of "they feared it would come to a dreadful disaster, because the confiding foe was the more powerful."
"I cannot die—I will not die, I must live and battle my country father. What she at last rousing herself with unusual energy. "I ought to feel that within me that says I would like longer the air of heaven if the smoke clears away will do me good, and they say Bright Eyes, Marys skill in nursing sick and wounded girl, and boyscouts is most wonderful."
She was therefore consoled so consoled by these reflections and therefore she became more calm and she was almost impatient to go to that part of the camp near Glenview.
The wagon train bounded for that part of the camp and heavily guarded by heavily stood near her tent waiting for the signal to start, and just before the signal "all aboard" was sounded a handsome equi equipped drew up, and from it alighted Gertrude Angeline, and then a soldier bearing in his arms the little girlscout whose head rested wearily upon his shoulder. Accompanying them were a score of other girlscouts, privates and officers, Jenny, Angeline, Phoebe, Jean and Mildred Maxwell, and even Jack and Penrod and the military doctor, together they entered the biggest wagon assigned for them and instantly there was a hasty turning of heads to hide tears, a shaking of curls and cape and low mournful whispers and a look of interest toward the enemy, lines as each noticed and commented gratefully upon the loss of so many beautiful girl and boyscouts, and of the unspeakably beautiful beauty of poor Rose who in the soldiers arms lay as if wholly exhausted.

With the effort she had made. The sight of her, so young, and so fair, and so low hunched all unusual feelings. Rose was laid upon a long bench covered with blankets to make it a soft bed and Gertrude made her as comfortable as possible with the numerous pillows and cushions she had ordered brought. As the wagon train started forward, Rose asked that a part of the wagon canvas be raised a little higher in the rear and leaning upon her elbow she looked out upon the encampment which it seemed she was leaving forever. Some such idea was in her mind but she quickly repressed it for she was a strong hearted fighting girl, who would fight both death and the enemy and defy both to conquer out of their time and returned toward Gertrude, saying with a smile:
"I'll bet I'll be better when I see the south part of the camp again."
Gertrude turned away to hide a tear, for she had no hope whatever in seeing her recover from her wounds. But then she tried to hope for she remembered the day when through his foolishness and without looking to see if he was right or not one of her orderlies had reported both Jean Saunders and Jack dead, and who the day next morning were much "much alive". It did not take long to reach Glenview and though the battle in the distance had wounded older and more experienced men they met with no adventure, and Rose more fatigued than she was willing to even acknowledge, now that she was determined to get well and defy her would be murderers as lifted from the wagon, and carried into the tent assigned for Mary Glenview. This girlscout hastened forward to receive her, and Rose said:
"I feel awful sorry, I am where I can rest. My wounds are in terrible now too."
"With Mary leading the way," the soldier at Gertrude's direction carried the child to the tent chamber prepared for her with so much care.
"Her condition is far worse than I thought it was," said Mary returning to the outside, where Gertrude had thrown herself with a sigh upon a stool. "This is a great deal worse than I thought she was. Had she been out scouting too far into the enemy's territory, or been exposed to the enemy's fire in some way."
"Not in the least," returned Gertrude, "twirling the golden stopper of her smelling bottle. "The foundation of her injuries was laid when her hand and many others being recalled in a moment and we always count up our losses and take that many we lose out of the enemy and many more besides." Jenny's clear truthful eyes turned toward Gertrude who frowned sadly. And continued:
"She was as hearty and well as any one until she and Angeline, Phoebe, I and others wished to hike tramp general Vivians lines, and we got it too hot to suit ourselves. Never before had we met such an attack, and consider it my duty to warn all my officers against sending or bring their followers to any position at the camp without a strong military escort."
Jenny could not forbear saying that the doctor thought that the bullets that hit poor Rose must have been a sort of dum dum bullets.
"Is that so?" returned Gertrude. "Did he show the bullets to any one?"
"No," the bullets exploded.
"It's a good thing you told me that. I'm going to warn my whole troop, but Jenny I guess you had better go upstairs at once and see if poor Rose doesn't want something."
Jenny obeyed very willingly, and as she entered the tent room where poor Rose lay the sick child lifted her head languidly from her pillow, and pointing to the tent entrance which had been left open when Jenny entered said:
"Just listen don't you hear that horrid firing so near us?"
Jenny almost laughed aloud, for she knew that Rose had always heard that horrid firing more than a score of times since she had become a girlscout, but now when there was possible danger of general Vivians great army losing the battle everything must in necessity of course assume something of a goblin form and sound. However Jenny had never heard any sounds as of baltham yells of the enemy, and therefore she was somewhat assured that Rose's fears were almost a fancy.
Sitting herself upon the foot of the bed, she firmly said:
"Why that's reinforcing christian troops in action. I'm sure we won't lose in the final end."
Jenny's whole heart was in the country's cause, and she therefore could well sympathize with her nervous sensitive friend, who shrank from the feared possibility of a Bandolinian victory, and the sounds of battle which gave tokens of an enemy's successful advances. Accidentally spying some tall branches swaying in the evening breeze before the southwest opening of the tent (the tent), she again pointed to Jenny telling her to climb to the top of the tree and see if she can observe from that height how the battle was turning out. "For if the enemy does win," said she, "I shan't sleep to night."
Of course Jenny went, and then after assuring her that she could not see anything because of so much battle smoke, but believed that everything was all right, Jenny added:
"I love to hear the christian troops in a charge howl their big battles cries and were it not for your condition, I should wish to witness a great christian attack, so that I could go a short distance with them and watch it."

"Yes, and then you'd be like me," retorted Rose. "Be wise Jenny. The Glandelinians don't care who they shoot down these days..."

When it grew darker because of the forest fire smoke in the sky again, Jenny was told to close the tent entrance for Rose feared the smoke would gain entrance.

"How are you making up some of this?" said she. "For you know as well as I that even if we closed it the smoke could come in any way."

"Oh good night so it could. Oh Mercy me what shall I do?" said poor Rose crying with vexation. The stuff these tents too are made of are worst than nothing, and if a fire should surprise the camp we all would be losers."

"The fire will have a great way to come then," said Jenny. "For from this tent the ground descends in every direction and there's a clearing around us two miles in extent, and a lake too is not too far away. Besides that the wind is not blowing from the direction of the Red Flag." "How could it come here?"

Rose of course did not know, but she was sure a forest fire if not enough could easily and swiftly advance against the wind.

In a few minutes a bright-eyed Mary came in with one of the nicest little breakfasts on a small tray.

"Rose is afraid the forest fire or the enemy will come here," said Jenny.

"Forest fires and the enemy come here," said Mary. "Well they better not try it."

Here Rose added "sit up and see. If you can't eat a mouthful of so-called brought some broiled chicken, several slices of toast, some current jelly that some raider secured from the enemy, and the best cup of blackest tea you had ever drunk, and lastly is two eggs."

"Sweetened with brown sugar, isn't it?" said Rose sipping a little of the tea.

"Yes we are out of white sugar but many persons loved brown just as well."

"High, listen to that explosion somewhere," gasped Rose. "The sound almost shocked me sick, and I'm afraid now, can't eat a bite but I'll fight it and try and keep it off her belief the food rapidly disappeared, while she alternately after, nearly made fun of the way the Glandelinians soldiers fight, and found fault."

because General Manley was an "ass" and always wore such a big round hat that looked more like some huge "washbow" turned upside down. Still a few hours that day and was into the evening did Rose keep the whole camp full near her on the alert with her remarks of the enemy's fight.

"Dear me," said Mary when she was preparing for supper. "How like a fighting girl scout she is. I should suppose that there would be no more like her. I believe she'll get well in spite of what the doctor says. I'll pray that she does, she cannot be spared."

She called one of the girl scout officers and brought out her little black wallet and forcing two ten dollar bills into Jenny's hand whispered, "Take it and pay for two High Masses for Rose's recovery. The army priest will do it for nothing I'm sure but I won't ask him if he refuses to take it. Make him or stick it into his pocket when he doesn't see you, must have two Masses."

and all this time the girl was fretting and muttering about the cowardly way the Glandelinians attack and murder children, and all other things it is known they did.

Because of the enemy threatening to make a surprise at any spot, of this part of the camp at any time without the slightest warning, now therefore the most momentous step had been taken by the whole force of boy and girl scout forces to move off to Glenview another portion of the camp, and therefore every one of them had buckled down to the best of their ability, and therefore also kept watch through the work of the hardest and the most exciting kind.

They broke camp amid the distant sound of the great conflict, and hastily left their positions, with Penrod, and a guide, a girl with a hearty good cheer from the troops and with the assurance that they would find the whole army ready to cover them in case the enemy was threatening to make a roundabout move, and follow them.

However the only gloomy member of the child scout army was one of the boy scouts whose name was Frank Glandelin who had to remain behind to guard the region and give the alarm if he saw anything of the right.

"Hang the dirty Glandelinian soldiers," he growled. "Why do the fools want to drive us kids out of here for?"

"Never mind dear friend," comforted Jack Gunders. "Perhaps some one else can fix it up, anyway you know it is duties that makes us sometimes do things that is not pleasant. Anyway you can rest for us kids if you can't go along right away."

"Not much cheerfulness in that," grunted Frank refusing to be shaken from his attitude of settled gloom.

"It is pretty hard to bear, I know," remarked Jack after Francis had left them

"I don't think Gertrude ought to have been so particular. Why not have a man stay and guard our camp, anyway the time may surely come when we'll all be needed."

"Perhaps so," agreed James Stanton. "But Gertrude knows best I suppose, and the times is going to be very hard for us and therefore all of us will have to have a pretty high level of physical condition."

"I believe you might be more than right," said James, adding "suppose one of us when we were on watch got a good hard toothache toothache, you can't expect to have your guard post to go to an army dentist."

"Maybe not but as far as that may be," Frank took him up quickly grinning at the picture that rose before his mind. "It might be possible anyway that any one of us if any one of us had a good hard toothache it would be something of an asset indeed. I know if I had a good toothache when the Glandelinians were making attacks upon me, I would be so mad I could kill a dozen of those scoundrels."

alone single handed. Anyway a good fight would put your mind off of your agony."

James also grinned.

"Yes, and it would have another advantage. I believe if I had a sharp pain in any one of my teeth I wouldn't care whether I died in a fight or not, given getting stabbed with a bayonet or killed by a shell or blunderbuss that would be able almost to feel it."

"Maybe that's so," laughed Francis. "I could feel like I was sick passenger who on board ship during a storm and rough sea would admit his illness, believe he was doing so dis any time, and afterwards would be afraid he would live forever in his misery. I suppose in our general battle lines throughout the whole war some Emperor vivian figures it figures it out in this peculiar way. He went on if a long chain no matter how strong and solid it may be has only one link even slightly weak the whole chain would soon burst asunder. You see you know how it is in a crowd of soldiers trying to wedge itself against a desperate foe attack. A whole platoon might not be able to withstand an assault of two or three platoons, but if two or three are put up against the assailants the enemy would be glad to quit. But I'll be willing to bet that somehow or other the Glandelinian assaults may manage to get into the christian position. That is my way of looking at it."

"But ain't we looked upon as ready cat hideouts to retreat before the foe," asked James.

"We're not retreating. We're going into position at Glenview."

"I hope so any way," said another of the boys. "But I'd like to have our old famous little machine gun with us."

An hour later they were all ready for the march, and knowing that though kids they too are obliged to do their part they began to feel like soldiers as the men were themselves. Let it seem to get them apart from all grownup soldiers and also emphasized the fact that since they entered the army the scouts they had but one aim in life, but had more duties than even soldiers, for so threatening was the enemy, that the boy and girl scouts had to fight just like the soldiers, but from more secure and vantage positions, and had to also do scouting work, signal and all the duties expected of them.

The first first news of general vivian whole army being badly handled by the enemy and the foe winning entirely now, and general janson far away, was a stab at the hearts of all the boy and girl scouts, although somehow they could not avoid a thrill of admiration at the splendid splendid courage such the soldiers displayed, for they were sacrificing great numbers for even what little success they did and were gaining...

...when it didn't separate from the army they desired rest, a separation that was coming swiftly nearer with each passing minute.

And if the army was demolished and badly defeated (though no such thing occurred to general vivian yet) there might not be no real reunion, not although the lips of all were tremulous their eyes were bright and their kept their forebodings bravely under cover. All of these Glandelinian boy and girl scouts were what may be termed "thoroughbreds" and it was easy to see what spirits they had.

During one time of a short spying trip in Manley's army, violet, and her sisters and overheard these words:

"Yes sir boys to his generals" I'll tell you why these christian armies are as easy as a cat to lick a bulldog, is because of these many regiments of boy and girl scouts. They're the head of the army. If we can't take off that head, Glandelinia will never win the war."

"How proud our fathers and mothers would be if they could see us now," Jean said to Mildred with a slight slight tremble in her voice, which she strove to conceal.

"Perhaps that is so for those of us who have our parents living," said Jack reverently. "We are fortunate but many lost theirs in the disasters."

"I first Jean, I didn't want to be a boyscout. My papa made me go and he more than proved of what I'm doing now..."

"We you afraid at first, isn't it?"

"I was not not of the enemy. I was afraid of the hardships of boy scout army life. But I found it's not so hard as all that, and its full of adventure. I could kick myself for hesitating when my mother on bended knees begged me to serve my country in some way."

The minutes were too short now for the work that was crowded into them. A courier raced up shouting that a portion of the Christian line was broken and the enemy was pouring through the gap like a flood from a cloud burst. Military preparations were going on with feverish rapidity. The boy scouts were simply wild with excitement. The battle that morning followed one another as though on wings, and while still in their ranks waiting for the order to march all of the child scouts saw an explosion some distance away that had made a big hole in the enemy's line. "What a blow!" they cried. "The enemy's line is broken!"

The order to march had gone forth that all the boy scouts should move to all sections of the line. The order was given to the boy scouts, and the boy scouts at first this latter order was the subject of some regret with the members of the younger child scouts, whose pride in their own regiment was intense and who had hoped to have it remain intact under its old officers for the period of the war.

"We will lose our identity. We will lose our identity," mourned Edward Jones. "We will be just a part of some boy or girl scout. Rainbow division made up from all undisciplined recruit scouts from all over the Christian country. My part I believe somebody made a mistake. I think our regiment would do its work against the enemy better under its own colors, and with its old tradition to inspire. It's a disgrace to have the day over everything, as a whole, and her sister took her side in anything she says or does. Why don't she refuse to have this battle?"

"Good," prayed the time would come she would. "Anyhow we have the regimental colors or not we will be serving under the old flag, and its the flag that Abbeanna counts after all to me," continued Jack. "There is an inspiration in the thought of the whole of Abbeanna's soul day. I'm going to fight for Abbeanna as a unit."

"When will that be?" "As soon as the flood barricade has been broken down," said Jack. "At any rate nothing can take away from us the fact that we are the 'head of the army' a head that has the range for the enemy." "A few minutes had passed then the order came that all the regiments of child scouts should move forward to the line as fast as possible. As the enemy had forced their way through a good section of the Christian line, to nearly all of them the order and the news sounded like the knell of doom. It seemed to be the final step of separation from the army they liked so much. Also the fact that they were passing through the ranks, that all the boy and girl scouts were to bring all their belongings with them to the line. The situation was coming now no leave or furlough nor rest period could be given under any circumstances.

"Good bye to our dear old camp," Jean began bravely, and then all her courage gave way to a perfect storm of tears. Jack's own eyes were wet as he folded her closely to him and comforted her as best as he could, though feeling very much in need of much comfort himself.

"Hold up bravely, Jean," he urged. "It may only be a little while before we will be marching back again, and maybe the enemy will not drive our armies to pieces as it seems. You know how Jack always attends us at the start, and the good deed comes at the end." "He forced himself to go at last to his boy scout regiments with many a backward look and wave of his hand at the figures near the girl scout regiments. His heart was heavy as he reflected that in the chance of war he might never see his own mother again.

The next few hours were full of excitement, allowing him and many others little time to brood. All of the scouts had taken to scout life as a duck takes to water, and the martial spirit was there altogether with the quick intelligence that enables Abbeanna and her states to also turn out girl and boy scouts more quickly than any other country in the whole wide world.

The new recruit boy and girl scouts had however some of the well known advantage of being "what is called" handpicked in as it was with the old and well drilled scout who had their well known experience in practical outdoor work and preparations for all other military affairs, and therefore they hesitated to only be instructed by those who had been in the service. Penrod himself one of the chief leaders was for all the others, a perfect mine of information about experiences in the war, and for advice, and suggestion, and as they threw themselves into the work of marching swiftly and bravely, and did it with all their heart and soul it was not without doubt that they were to reach their destination without mishap. Their boy and girl scout commanding officers looked on them all, "lookings" or not with the greatest approval and secretly wished that they had bigger regiments of the same high class class.

However Gertrude soon came riding up and cried out, "What is all this? The marching and other work is like pie to all of you but there's no need of such a rush. Mark time, forward march but take 'YOUR TIME'."

"What is time?" asked Penrod in a joking manner. "You'll find out," she retorted. "You used to think it took a year or so to turn out a well drilled boy or girl scout. Well, now if you feel differently."

"I'm glad you think so," said Gertrude. "But after all we are just going through the lighter motions now. The test will come a little later. Do you hear that awful yelling and firing, something somewhere doesn't listen right to me. We are really in danger."

"I'll bet on the situation at any time," answered Jack. "You know General Hanson and his army is awful slow. They are as slow as lightning streak in the sky. He'll surprise us before we know it."

The Regiments of boy and girl scouts while marching through the old familiar company streets were headed by their bands and the cheers and the tears of those of the soldiers who had lined up or packed the sides of the road, part the generals and headquarters where would general, given who was by a window saved his hand trembling, and others shouted themselves hoarse, and one soldier nearly fell out of a window in his enthusiasm, down to the long wagon trains which were waiting for them and escorted by a strong army of mounted dragons. There they were allowed by Gertrude to break ranks, while friends among all the soldiers and refugees crowded around them, pressing, kissing, girls into their hands, caressing them, exhorting them, crying over them until the warning sound, and the bugle called out which was a command for these soldiers to fall into line as they too now were needed at the front to aid in trying to hold the skulking, possessed enemy at bay, and they were therefore forced to hold themselves away and indeed precious indeed had these four minutes or so been. Yet how glad would they have been among the child scouts if at this moment their relatives, brothers, fathers, and mothers, sisters and brothers, unless and quite had been there for indeed all had compressed a world of affection, that could have fallen from their lips, and showed from their eyes. But alas many had been rendered orphans by the war and disasters, and those that still had their parents were too far away from them.

"We won't say good bye to the army camps too long, little Jean," said Jack. "It's just to say in French 'Au revoir'."

"Yes Jack," agreed Jean tremulously. "It's only a revolver. What in the world is that?" she startled herself with a sudden start. "Ah it's the bugle summoning the soldiers who are called to repair the breaking line of battle. Jack why were we not all men no we could battle too. We are all as brave." Jack turned his head aside to his hide his own emotion and Jean patriotically tried to smile.

He and Jean were the last to climb into their own assigned covered wagon. The bugle was sounded again, and the armies of troops swung into columns and marched off toward the scene of battle, while the wagon train with its strong body of cavalry guard moved forward toward Glenview. The whole regiment of child scouts had started on its real mission for work. It was they who later saved general

Wiggins army from defeat. For some time after the wagon train had started, the spirits of the many boy and girl scouts were subdued. No doubt all were beginning to think of the dear ones who months before they had left behind, or whom they may never see again because of the war flood and other ravages. They were also thinking of the new situation and of what they might face in the future, and also whether "They say that it is believed we'll need thirty five million soldiers here to repelling the enemy," put in Jack Gaudon, "and before the day is over there, ll be more soldiers engaged on both sides than people in the whole city of Calverine. That gives you some idea the work all our generals has to do to form so many extensive lines of battle in quick time out of so many men; but all our generals are some workers when once they get started and aroused to it, even general Manley Hub admitted time and again that the worst luck he ever had was to face the two 'L'vian generals."

Before these boy and girl scout regiments had started this march for their new quarters there had been some morning fun with the "Boy Scout Riddle". Times happen which are even unusual and that morning the bugle had for the whole army blown the Reveille that called the whole army from their cots. That tall came because the enemy was making the early morning attack. Therefore to disregard that imperative upon one might cause disaster defeat and death to a hill and therefore as there could be no turning over for another "fourty winks" the whole army camp including all the child scouts had sprung to life. Uniforms were donned, but at this time with the thunder of battle there had not been time for any face washing or slicking back of the hair, and all had formed on the required ranks. Of course there had been, some surprise among the new "Pokie Boy and girl scout at first. One girl scout who was new and who sleeped in the tent occupied by Jean who with all her physical fitness liked more than anything to sleep a few hours of the morning through, and you found it the hardest sacrifice in her life to get her eyes open and feet on the floor at the same instant.

"Gee how do the rest of you do it?" he asked of the nearest girl scout while she was rushing around with tousled head and one eye shut. "By the time I know I'm all awake you and the rest are all ready, and worse than that you all appear to enjoy it. I go you it's a gift. To me it's a torture."

"Jean who had come up laughing and said: "Girl, you are like the man who was to be shot at day break. When told he was to be shot before sunrise the man answered 'Oh that's all right, I never get up that early.'"

But the excitement of the din outside, the noise of firing, and the other confused sounds of the battle all seemed never failed to banish the sleepiness from them and therefore by before half past six they were all awake.

Now they had a little lunch just before dinner, and then with the battle raging wilder and danger threatening, all the boy and girl scouts went to their respective positions as is their practice and got to work in taking in all that went on, spending swift warnings here and there, despite the exhilarating prospect of the conflict. Their work was as constant as the manual of arms field practice and at forth, and everytime they saw a break somewhere, or the enemy making a suspicious move, or when it was noticed where artillery could be used to the best advantage the child scouts notified the officers by their strange signal drills. Even while at this work they continued at their hearty meal of dinner. During one of the momentary lulls in the battle Francis glanced at a little boy scout found a letter lying on the ground which probably belonged as he thought to one of the boy scouts, but he sure about not many of them laughing when he read it. Some girl scout had wrote it about the enemy but it was a poem she had placed in an envelope and it went something like this:

Manley my attack attack and sweat the Christians at the bugle call.

Manley my attack and sweat at the Christians at the bugle call.

But he can't get all his army up in the morning.

But us, so called "Christian Doggles" quickly drop into line at the warning.

And make Manley think he's a meow man in the morning.

He thinks he'll cause us a lot of distress.

Though we put Manley into a purple hood and dunces dress.

Though when he attacks he'll at once regret it.

For we all jump when the bugle calls for what you guess.

And the shells fall to Manley.

Here's the camp, come and get it.

Then came the chorus in which all joined:

For our own army we know what it means.

We thought Manley was made up of a lot of lima beans.

With our mess kit in hand.

With a tin can on the end.

We cheerfully come for our mess.

But find that Manley is in it for he did it now.

So we drink up but borfee and food.

For your porfee and food.

But leave the beans for we can't eat Manley for now bow wow.

It was all great fun to hear the cry of this funny but half silly poem. Nevertheless all of them felt the inspiration for the work of saving the army from defeat. A most exultation of being on hand to do what they could. Boys and girls fired with the same enthusiasm the same great purpose to accomplish their own glorious mission or die in the attempt with the soldiers. Seeing however how fiercely the Mandelinsians charged subdued the child scouts not a little, and once a force of Mandelinsians rushed them but were repulsed.

"I suppose I'm squeamish," said Henry Sprickala to Jack after that, when they had had regarded the attackers, and "I don't blame you or any one else if you laugh at me. But I don't like those things and what they did. Every time I throw me among those Mandelinsians the night of what they did for a time made me feel giddy and sick."

"Yes," said George Gravesly "I know just how you feel but it's war. It's only to see a desperate bayonet fight that gets me over. So far I never was in a close quarters fight."

"On some of you 'Rockies' are hurt yet," said Jack, "entering up to them. I suppose it'll take some of you new chbs some time to get hardened to these awful battle scenes. But when you feel too squeamish you want to remember these disasters the misdeeds of women and children, and all the other atrocities committed by the enemy of women and children tortured, murdered, and wheeled old men and women." "I'm glad to hear that," said Jack.

"Yes," said George Zimmerman his shoulders squaring and his mouth setting grimly. "There's nothing like the memory of 'Abbieann' too to make our soldiers grip their bayonets."

Some of the bayonet fight the girl and scout boy scouts observed during their signaling, and view of the battle was exactly like expert bayonet practice but it seemed from time to time to their apprehension that the enemy were more expert at it. One of the boy scouts who had seen some of the bloodiest fighting near Headwick Junction at Cedarline Creek said:

"It may seem all right for the enemy now to laugh and think they got the advantage of us, but when they finally get into our trenches and fight our soldiers and to hand they usually find many of our troops are more accomplished than they are, and that it is not so great a joke after all. The Mandelinsians cannot win long. See reinforcements too are arriving for the line that is breaking up."

"It's right too," remarked Jack. "There is sure plenty of hand to hand fighting in this battle where it is out and thrust between each other by the hand ends of the bayonets at once every time, and I shall know that the man who can handle his weapon best will come out on top."

"I suppose most of us had experience a long time," said Francis.

"Yes," replied Jack, "a strange reminiscent look came into his eye (ble)."

"Of course those dinky little battles of the early part of the war were compared with the battles now that is going on. But this was 1862 or 1863. I'm fighting just the same more than once any of us," know more than once have been within an ace of seeing "the other world."

"What was the tightest situation you ever were in during the war?" asked George.

"The thing I remember was during the battle at Helkingtonburg," replied Jack. "That was one of the hottest fights of the Cedarline border. While it lasted."

"The main battle of Cedarline last July."

"No, no--no--we were not there at that time. The first one that occurred month before little Jamie was brought into camp by Gertrude. You should remember we were on the trip with the first during the whole of July. So we never saw that big battle of Cedarline. But look there. What's going wrong now?"

Looking toward the direction of the battle line they saw that the Mandelinsians had been greatly victorious and were breaking through, and pouring over an extensive line of works with great yells. Suddenly from the left they observed that the firing of the enemy was getting very heavy and wild in volume and that many of the recoiling troops were forced to take to cover behind trees and rocks though they went down by hundreds before this was accomplished. The fight was closer to their view now, and the girl and boy scouts had to also keep under cover as a random rain of bullets threatened their own safety, and occasionally a shell fell too. These Mandelinsians who had broken through a portion of the Christian line and who were advancing so boldly and recklessly appeared by the regimental line and state banners they carried to be the "Gumpaboo" type and are therefore as the child scouts knew the most nifty fighters as ever can be found anywhere. No matter that the consequence was they always appeared to not only have a contempt of death but so defy a death and therefore these kind are sometimes impossible to stop in an attack unless they are nearly wiped out. They were rushing forward in a great long line but the men were far apart and the children could hear their terrific battle cries horrible to listen to, full of defiance, blasphemies and other sounds. They outnumbered that portion of the Christian line three to one. Their shooting was as good as their hearts were stout and they threatened to wipe out all the soldiers opposed to them. As they were watching this unusual scene, they could see many Christian soldiers picking them off.

scene, they could see many of the christian soldiers picking the Glandelinians as fast as they came on with musketry and grenades, but on they still came and those in the rear had to give way but one column of christian troops throwing aside their guns grasped their long infantry sabres and came counter charging against the enemy in the hopes of stopping them. Yet it seemed the enemy did not propose to go on the defensive and after a vast volvo volly that swept away a lot of platoons of them fixed bayonets and continued to rush on it was a desperate hand to hand fighting for three minutes but the weight and discipline of these fierce Langaboos told and they were pushing the Angelinians back, and killing and wounding many, and taking many prisoners. It was evident the receding christian line was heading for the separate signal positions of the boy and girl scouts. It appeared too at the same time that the glandelinians were heavily reinforced and continued their onslaught with a wilder rush and with exultant cheers that by sheer weight of numbers forced the christian line back further and further. They saw one of the Angelinian officers stumble over something and fall to the ground. He was trying to get to his feet when five of the nearest Glandelinians swooped down upon him shouting to him to surrender. As he would not and could not surrender it would have been all over with him if one of the Angelinians had not come plunging through the crowd of retreating soldiers swinging his huge musket round his head like a flail. He knocked every one of the Glandelinians down, and desperately as they tried the rebels obliged to force their way inside the circle made by that brandished gun and by the time he had knocked down a dozen or more he was killed, by a shot from another, but in the meantime three men had dragged the officer out of reach of the enraged mob.

"Good night, but we're going to be in for a long night for sure," shouted Jean coming up to Jack and saying: "The Glandelinians, I believe know the devils are racing forward."

"Cubas is right," agreed Jack. "We'll have to resort to our grenades to save ourselves and rattle the line of if possible. However that officer would have been killed right then and there if it had not been for that soldier. He had saved the captain's life however at the loss of his own."

"We can't take this situation too seriously," said another boy scout who had unslung his grenade bag. "We have had lots of proof that the Glandelinians are expert at the cold steel and can put it over our side in bayonet work, so if they come near enough we'll have to throw our grenades."

"That's right," agreed Jean. "See they're very dear now, and it's up to us to show the glandelinians that they'll not pass us."

Though it was nothing horrible, results when it was to be pitched among these attacking Glandelinians it seemed however of special interest to the boy scouts especially, though the girls at first shrank a little from it, but nevertheless they had readily mastered such a game and when they were flung, only one boy missed his aim, and that was because he had not aimed at the object. The cause of these boy scouts being such good throwers was chiefly due to the fact that they were so good in baseball and other sports. Often in great games among boys Jack had easily officiated in the pitchers box and had an assortment of curves and drops together with great speed that had been the main and chief factors in the winning of the pennant. Many of the others even girls too had been quick as lightning in "kicking them down" from short, for in games in this country, girls are always arrayed against the boys, either one or the other side coming off the victor. So that this caused them all to have their throwing arms fully developed, and therefore as the Glandelinians rushed on against the christian lines within easy throwing range of the child scouts they took up this new and primer game with skill born of long practice, and the next those hundreds of grenades created among the enemy astonished even the christian soldiers who saw it, and wondered where all those explosive explosions were coming from.

"This ought to be easy as pie for us to demolish demoralize those greycoats in a jiffy," remarked Mildred, as she flung a grenade that landed in a haystack accidentally into a small christian ammunition dump, and caused a terrific explosion which tore a huge gap into the on surging lines of the foe starting great panic.

"Your haystack gave us a big advantage over those Glandelinians," shouted Jean. "Of course we are all drilled in throwing but your hand hit something when you flung the grenade and made your fire. We have all been throwing a baseball around ever since we were five years old. It's in the blood, and our eyes and arms have learned to work together, and then too a thing we have learned to do from love must be done much better than if you had to do it because it was forced on you, and yet it was against your will..."

"I'm like me with a good grenade in my hand and general Johnston Jackson Stanley a hundred feet away," said one of the boy scouts with a grin as he flung his hand the enemy."

"You wouldn't do a thing to him," chuckled one of the "rookies."

"You'd put over a bean ball or a sore sadaway," said another.

"Whichever way you used it it would be a sure knockout," declared George. "The Glandelinian general would do a sure fadeaway."

"I hope we have plenty of these, in spite of what else we'd be short of," remarked Mildred. "These grenades are showing themselves to be real handy little things to have around to prevent those Glandelinians from getting too near us," started another scout.

"If we ever run short we can make some ourselves," said Mildred. "Jean, I'll show you how they won't be as good as these hand toasts but they'll do the work."

"We make bombs. Are you sure?"

"I'm not kidding," said Jean. "I can make one myself. I learned it from one of the soldiers who was wounded in the Sarban Creek fighting, and is with our army but on leave."

"Make one," demanded Jack. "We'll see how it works."

"All right, I'll make one for you and get to some old tin can like as you can. It's not too heavy for us kids to throw and I'll show you what that soldier showed to me."

"What kind of a can?" asked one of the boys.

"Any old kind, only it mustn't be leaking," answered Jean. "An odd soup can, tomato can or any kind you can find. But don't bring a small one. I want a good sized one."

A few moments search however was successful and one of the girls themselves brought forth a can, and although nearest who were not engaged at the present with grenading the attacking foe looked on with interest while Jean proceeded to make the bomb, he rolled up for a piece of wire as hot as hot to set them dirty and telling them to watch her carefully, took a handful of clay from the edge of a small quicksand bed and lined the inside of the whole can with it quite thick.

"Now for the dirty work," joked Jack.

Jack then said: "Get me a lot of junk."

"That is rather out of the question here," protested Jack.

"A handful of hull stones, or bits of iron or cartridge shells will do."

returned Jean, putting a strong detonator and explosive in the can and tamping it down in the clay. "Anything will do that will make those reckless fools see what it is when it hits them."

One of the girls brought a handful of sharp stones, one had contributed a couple of metal buttons, others found pieces of iron on the ground, fragments of old hard metal and even small round pebbles and so forth. Jean arranged this miscellaneous collection in as compact mass as possible, put in more clay, and then put on the tin cover into which she had at first punched a hole. Through this hole she placed a short quick burning fuse. Then she wrapped a piece of wire around the can so that the top could not fall off, and the bomb was ready.

"There," she said as she held up her handiwork for their inspection. "When I fling it out to the attacking enemy there will be something doing it is not at all in the beauty line but I can fling it there just the same."

"You sure have a great brain," said Jack admiringly.

"Not at all, but the soldier who first flung it out," said Jean. "But it is a good thing to know for you can never tell when it will come in handy."

"No matter what we do the Glandelinians won't retreat so we'll soon have to retreat to shelter," said Mildred. "I never saw the enemy attack that way before."

"The Glandelinians don't seem to care whether they're killed or not."

"We could be in grave danger," said Jack. "For I hear the Glandelinians sometimes throw gas grenades into the troops. Supposing one landed here."

Then within hearing made a wry face.

"That is one of the most heinous and wickedest things the Glandelinians have been bringing into this terrible war," said Jean. "I could imagine seeing the devil in hell chuckling when he heard of these gas bombs used against us christians."

"It is not at all likely that the fiends ever chuckled," said Jack bitterly. "I'll bet they're as jealous as to take it to have to know that Glandelinians can outdo them in the horrors of warfare. It is not often that the fat fiends ever allow a human being to get ahead of them if they can help it."

"I'll bet Baten himself will have to stop, stop very lively to keep ahead of the Glandelinians," said Willard. "They say there is no torture in the world that can ever equal that suffered by a man who has been gassed, and yet if the poor victims do not die of it after many days of unrepentant agony they would be better off if they had died, for it leaves them ruined for life. I've seen gassed victims even among boys and girls. Scouts, surgeons get hardened in carrying on their own dreadful profession in war, but they have to be or they could not keep their nerves. But I've seen the most steepest and hardened surgeons break down like a frightened child when they stood besides the beds on which gas victims lay gasping for breath in an all day and night suffocation. myself have never seen such horrible anguish."

"Anyone who expects to see the Glandelinians fight this war like a civilized nation gives me the Tee, hee," declared Jack. "If any one expects that, then you can expect to see all his followers escape from the infernal penalties and live forever in the earth, and put the good people down there instead. Glandelins since she tore herself away from her Holy Mother Country had thrown all decency and humanity to the winds. Pirates used to raise the flag of the skull and cross bones, and make any one including women and children they capture from a ship walk the plank but they're saint Peter's compared to these Glandelinians. Pirates beatings and barbarians and so forth are innocent little souls compared to these Glandelinians. Glandelins if she could would devastate the whole world. I've read many histories in school halls had to study them in fact, had the teachers the dear good old sisters used to tell us all about cruel nations in their method of warfare, but they are peaceful compared to the Glandelinians, and their bar barous horrors cannot reach this. Even the reign of Terror in Paris, all the horrors committed by Nero and other monsters in Rome are nothing compared to this.
Therefore there will be no peace or security for mankind in general throughout the whole world until Glandelins is humbled and on her knees."

"But it is a hard question to be decided," said Willard. "I do not like to keep on saying we'll lose the war, as sometimes it seems, but what if we win or lose it'll be a long time before Glandelins can be humbled, or put to her knees, and as powerful as Abaddon is she cannot do it without outside help from the world, and she can find and show ways to prove I'm right, and it's a tough job that is put up to all our armies. We have to outfight armies to overcome the enemy, to guard leaves, to draft men to fight these huge fiends, and so forth. It is more than even a hard job. Humanity cannot conquer Glandelins wicked as she and her cause. If God was not to take our side, and abandon us, you'd see what would have happened to us long long ago. Glandelins would be the mistress of the slave. But with God's help we'll put it through no matter what the cost may be. But we got to pray and have faith continually said, while we fight."

"That's the way I like to hear you talk," said Jane. "and right you are, and it wasn't that good man in America known as Father Hale who wished that he had more than one life to give for his country, but if he saw how many men are so horribly torn by shells here I'll bet he wouldn't want to go through it again. But nevertheless there are many, millions of men in the army and soldiers and many millions more to come. But come we'll have to move. The battle is getting too close to suit our fancy."

As Gertrude herself had expected the enemy was pushing all before him, and she had ordered the bugle sounded so that all the fort's widows from their res pective places safely. They had already often had preliminary drills in their movements, and though it had taken a long time before this stage of excellence could be reached, for some of the boys and girls had been doubly slow, slow in thought and action they had mastered it nevertheless. The quicker ones had soon sooner than the others acquired the habit of making their movements from place to place in the required time while throwing hand grenades too, and Jack Jean, Will, Joan and Willard could do it with the agility and the quickness of tree monkeys. But the drills always went on increasing whether they all acted like one or not, so that they would never forget, for indeed the enemy was very close a single seconds delay in getting beyond the infernal enemy attack might surely mean all the difference between life, and death. And 949 / / such a death at the hands of the enemy as children well know. It was a horrible sight to see the hideous designs of the foe which the Glandelinians war for with the heads many of them were they resembled armies of troops in weird appearance from another or infernal world.

"If only our parents could see us now," murmured Joan to Willard in a loud voice in make her herself heard above the din.
"If they saw us so close to the battle line they'd faint or drop dead from fright," returned the latter. "Not for themselves, but what they fear would happen to us."

"The deep sea divers have nothing on the appearance of these Glandelinians with the battle costumes they wear," chimed in a third girl scout.

"Don't insult the poor divers," said Jack. "If those Glandelinians went down looking like that there would not be a fish within thirty miles they'd be so scared."

Their retreat from their position worked with clock work precision, and many of them perspiring from the heat and the excitement wiped their brow and Gertrude gave vent to a sigh of relief as she looked along the grotesque ranks of advancing Glandelinians and saw how she had outwitted them.

"I guess they'll be repulsed soon, as I see the advance of reinforcements to the north," said Penrod.

"I guess they're ready now to work at this spot," Gertrude said turning to Penrod. "Take them down half a score at a time but don't let them do any flag or other signalling where they'll be observed by the enemy. We don't want any loose losses."

"Don't hunt any losses," murmured a lad. "What a blessed privilege any one would think that we were spirits and would not die."

"Save your breath and do what is ordered, and come along," admonished Jack.

"You'll need all you've got in a little while..."
The many boys and girls scouts were marshled off and assigned to other positions.
Not far from them stood a little hut a little crude station with a door and only one window, and they saw a shell hit it, and blow it to nothing. After that they could detect a faint acid odor in the atmosphere.

"There's gas shells exploding somewhere," said Jane. "We'd better watch out. We may need to use gas masks."

"Now," said Gertrude. "All of you break ranks and go to your assigned places."

Be "Be sure your pistols are handy," command Penrod, and go as fast that hill in single file one by one, and believe me make quick time too as there are snipers lurking there and we cannot stay here. If they fire hang low and return it, and don't miss your aim. I learned myself what snipers those dogs are and they don't care no more for a little christian girl or boy than a snake does for its enemy."

All the boys and girls scouts obeyed orders, and as they passed, shots began to come from some parts of the hill, and a gas shell exploded not far away and they got a slight whiff of the gas. There was a sharp cough, an a dry face and a hurried retreating by as each one went through the fetid ordeal. It is indeed needless to say there was no disposition to linger. Some of the child scouts carefully took aim as they went and returned the fire, but with no effect, though of course no one was hit on the hill side either. Even the slowest boys of the squads displayed ample unexpected capacity for rapid speed.
"Look at Fatty Jones," chuckled Jack alluding to the most portly member of the regiment. "He must have winged heels. Fabled Mercury has nothing on him."

"That explosion of a gas shell sure caused a rise out of poor Fatty," declared

Jack. "It's worth plenty to see him do the jumping jack about a gas cloud after him and I'll bet he'd do a marathon in ten seconds flat."

"You'll jump too if one explodes to you close to you," prophesied George.

"You'll think the lid has been taken off the infernal regions."

The prophecy was indeed verified, for though one exploded overhead near her and there was no danger since so high the gas had been mostly diluted yet the odor was so vile and the death it suggested was so horrible that she could not get away, from the smell quick enough, and for a moment she felt sick and giddy.

"It puts me in mind of passing very dangerously close to a Cobra serpent who yet is not near enough to sink in his fangs when he strikes," commented Jane. "Of course he couldn't kill you but you'd jump intuitively when he struck nevertheless, just because he was a serpent of a poisonous kind."

"That shell is giving forth beautiful perfume," remarked one of the boyscouts with an expression of dire disgust. "I wonder if His Informal Majesty is not out here for a walk. It smells that way."

"It smells like my mom may in a barn --- I don't think," growled Hans and he coughed as if he was going to die that minute. "I got a far blisser dose than the rest of you," he added with a air of superior virtue.

"I suppose you are a poor martyr to duty," mocked Penrod. "But we are not through yet fellows as yet wise. The worst it yet to come. The enemy is still advancing and pushing our soldiers back."

"Nothing can be worse than this I believe," grumbled the fat boyscout with profound conviction.

"Not well you'll find out," said Willie Jones assuming the role of Job's comforter. "We've got to pass through that small glen there and we cannot tell whether we'll be ambushed or not. It'll take five minutes to get through it but we have to do so if we wish to accomplish our work correctly."

"Will any one of us succeed in getting through on our feet or be carried out," asked the fat boy as a deafening deafening crash filled their ears.

"You be carried out, fatty!" cried Willie. "Why no. It would take the whole regiment of men soldiers to do that or rather, it'll be a crane and a strong derrick for you sure."

"We'll put a mine under him and blow him out of a ravine and catch him as he comes down," added Bery Bertie.

"Now listen every one of you," shouted Penrod. "Lining your lips with barreled automatic rifles and go forth through the glen. There is no danger even if fuses are lurking in ambush in you've learned to do the proper thing. But if there is any slippy or slow and careless work those that are careless will find it out sooner than he expects, and they'll get all that comes coming to them. The firing is coming closer and I hear footsteps. The retreating christians are coming back those glandelinians anyhow. I wish they were in-----" He did not finish and some one added:

"Not much nourishment in that place. Suppose the glen is a hornets nest or something like that."

"If it is its better to find it out now than when we are actually ambushed," answered a girl by the name of Ida Gohena. "I suppose this is a test for us but to expose ourselves to the enemy beyond out in the open now is quite here is hoping that none of our automatic machine gunnaries are defective."

They slowly and cautiously filed into the grim looking glen, going from tree to tree and moving with the utmost care expecting to see bursting out upon them the Gargoylian-Kurd glandelinians who always look like so many spectres in their ghostly attire. It was a grisly five minutes that seemed more than two hours to each one of them, but nothing happened. The dead silence slightly broken by the tumult of battle beyond added to the discomfort of the occasion, and the shouts of the enemy far beyond, the strangely colored sky, the noise of firing and other appearances made it seem as if they were fugitives trying to escape from the infernal legions and who were about to succeed. Death seemed to be all around them, for once or twice a shell of high explosive type broke with an eruption in the glen at locations far from them but hurling debris of all kinds about them, and once some missile swept over a head and exploded five hundred yards away. They were in the valley of the shadow of death and brave as they were it sure sobered them. It was an immense relief when they came through the glen and the tent was over and too there was great anti-fair satisfaction when it was learned that not one had been injured by any of the high explosive shells.

"I wonder how those glandelinians can feel like being a responsive and society when they wear such hideous war unks," exclaimed a boyscout by the name of Bart Martin. "My but its good to be out of this hideous ravine. I'd like to throw the glandelinians where they could never come and bother any one any more."

"Isn't it pretty near time for supper?" asked the fat boyscout.

"Not yet boy," said Penrod. "We are not in a safe location yet even though the christian line is reinforced as I can see and is rallying. Gertrude too has something else on plan or I mine by guess. We are almost trapped and we will have to do out best..."

Crouching low, and on the alert too they awaited the command.

"Form in single file every body," commanded Gertrude and make your way through the rest of the glen. Bend over as you go for you are closer now to the enemy and retreating christian troops and not a head but show to be mark for the glandelinian snipers, and worse of all, our own friends might mistake us as foes creeping on their rear and also open fire in panic."

They did as they were told and as soon as they had reached a designated designated position beyond the ravine they were given to the word of halt and "lie down w quickly."

"You are going to be shelled right proper now," Penrod said. "The victorious enemy have seen us from the right and some shells may be thrown over toward us and its up to all of us to be on the watch."

Crouching low and on the alert, every one waited but for some time there was not a sound. Then came a shell with a hiss and a scream hurtling in their direction and broke a hundred feet to their rear. Several times this was repeated added by shrapnell and musketry, but the dexterity shown by the scouts saved them all and indeed there was a general sigh of relief indeed when the firing stopped toward their direction and also a heavy column of christian soldiers were reported repulsing the enemy attack, and that general panics divisions of troops belonging to the advanced guard was only half a mile away, and that everything would soon be over in the evening.

"How but that indeed was some strenuous work," remarked Jack as the firing receding in the distance, showed all was over, and the scouts headed once more for their new camp.

"I feel as though I have been drawn through a eye of a needle," said the little fatty.

The thought of fatty being drawn through the eye of a needle was so ludicrous that it provoked a general uproar of laughter.

"I guess we sure all feel pretty well used up by our adventure to day," said George when the excitement had subsided but I all the same it is like things like this that are going to help the armies lick the glandelinians."

And so the few hours of the still embattled evening passed in watching the grim lessons of the inhuman war, and the shadows lengthening into darkness and more forest fire fog brought what we call Mess supper and then despite the sadness seen all around there was some special musical entertainment and the camp fires. Then promptly at nine the bugle called for all lights out and the young regiments of boy and girlscouts early as was the hour willingly obeyed for the strenuous days amid the battle made the narrow cot, particularly appealing.

"Did you hear about the strange joke that happened early yesterday evening," Jean asked of Mildred when all the rest were asleep on the way.

"We said Mildred sleepily. What was it."

"Why Gertrude had come in from a scouting trip and a sentry challenged her not knowing who she was with the regular who goes there," and she showing herself answered "Say sentry you wouldn't know if I told you who goes there. I'm not going any where. I'm here."

"What then?"

"The sentry not knowing who she was (he being a soldier) got angry and called the corporal of the guard who happened to recognize her, and let her pass."

"That's all very well here," yawned Mildred. "but it wouldn't go anywhere else."

THURSDAY THIRD DAY...

"What was that?" shrieked Mildred at the blowing up of a high explosive. "Asked James Green that morning as he opened his eyes after the sounding of a bugle, which was not a morning reveille but the "call to arms" and heard the sound of close firing that was like rain beating a tremendous tattoo on a roof of tin."

"Worse than that," laughed Jack. "The battle is on again. If it were I bet you would be out of that cot more quickly than you are doing it now. The enemy is overgutting it to day. Our side is the attacker this time."

"So much the better," said James as he jumped out and hastily began to dress. "We'll need more drill to day I suppose or maybe we'll follow them in

"In the game,"

"But such roseate dreams were quickly dispelled. Though the sound of firing increased in violence, something else was duplicated for a whistling arose: from the direction of the forest fires and blew as sailors say "great guns" and little fishes." However despite it all the Christian forces were moving forward little hindered by the storm but the camps of the child scouts being mostly of tents were in peril from the storm; and the one occupied by Gertrude as the storm increased in fury gave evidence of taking to itself wings and flying away although it was, by no means a flimsy structure. Gertrude ordered a detail of boys though it was by no means a false statement. It was to come out and surround her tent and hold the tent-pole down by main force if necessary. Nevertheless there was nothing beautiful about the prospect for it meant a sure battering by the howlinds; and flying debris for the entire detail for the wind was more like a hurricane or tempest than a mere gale. But everyone had learned the first rule of military life--to obey instantly, any command issued by a superior officer. So they all obeyed the soldiers in exercise it: they made their way in the forest, and tent especially when a broken branch of a tree hit him smack on the back.

"Just out luck to catch Gertrude's eye," he muttered.
"Shop Yoda's grumbling," adjoined Pondero who was to help. "Think how much worse it would be if we were plowing through the embers after the Passage of a forest fire.
Let's make a lark of it." "I shall be up among the larks all right."

"Make a Jark of it oh. Say Mr Penrod we'll be up among the larks all right" returned Jack "if this tent ever gets away from the tent pins. A balloonist would have nothing on us."

have nothing on us." They laid hold of the straining ropes and hung on for dear life. The hot winds were blowing in intensity and it was hard and hot work while it lasted. They sweated like horses, and even their sturdy little muscles were put to the vent tests, but it took the help of a number of men soldiers too before they had the satisfaction of keeping the tent in its place and after a while the storm subsided, and the danger was over, but the smoke from the east was thicker and darker.

"Isn't it about time for general Hanson's army to get down here and make a junction with our own army?" asked Penrod, as they were on their way to, see how the christian attack may be progressing.

heard yesterday from Frank Wilber "returned Jack" that his army had arrived last night and that four divisions of it were expected to arrive at this portion this morning. Up to now no one of the army has showed itself in sight. I'm curious to see how general Hanson's troops will look after that long all day marching yesterday.

"I'll bet all of them will be good and sore at General Manley's army for attacking general civilians army" replied Penrod "and when they get into action believe me they'll pitch into the landelinians."

attacking general. "I pitch into the glandelinians." believe me they'll pitch into the glandelinians." "They ought to," said Jack "for there is lots of good fighting material in general ansons' army, and they'll fight as well as the rest. What makes me feel good is that general renburs' army is also coming. They'll be all good and strong when they are all at one time concentrated and facing the glandelinian army."

Even as they spoke they heard the far off music of a band playing at the double time, and saw the boyscouts who were off duty at that exact moment turning toward that direction.

"I shouldn't wonder if some of general Harrison's army isn't coming this way now," remarked Penrod. "Let's lag it to that field and watch them come in. We may meet many of our friends whom we know."

They reached a favorable position just as the first of the advancing Japanese entered the camp on the 14th march. The boy and girl couple seeing most of the soldiers were strangers studied them critically and in jubilation. The new spirit for they knew general Kanenaka whole army of men were old veterans half of the army having seen three great wars of the past and were good and hearty fighters...-E-E- There was a good dra dr deal to give good credit to the newly arriving army-all of them up to now had been in many a stirring campaign had been in many a terrific battle, and they were called Hanson's "Great Mateer army" for they were so swift and dreadful in their movements. For some reason or other there were no soldiers in civilian of or "landolinian uniforms" and, I just now because they were not on drill and were at rest, their marching was somewhat ragged and they were silent and sullen for they knew the enemy had cheated them of a good rest, and had forced them to march all night, and therefore they couldn't get at the enemy quick enough. All the boys and men who watched them pass by knew perfectly well that great wonders would be wrought by this army.

The Regiments upon Regiments broke ranks (spanks) as soon as they were fairly within the precincts of the camps.

within the precincts of the camp. "Look there!" cried Jack suddenly, as his eyes fell upon one of the deadest, and instead of a soldier was a boy, about on horseback, and a little beyond was Violet, and her sisters. "If that is George Madcliffe, the great boy, I'll not bet."

"Sure thing" shouted George Zimmerman, as he looked in the direction Jack indicated. They there Radcliffe he yelled, and they both made a break for the place where Radcliffe was mounted on his horse. At their approach the latter had dismounted, and in a moment they each had one of his hands and were shaking it as though they would wrench it off.

"Good old sport, Radcliffe" ejaculated Jack. "How in the name of Heaven did you get here through all this storm of war. I thought you far, far away." c.

"Oh I'm like a keen leech," grinned Padelide, delightedly. "I stuck with General Hanson's army all the while. I wanted to see the battle, and so I came

"general Hanson's army all the while. I wanted to see the battle, and so I came along," he said. "I was with the army for about a week, and then I came back to the camp."

"I thought you could not get through even when you tried. You know there's the flood, and fire, and the long stretch of battle, and the enemy scout patrols."

flood, and fire, and the long stretch of battle, and the empty scout patrols." "Push you back!" it returned backliffe. "But I made it nevertheless as I went with the army. It makes no sense though to think that we are having a hard time to beat the enemy. This Manley is just as stubborn as all the rest. He is just moping along and raving against me, and one of our regiments foolishly let a Chaldean troop pass us without a peep. Say, maybe I want tickled to get Indo-Chinese troops, pass us without a word. Say, maybe I want it, tickled to get through on any terms. I, however escorted the Princesses through the gate, had I thought into my duty prevents them from going along with the rest of you fellows, fellows. It'll be some time before I can join you again, I get, and her, please, need me."

"I'll be some time before I can join you again, Violet, and her sisters need me." Never mind said Jack. The main thing is you are here. We are in the same camp and in the same same division and we'll be able to see a lot of each other."

"I'm not the only one among us who is here," chuckled Madcliffe.

"I'm not the only one among us who is here," chuckled Radcliffe.
 "Is that so?" said Jack with interest. "Who is it?"
 "Give your guesses," grinned Radcliffe.
 "Jim Daniels," said Jack.

"Jim Daniels?"
"Wrong," said Radcliffe.
"Hale Johns?"
"Wrong again."

"Jane Andrews?"
"No, girl it's a boy."
"What's his name?"

"You are all off" replied Radcliffe "I'm afraid you would never guess in a hundred thousand years so I'll let you out of your misery. It's Johnnie Anderson."

"Cross my heart and hope to die," laughed Radcliffe. Radcliffe enjoyed the surprise and amusement of his comrades.

"How does he feel about all these disasters that have occurred?" asked George

"He feels like a tiger cheated of his prey" responded Radcliffe. "Of course

"He feels like a tiger cheated of his prey" responded MacLiffe. "Of course he doesn't say much but I believe what he is thinking whether bad words or not isn't nevertheless fit for hearing or for writing."

The two boyscouts looked about for the boyscout mentioned, and soon caught sight of him standing moodily apart from the others and with a scowl upon his face as black as a tyun thundercloud as he was looking toward the direction

"He's papa's little sunshine since he saw all that," chuckled Jack.

the results of the flood, the destruction of Abbeann and so many other big and prosperous cities and towns was facing a terrible bankruptcy. The children in the city of El Yerso had been friendly and good to her when she had been there and before the disaster, and even these boys and girls about too had befriended her when a lonely neglected orphan, taking her into their ranks and giving her thrilling but pleasant adventures; and many good times. So when Gertrude began to make plans for the future, each one of which had a direct reference to the discovery, Susan modestly said she would like to join in such expeditions, that she was not afraid, stating her reason with so much delicacy yet so firmly, that Gertrude was compelled to acknowledge she was right while at the same time she secretly wondered whether Angelina Riches would like to go forth on another such expedition. All that morning the attentiveness all alike between the two girls grew upon her so strongly that she would have almost gladly have had a million followers like Jean Susan Angelina Riches, and the others. Scarcely as they went off a little distance, leaving Angelina Riches by herself for a few moments to watch the progress of the battle, and seeing by the aid of their glasses that the enemy was now making a counter attack, there as the swift gallop of a horse, and Schoerfeld Perrod came riding up. Angelina Riches radiant with smiles stood awaiting him, she had invited him to go on the scouting tour with her and therefore Angelina Riches had bestowed more than usual time and attention upon the looks of her uniform, for Perrod was very observant and particular of the uniform the girls about leaders and friends of his were those he had even bawled out Gertrude because she didn't wear her purple uniform such which she had forgotten, and when all were in dress line he was always constantly dictating as to what they should wear for dress parade, and going out, and what not to wear, and any fault finding of a uniform was the penalty of "Kitchen Police duty for two days." However to day everything seemed fitted to go as it was. General Brown had not won his fight, the enemy was now thrusting blows at him; in wildness and fury, the battle exactly sounded "natty" and explosions were shaking the earth like a convulsion and the smoke of distant forest fires made the sky look as if the globe prediction of the last day was at hand. Angelina Riches had heard Perrod say that he was lovable to examine purple in uniforms and not suspecting that he had seen lots of the battles due to that day, and that the losses of the christian side was unbearable to him, and not knowing that his humor was none the best she determined to surprise him with the favorite color of uniforms. Accordingly when Perrod rode up to her and dismounted he found her standing beside her horse arrayed in a rich purple uniform. Perrod had just met Dolores and Angelina Jennings and what they told him about the fortunes of the battle he was in the worst of humors. His first salutation to Angelina Riches was:

"Well Angelina how do you like the turns of the battle?"

"I don't know how it is turning out. Do you?" asked Angelina Riches taking him literally.

"Do!" he repeated with an impatient toss of the head. "The situation is all but pretty. I advise you to postpone your purpose of going out scouting. It's too dangerous to venture out" (pointing to the battle line) "I never saw any look worse."

Since Angelina's plan and since she had heard news of the battle being lost she had cried half the time, and now as usual the tears came to her eyes.

"It's no use of crying over the darned situation" said he. "I declare I wonder if there's anything of this anyhow. I'll bet the darned enemy will lick us like a cat and sent us flying. For one I won't run."

"Please don't talk so" said Angelina laying her hand on his arm. "We can pray to God, and he'll help us. It's as good as His Omnipotence."

"And so it is but the situation on both sides is different just the same, and then that crazy Jackass headed mule of a Manley is a harder man to beat than any one I thought he was."

"You told me once he was a old bone head and couldn't fight a flea" said Angelina Riches the tears again flowing in spite of herself.

"Now make your eyes red" said he. "I declare I wonder if there's anything of you to day Angelina but tears. Of course I did. But I didn't know the goofy ground and the army is better proportioned in every way. If we ain't losing we are sure receiving a rough handling nevertheless. Wish I was in some time, and saw the old whiskered pineapple so I could bore him with some shots."

Angelina Riches longed to remind him of a time when General Johnston Jackson Manley had received such a whipping during the battle at Jennie Turner city, but she could, dared not, and feared finding fault somewhere or other touched her white and bare shoulder saying:

"I wish we could discover something that would save the nation. Too I wish you wouldn't go out on that scouting tour. No one else thinks of going, and to make things worse to go out now we would have to take a round about way and the flood bars our way. Abbeann is no more, and yet all of us should display better wisdom."

Angelina Riches was completely angry and amid a fresh shower of tears exclaimed: "Abbeann-----Abbeann-----I'm sick of hearing of that disaster. It's nothing but failure, for the nation, floods floods all day long with Gertrude stating the difficulties, and now you must thrust the disaster into my face! If you think the mystery can be solved why don't you try and find it out instead of Violet, and her sisters."

"Simply because I can't if they can't" returned Perrod, and then not wishing to arouse her he playfully threw his arm around her waist adding: "Let come my little sylph fairy don't let's argue about it any more. I'll turn out something sooner or later, and you or I shouldn't worry or be fretful about it. So if you won't change your mind, throw on your cloak and let's be off to scout."

"Oh no. Not yet. It's too early" answered Angelina Riches. So they sat down upon the log together, and after asking about poor Rose, and how long Jenny her sister was to remain in Glenview, Angelina chancing to think of the strange discovery that morning with regard to Abbeann and the spies Susan found among a prisoner mentioned it to Perrod, who seemed much more excited about it than she had been.

"Go that was a strange letter to Manley from the Glandelinian government," said he. "And a map code too. Why didn't you tell me before?"

"Because I forgot all about it" returned Angelina. "And its very marvelous too and it affects me a great deal. I believe its a good clue."

Perrod did not reply but there was passing through his mind something which would have surprised Angelina Riches not a little. As the reader should remember he was becoming a great spy scout, and now if this mystery had clues it was up to him to make out the meaning of those clues. When he next spoke he said very calmly:

"Well I'm glad Susan discovered that for it'll give us all better chances to find out what did it and Perrod's eyes turned upon Angelina with a deeper meaning than she could divine. It was so long since Angelina Riches had felt any discouragement in the way the war itself heated, and was just then really turning out that she had almost ceased to know what really the results would be in the future, and besides this she had no suspicions in Perrod's motives in asking her such unusual questions, so finally she carelessly said that nothing had been said yet on the subject of Abbeann, though she presumed that Violet, and her sisters when they learned the details would take Susan aid them in their next effort to try and solve the mystery, as they had recently taken a violent fancy to her. Here the conversation flagged, and despite the noise of the distant battle Perrod, dropped into a sort of musing mood from which Angelina Riches was forced to arouse him when it was time for them to go on the proposed scouting tour. As if their thoughts were flowing in the same channel Gertrude Angelina that early forenoon was thinking of the notes Susan had secured from a Glandelinian prisoner and was trying to devise some means by which to bring something good through their discovery. . . . suddenly therefore a new idea occurred to her, and therefore Angelina Jennings, and her eager police were sent for, . . . to draw up a new plan in which a new and better discovery could be made of the ruined portions of Abbeann. . . .

"Half of the crater region we did not yet explore by night" said she, "And what I want is, that when Violet, and her sisters follow out their, new plan, I've all have all of our scout force, and the Camp fire girls too take possession of every portion to be explored, to guard every recess, while the explorers therefore will be under their protection. I have a hunch the clue will be discovered before long."

The plan which was going to be a desperate one was accordingly, drawn up signed and sealed. Angelina Jennings keeping a rough draft (de bait) of it which was to be forwarded to Violet, and her sisters under the strongest guard. Perrod was of a third person until the group advanced toward her, Ida and Jenny leaning forward on their horses and some of the others riding at her right, a little in the rear. Thinking if she thought at all, that it was Penrod, she rode on until a sudden noise caused them all to halt, and then she turned and met the dark handsome eyes—not of Penrod, but of one who with a peculiar smile, rode forward and offered her his hand, saying:

"I'm sure you don't recognize me no more since we last saw each other."

Just then there was a terrific crash as of distant thunder overhead, and all were engulfed in smoke. When at that instant never knew what she said or did, she only remembered a dizzy sensation in her head, a strong arm jerked around her, and a voice which fully aroused her as it called her "Susan" and asked if she shook of the explosion had made her faint. Just then Ida herself re-appeared, announcing that the Christian armies were moving forward to renew their former attempt to take the enemy's works, and asking if she found general Starring very much changed. While watching the movements of the Christian armies Susan sat opposite her friend general Starring and every time she raised her eyes she saw his fixed with a worried expression toward the battle line. However she had learned to know why general Starring was now wounded and too disabled to resume command. He was so beloved by the whole Christian army. Of course he possessed rare powers of conversation, and nevertheless just the same knew just what to say when to say it, and with a kind word and smile for all, and through that he was able to make himself a great favorite notwithstanding his habit of sometimes being firm which would occasionally show itself in some way or other.

During this time some of the other boyscout leaders themselves came up, and soon after Penrod came riding up, frowning gloomily when he saw the Christian troops in the distance somewhat lagging in their advance. At last complaining of feeling blue he sauntered toward one of the trees where Angelina Jennings had been standing all the while.

"Upon my word," said he, "this looks natural, who failed the Christian troops. I thought they were spirited."

"General Turner of Hanseps command did it, wasn't he good?" said Jenny who felt thankful to God, and then Starring himself said:

"Don't go near that general and try to thank him—for I can imagine all you may wish to tell him, and he is one of those who hate to be thanked. He and general Vivian are unusual friends and it affords him a great deal of pleasure to come to his aid in the nick of time—but he added glancing toward the battle, "I must be excused now, as I promised to report for duty despite my being wounded."

"Who is going to lead this advance against the enemy?" asked Jenny, and Walter replied:

"It's general Herndon who had accompanied him during his own efforts against the enemy earlier in the battle."

"They say general Hanson in a regular Napoleon and always has very powerful armies," rejoined Ida, seating herself on a stone.

Instantly instantly catching the word "Napoleon" and his powerful army Penrod started up, asking if it would be against the rules, for him to go and see if he could interview general Hanson.

"I think it would be impossible just now," was general Starring's brief answer, while Susan's eyes flashed scornfully, as she overheard some one remark the enemy might win the day, and Penrod who was rather crestfallen over the whole affair, and who really in his heart, wished the battle had not happened announced himself ready for any emergency, however the attack made by the Nationals which lasted till dark, was not successful, and that night before they made up their minds to make it a retreat, an all the boyscouts sat down around a huge, roaring campfire to talk over the events of the day, when Susan suddenly asked Angelina Jennings who had been watching the battle almost incessantly all the day to tell her truly if it were not general Hanson's army who had delivered the stroke which repulsed the assault of the enemy early that afternoon.

"Why, it was," said Jenny herself to whom the idea was somewhat rattled while Angelina Jennings replied:

"And suppose it was?"

"I'm sorry if it wasn't," said Susan for then if he is not near us, general Vivian's army will not endure another day for the enemy will renew it to-morrow, know it."

"What a silly little girl!" said Angelina Nichols. "General Hanson Vivian is perfectly able and willing to give the enemy all he is looking for, and more than willing to do so, so why do you care?"

"I do not like to see the enemy win a single battle, or to be what withering a Christian army whipped by any one," was Susan's reply, and yet in her secret heart there was a strange feeling of pleasure in the idea that general Hanson's whole army had struck a big blow to the enemy that afternoon—for would the enemy had recoiled from the assault if—she did not dare to think of finishing the question even to herself—dared not even ask whether general Hanson had really liked the enemy, as she already began to think he was able to do, why should he who was never whipped by any enemy before be worsted now, and then for the first time she thought of how he had licked the mightier general Hanley's high headed son John at Colburne Creek.

"Angelina," said she, "does general Hanson know of me, and of my being a new girl scout?"

"He answered Angelina Nichols, "I wanted to send him word about it, but Violet, and her sisters said not to do so."

"Don't tell then please," returned Susan, and resuming her former position she fell into a deep reverie from which she was at last aroused by John herself asking if she intended to sit up all night.

The news that general Hanson had arrived with his whole army and was concentrating heavily upon the enemy, and repulsed the attack upon general Vivian's lines, besides several other incidents, spread rapidly, and it had happened that before they had turned in for the night the girlscouts had been stopped in the field by a group of Camp Fire Girls who were eager to know how general Hanson bore, the news that general Vivian was severely wounded, and if it was not that which which had brought him so soon, and then the conversation turned upon how the enemy had been swept back by general Frank Herndon who had at two o'clock appeared in or on the rear of the assaulting force, and don't you think said one of the Camp Fire Girls, that general Herndon Lincoln was leading the left grand division of the flankers, and how he crushed through though he was wounded? If I were you," turning to Susan, "I'd caution many of your boy and girlscout friends not to go so close to a dangerous battle field or to be a little wary of what they do. But let me see, the battle will renew a again to-morrow, Violet, and her sisters said they have plans of the enemy which was intended for to-morrow."

Susan replied that the battle might be postponed indefinitely, whereupon the Camp Fire Girls exchanged meaningless glances and passed on in less than ten minutes half of the whole army knew of the plans of the enemy to renew the contest and talking about other reports of the enemy discarding the plans of the battle for the new ones on account of general Nichols' failure and of him being wounded, and saying that "they expected Hanley and Federal were getting afraid."

Ever long the report in the shape of some sort of a warning reached general Jack Evans who caring but little what result was assigned, for the resumption of the engagement, so that he got his army well out of disastrous consequences, assumed a much injured and defiant air and said "He reckoned he should manage to survive if he had to go through hell to lick the enemy—then pulling up his uniform shirt collar, and brushing his hair he left his tent and went to where the headquarters of Violet, and her sisters to hear of them the enemy's plans. At first they were not in and he walked up a road and ringing at Gertrude's own headquarters door, asked for Mrs. Angelina Archburg, who brave in beautiful always liked to receive him not only because she liked him so much as a friend, and a great military captain, but because she was fond of giving him all the information necessary, and therefore there was something exceedingly satisfying in the fact that the enemy would be put in his place by Evans. If not by any one else... It mattered not that Gertrude told her friends secrets to him she cared nothing for that because it always ended bad for the enemy. Her life so far even since she was three years old had been one long series of perils, horrors, and adventures, until now at eleven years of age there was not in the whole world a more finished, a more military or a girl scout more trained by the enemy than Angelina Archburg.

Two hours that late afternoon passed on and she had told him all, and when rumors at last reached Violet, and her sisters that general Evans had been long in military attendance upon the great Abbe-annian girl spy and girlscout guard lan whose name was even a terror to the enemy. At first they refused to believe it, but when girlscouts assured them it was true, and when they themselves hadocular demonstration of the fact, they came and told him their own discoveries and asked him to act accordingly. Violet said I wrote this down in overhearing the conversation of the foe. Here Evans it's for you to understand;

"One of the generals said that who ever the christian general was who moved into the game this afternoon seemed to be overthrowing strong for attackers to meet in the open and that if the attack was proved too strong on the rear, the demonstration was rather recalled than repulsed by the christians. The officer over and say that if they could only think of some way to land the christian general Hanson and give the christian army a knockout while they got it boggy."

The other general then said, "Yes, but what's holding those christian dogs up?
If that dog of a Hanson came up to the fray he and his fellows must have big resources we don't know anything about. If we do not drive them from here those prying eyes of those child scouts will discover the mysteries of Abbe-ann and then Glandell is sunk." He was then silent for a moment or so Evans, and he resumed "Hurray I've got it Johnson—now I remember—Hanson is in charge of a larger army concentrated near Santa Cruz. He'd never expect an attack in that quarter. John smash his army there he'll be done for. He has a fleet of cavalry there also, troops, munitions and a big military layout—but not too big for us to tackle. John get in touch with general Raymo and Richardson Federal. Joseph Creek—sorry also you Jake—time is wasting now. If we are going to get general Hanson we have to nail him before he has time to renege the conflict to-morrow."

Evans then immediately wired the news to general Hanson, and in the cover of the night that big division of troops was on the way swiftly to make a junction, and general Federal was to be fooled. Violet herself declared that "General Pugnose Federal as he's nicknamed would not get ahead of her."

Violet, and her sisters also loved their country's cause as sincerely as they could love, and not even the most dreaded perils and adventures they went through could make them for a moment forget the country's cause, and they were bound to see it won, or die if there is failure.

By the time of early rising, learning that the battle was being renewed again and that it was going to be simply terrifying that day all of the girlscouts and boys were to move to a different section and do as much work in saving the army from being wrecked as it was possible. On Elias account for she had been wounded early in the day before by a shell fragment and was suffering; Gertrude had decided to remain in the camp during a part of the day until she saw how she fared, and she labored hard to have Susan remain too offering as a last inducement to have Jack with her, but one of the violet girls had come, and they wanted to take Susan to a certain part of the line for a special purpose, and therefore toward that destination Susan was to accompany her, promising Gertrude however to come back again as soon as possible and who kept at parting with her more than she had ever done before had it been other friends. Susan had partially engaged to go to the Glen north of Stenbolstro but Violet assuming the fullest command over her, declared she should not, as the Glen was as dangerous as a lost region of Hudson just now.

"I don't want you or any one else to go anywhere where I wouldn't go myself," said she. "We are the attackers upon the enemy just now but Heaven only knows what'll happen next. You know I've been through lots and have seen perils you never thought of. No you mustn't even think of going to the Glen."

Susan slightly colored, for Violet's manner of life had somewhat puzzled her, and Jenny herself had whispered in her ear. "I know Violet loves you as she does the rest, and therefore she knows best, as she has had experience. So she tells you."

Angeline, who too had once mischievously addressed Susan as "Violet" adding that there was no one among her friends whom she would as willingly call by that name for she was greatly favored by "Violet" and her sisters. "When I was a wee little girl," said she, "my parents used to tease me about my sister, but now she's a bigger girl than me. You never saw the condition in that Glen did you. Between you and me it's dangerous, and—and" A loud bugle call and a new fear of the battle prevented her from finishing, and the conversation never again was resumed on that subject. Then Susan was to leave with Violet, and she stood in the company street talking with Ida, Violet came in with her riding saddle on and a shell thrown carelessly over her arm.

"Where are you going now Princess?" "Asked Ida.

"To the right wing of general Evans line. I have great military business there, concerning the battle. My sisters are accompanying me."

"When will you return?" continued Ida feeling that it would be doubly lonely when every one else was away, and she would have to remain behind on guard.

"That depends on the circumstances of this battle," said the princess. "I shall stop at Santa Vera on my way back, provided Susan is willing to risk the adventure with me."

"Are you going to Vantum?"

"No, the battle is raging near there. It's impossible."

Susan however answered that if she was always glad to do anything, and then as the horses were brought up, they started to other world where Violet's sisters were waiting. Susan never remembered having had a more exciting ride on horse back, than from Ida Headquarters toward where Violet's sisters were waiting.

A squadron of Glandellian patrol on horseback, and being the Omians saw them for they during the battle had even dared to ride within the christian camps to do their spying or scouting, and they at once gave pursuit riding their horses' literally to death to say in their efforts to catch the two girls. They did not recognize who Violet was, but they recognized Susan and she it was who they wanted to secure. Violet during the whole exciting chase was an agreeable and interesting personage, she never got excited, but too usual to Susan took matters as coolly as if they were just in a hurry to get there, but when the Glandellians got too close, she suddenly wheeled her horse herself, and drawing both pistols, charged down upon the surprised Glandellians. Her shots came so fast, and with such deadly aim, that the enemy with shouts of dismay at this unexpected encounter scurried for cover.

"Come this way now," said Violet in surprise herself. Why Susan how did you dare to do it. I never thought you could even present such a formidable army by yourself."

"The Glandellians know me and know I'm a good gunner," she answered. "They won't persecute me no more I believe."

She was right, and now with Violet and her sisters quickly joining she seemed to discover new beauties in every scene which they passed and felt rather sorry when the winding winding road brought them close to the main camp and armed her that the active battle lines were near at hand for the noise was louder now.

"I shall hope to discover some new mystery about Abbe-ann next week," said Violet as she halted the column. "Now to go first to general Curfew's headquarters.
He's not in, being at the front, but we sure need some breakfast. I forgot even to take some. How uncommon of us. It's the first time we did this."

During the whole day yesterday the generals orderly had despite his worries about the battle been putting things to right, and when the Princesses and Susan arrived they found everything in ~~perfect~~ good order. The place was not occupied by any officers and a cheerful little ~~rehabilitation~~ was blazing in the little parlor, and before it stood the nice little dining room table while two beautiful little kittens lay upon the hearth rug asleep with their soft velvet jaws locked lovingly round each others necks.

"Oh how pleasant it would be if I was home once more," said Violet herself, but just then Susan did not reply. Her thoughts because of the roar of the battle were elsewhere, and much as she herself might have liked being alone the peace ~~presence~~ presence of Violet and her sisters did not hurt her happiness to any extent. At Violet and her sisters sisters hoped the general would be coming soon and with that hope Violet and her sisters appeared also cheerful and gay even though they did dread the consequences of the battle to day, however among the first officers to call was general Howard Perkins who came early in the morning bringing with him reports that so far the enemy was suffering from the attack, but holding his own. He had just brought up his troops was asking to join at the first command, he said, and thought maybe he could get some new ideas, from Susan's suggestions, which he very boldly asked to hear. With the utmost good humor, Susan told of what she had heard of the enemy plan, and he took it up as a good joke on the enemy.

"But then," said he, "I here you've joined the girlscouts known as the Rangers, and that accounts for it, for they're all good scouts and in my opinion take the enemy dread them more than we are."

"by we are the lancers," said Susan.
At this the general dropped his hat and with a short ejaculatory prayer "thank God," the general exclaimed "Well I am glad you have come and I believe they are the best scouts any one could have had." However it was in vain that Violet and her sisters referred him to the dictionary for the definition of the word "lancers." He knew all about it he said, and shouldn't wonder that the enemy will be begging mercy from them on bended knees some day, day.

The appearance of a nicely roasted bit of veal quieted their fears on that subject, and as the effects of the strong brown coffee became apparent, Violet said "It's likely enough we are not wretched enough on those Glandelinians, for to tell the truth, she never felt so solemn in her life as she did when they had chased her for ten miles but this added 'I do object to be chased when we want to accomplish something, and I can't help it.'"

At breakfast the general was over, and with it the tail of the officer, who had gathered enough about the enemy to bring disaster sure enough. The interest which Violet and her sisters had felt in Susan when they first became acquainted with her, was greatly increased by how especially when they saw how she had improved in all her military work; how good she was in her manners and appearance, and it was then they conceived the idea of educating her, determining to raise her to the rank of their mascot if she proved to be all they hoped she would. That she did meet their expectations was evident that their object of taking her out of this new adventure, was to settle a question which she alone could decide. Violet and her sisters had asked her to risk anything to accompany them through the territory because it was there their resolution had been formed, and it was there they would make it known. Susan too had something which she wished to say to Violet, and her sisters, she would first thank them for their kindness to her, and her parents too much memory, but the moment she commenced talking upon the subject, Violet stopped her, and for the first time since they were together, Violet placed an arm around her waist and kissing her cheek she said:

"Shall I tell you Susan how you can repay it," she did not reply, and Violet continued "Give me all the assistance you can for our cause, and I and my sisters shall be repaid a million fold..."

Whatever Susan's answer then would have been, and we are not saying she answered at all, Violet and her sisters were satisfied, and when they told her how dear the Christian cause was to them, how they loved their country, and their God, and asked if they might not hope that they too had been remembered, Susan gave her consent to do anything without idea that they had heard of the kind of girl scout Susan was turning out to be and therefore their mind had been made up in taking Susan for their mascot, they felt they could have no better girl aide-de-camp... Until another battle subdued them at there on a log, talking of the battle, which Violet said would all be one bright dream of happiness should they be forced to leave the territory; and Susan from the very fullness of apprehension as to the outcome swept, as she thought how strange it was that she should be a mascot of the Princesse the high priestess of a girl scout, and when many a dashing girl had tried in vain to become Jannet's mascot, Jean and Jolote, and she was to be Violet. Then it was decided by Violet and her sisters to go elsewhere, and a they asked Susan to come with her to Glenview as they wished to see her before she died. The tent of poor poor Susan were open and the heated forest fire air came in kissing her the little six girls white brown and making her feel the fever from her wounds still more...

"Has Penrod come?" she asked of "Bright eyed Mary and in the tones of her voice there was an unusual gentleness. For a long, long, time and now she had either seemed or was so indifferent and obstinate in her feelings toward the enemy, that all who knew and saw her were surprised. But hour after hour, when over one thought she slept Mary prayed for the young girl scout, that out of her friend die so soon as she had been such a good servicable girl, and the surely the country could not spare her, and as if answer to her prayers, and the horses that were said for her, rose gradually began to change just a little, and yet too she listened to the sound of battle and heard the details which came to her from outside, she kept wondering though, why Mary thought, and she thought that general Viviane army might win when she was afraid it could not again in a sudden burst of passion she would say "the heard too much of the news as was determined not to die, that she might live and serve her country—she couldn't live anyway, she couldn't. But at last for a time such feelings began to pass away, and as it seemed the sun of her short little life was setting, she felt more and more discouraged. She had not again asked to be taken to any other part of the camp, for she knew that could not be when there was no telling what would happen through the Christian camps but nevertheless she wandered by Penrod stayed so long from Glenview when he surely knew she was going to die, as the doctor said her wounds were really worse than mortal. On her return and scouting tour Jean Saunders had told Rose, and as gently as possible, how busy he was, and of her fears too that the army was surely going to win in this desperate conflict, that Penrod could not come until he was off duty, and that he too was becoming discouraged and as worried as others before a time was perfectly still, and Jean therefore thinking she was asleep, was about to leave the tent... when Rose called her back bidding her to sit down by her side said:

"Will you join, do you think Penrod is worried about me?"
"He would be an unusual friend of yours if he did not," answered Jean, her own heart beating more tenderly toward her girl friend, whose gentle manner she could understand just then. "Penrod had a mass said for your recovery this morning. It cost him his last red cent..."

"Then resumed Rose 'If he does love me and is worrying about me he'll be still more sorry when I am dead, and perhaps my death may save the army from ruin.'"

The tears dropped slowly from her long eye lashes, while Jean, kissing her forehead cheek against the thin pale face near her sobbed out:

"Please you must not even try to die—No dear, you must not die and leave me till I discourage you all you cannot be spared from us now."

The day following the fall of the hill was visible and more rapidly and though letters were frequently sent to Penrod, telling him of Rose's danger, he still could not be released from duty, which each time Rose had asked "Will he come soon?" and she would weep because he was not there. Calmly and without a murmur she had told the story on this third day of battle of the rain threatening the army. Before that time she had asked that if it was possible to be taken back home designating the spot where she wished to be buried; but now she insisted upon being laid down at the foot of the hill near her parents' garden, and near the green hedge where the spring blossoms were earlier found, and where the flowers of Fall lingered longest. The music of a strain so close by her home, she declared would soothe her as she slept and its cool moisture keep the grass green and fresh upon her grave. On the fourth morning of the battle when Gertrude was sitting by Rose, and she frequently did uttering interludes against Glandelinia, poor Rose said: "Don't talk so Gertrude dear don't. Mostly the Glandelinians did have something to do with it, but also I have done it too by my own carelessness for leaving out into a dangerous territory where I shouldn't have gone, and then she confessed where she had gone; her mad adventure, and thoughtlessly exposed her health on the first day of the battle, even when her wounds were throbbing with pain. "I know you will forgive me for my carelessness," said she, "or most severely as I received my lesson."

Then as she heard Jean's voice in the company street on the outside, she said: "There is one more thing I would like to say to you, and I do, you must please to keep Jean from too great an adventure like mine was. All of us are in jail, I know, always, and so are you, but he has a real noble heart, and for my sake Gertrude do what you can to save the rest of your troop from any such list. Promise me Gertrude promise me that you'll take care of all the others."

Gertrude's Angelic though courageous, was proud of her cause, and the struggle her bosom was long and severe, but love for poor Rose and all her followers conquered all other feelings, and to the oft repeated question, "Promise me, Gertrude, will you not," she finally answered: "I will!"

"Yes, Rose, for your sake I will give the consent, though nothing else will have wrong it from me."

"And Gertrude," continued Rose, "May not Penrod be sent here now? I'm sure I must live much longer and I long to see him once more, and tell him that how I love him like a brother to me."

A brother to her, indeed! how heavily those words sank upon the heart of the girl scout. Penrod was yet away, couldn't leave off duty to come and see her no other way he wanted to, and though in Jean's letter Rose herself had feebly traced the words "Leave me off and come Penrod dear, come" he still was forced to linger, no if bound by a spell he could not break, and there she petitioned Gertrude to release him so he could come, so the minutes and hours of that morning went by. Jack could remember how long ago the sun would slowly came up from the eastern horizon, and its red beams danced for a time upon the wall of her chamber, but now she gazed victoriously toward the stroke darkened east, murmuring:

"That day was and will be the last—the last that I'll ever see the day rise." Later Jack remembered the there bringing word that Penrod could not come until the Princess would release him from duty. Strong was the agony at work in the hearts of many of the child scouts, and still Jack himself nerved himself to support the girl while every minute he feared and expected the shadows of death to creep over her face. Jean wholly overcome, declared she could not remain in the tent and went out to pray. Poor Jean then weary with watching and tears, and while herself leaned heavily against a tree, and rose as often as her eyes unloosed and rested upon her would or did whisper:

"Jean dear Jean I wished you was my sister."

"Bright eyed Mary had laid many a dear girl and boy scout since the war was young in the grave, and as she saw another leaving her, she thought how great was the number of children-gone to heaven already—and yet still her young little heart was quivering with anguish, for Jean had shown strongly in her affection. But for the sake of the other sorrowing ones, she hushed her own grief, knowing that any one of them might be going like her, and believing that any one of them might be still alive day when Jean no young ally it seemed to her unfair that she should still live day when Jean no young should thus die so early because a strapping had laid her lay."

"If Penrod does not come soon, and I really die," said Jean "tell him it was my last request that he put his greatest efforts to find the man among the Glandolinians who shot me—and try to capture him if possible, and say that the bitterest pang I felt in dying was the fear that the man who is a famous Glandolinian sniper might also get away from us without ever being seen. Penrod cannot look upon me dead, and feel discouraged in doing that, asked, and as he stands over my grave, also tell him to please never to forget his borille to our country which had adopted him as one of her country men."

Here she became too much exhausted to speak any more, and so after she fell into a quiet sleep. When she awoke toward the approach of noon, Jack was sitting on a bench on the side of the tent with his head resting upon the table, while her own was pillowed upon the strong arm of George Zimmerman, a man who was holding tenderly over her, and soothing her as he would his own sister. Quickly her faded cheeks glowed, and her eyes sparkled with something of its olden light but "Dear George, dear George" was all she had strength to say—and when George and even Violet and her sisters, who had accompanied him, approached her they only knew that they were recognized by the pressure of the little blue veiled hand of Jean, with such drooped heavily upon the counterpane, while the eye lids closed languidly, and with the words "I'm afraid he cannot come," she again fell asleep. But this time it was the long deep sleep from which she would never come. After she was dead, slowly the fog of smoke from the battle though distant shrouded around the camp, and the tent, where death had no suddenly left its throne. Only all the kind hearted boy and girl scouts panned in and out of the tent, ministering first to the dead, and then turning aside to weep at they looked upon the bowed boy Jack, who with his head upon the table still at rest just as he did when they told him she had died. At this fact on a little stool sat poor Jean, pressing his hands, and covering them with the tears she for his dead in vain to reproach. At last there was the sound of some one on the fallow coming down the company street, and in a moment Penrod stepped into the tent suddenly started and turned pale when he saw Jenny and Mary in violent grief and sobbing. Bathing Jenny's face and trying to soothe her. Before he had time to ever ask a single question Jenny's arms were around his neck, and she whispered: "What had she just died a brave boy killed early this morning the last factor."

"What had she just died?" "Because our life was being shattered by the 'dam' and that I couldn't get off duty till now was his answer. He had nothing else to say however and mechanically following Jenny he entered the tent room where there had just died. Very beautiful had she been in life, and yet she was far more beautiful in death, and all unconscious of the scalding tears which fell upon her face, as Penrod now bent over her, kissing her lips and calling upon her to wake, and then Jack's life once more. Finally when she thought she could bear it no more Jenny told him all poor Jean had said, and Penrod swore that he would do it, and when he got that man—there were many who stood by and heard that solemn vow, and knew that it would be kept, and that poor Jean and many others would not have died in vain for the cause. The burial of the dead child had to be prompt, and it was accomplished that afternoon, and after the burial Jack and Jean and many others returned to their duties.

"Suppose you try and spot out what the confounded enemy is trying to do far over your head," said Penrod to George as they rode over to the direction of the battle field. "But please are attacking? It without results. I'd rather you'd do it than any one else. You know how to do it very well."

He intended doing so, answered the Glandolinian, and he did so bringing much surprising information that it was unexpected, and Penrod at first could hardly find words to express his thanks. But when he did, he thought the boy was very unusual to make such an excellent success, saying however that it might prevent the enemy from winning the battle entirely, and adding that he hoped two or three days of the hardest efforts would enable general Hanson to recover all general Tilden had lost. Then he asked George how he would like to turn battle patrol for a short while. Jenny herself and many others close by looked up in surprise at this, while George asked him what he meant. Then he briefly explained that Penrod told of the situation in the battle, that the enemy might not be forced, and stating his own intentions of going on a scouting tour and that in his absence somebody must take his place and he knew of no one who he could trust more than George.

"Oh that'll be just nice," said the girl, but in a chorus, these love for their country's cause was stronger than ever. "He then," George said Jenny herself, when "Pen Penrod comes back we'll be able to see how the enemy'll look when he finds he couldn't frustrate general Hanson."

George however pressed the little girl's hand which had laid into his, and replied that he would like to oblige ge. Penrod, he could not abandon his duties just now assigned to him by Violet, and her sisters, unless they gave him permission to do so. "But," said he, "believe I could find a good substitute in James Greene, who is anxious for some sort of active service. He is a brave boy, clever and quick, and got eagle eyes."

"Why," exclaimed Gertrude who was standing close by, "did not know that he could do any scouting. I'm afraid he couldn't survive that." Penrod looked and Jenny smiled, and George replied that he'd be willing to do it himself, if she, Gertrude, got the permission of one of the Glandolinian girls for him.

"To can it," said Gertrude in a manner so decided, that no one could doubt it. She then, dispute her sister and her sisters gladly consented to let James Greene take charge of Penrod's scouting patrol. The battle went on as usual with general Hanson's troops, making heavy but futile assaults on the position in the main description of the battle in previous chapters, but the two works were not ever reached, the Glandolinian rifle and artillery fire being so severe and unrelenting that no one could face it in any numbers. General Hanson had urged Glandolinian troops to accompany him in the battle, but he could do nothing either, though he crashed a heavy counter attack made against him, and he finally shook his head at the

"The old gray horses never get left their nests" and the battle went on. "It" threatening to be a tie.

Contrary to the fears of all the boy and girl scouts the Glandolinians neither made no further counter advances, and while general Hanson was making arrangements to move other forces from Lincoln section to Chitopee creek, the enemy let loose a terrific fire, that even devastated a part of the camp where Jean had died, and soldiers fell in numbers too many so that the attack from that quarter had to be withdrawn. Penrod who went on the scouting tour began to see how little he was to any efforts to bid in this locality. He couldn't expect anything to turn out in favor of the attackers here, and consequently he knew if he could do nothing, but aiming his fireman's signals there not to attack, and there to make a defense, and as time went to make plans to to throw the whole army forward in a general attack. Perrod himself began to wonder how himself could accomplish such a feat when all the others had failed. General Williams now had been driven from Blackallian, and all other positions had been lost. Suddenly it occurred to him that he too would go forward with General Evans. He would help him by his alarm to repel any damage done by the wily Glandellian foe—he would not be in the way of such dire perils, as before. He would do something for the cause, and when he returned to his friends, he would find a joyful meeting with his scout companions who should be proud to acknowledge him as their leader. General Evans warmly seconded his resolution, which possibly would never had been carried out had not Perrod heard of General Herndon's death in the engagement on the right. Cursing the fury of the enemy, and half wishing he had been a man himself and could lead an army against the foe, whose strength, though not what he had expected was considerable, he went forth to see the fray with Evans, whose line, but alas, the fury of hell among the Glandellians was there before him, and in an unguarded moment he saw one of the generals the best beloved of the boy and girls, and who had trained them well, General Hadden Spreckles fall mortally wounded as he led a division against the foe. The newly made grave, the bare coffin, the pale, dead girl and boy, and friends of his, and the column was still thought of, and seeing the Glandellian gunners who had brought the general down, he hurried forth a hand grenade and blew every one of them up. The general died at once, on the battle field, died alone, the Christian assault having been repulsed, died alone with Perrod to witness the dying man's last wishes in which he talked of his distant home, of his wife and children. He took from his inside coat pocket a photograph of himself bidding Perrod see to its being sent to his wife and children and tell them the heart they had so earnestly loved was still in death. And Perrod more wretched now, then when his child scouts had died in death, and Perrod more wretched now, then when his child scouts had died in death, he reached by soldiers under fire and had him brought to the rear of the camp where the dead general was laid down to sleep beneath the smoky skies of Glandellian where not one of the many bitter tears that were shed for him could for that time fall upon his lonely grave.

The movement of General Evans great force, assisted by the artillery fire all along the line had been carried through so smoothly and swiftly, he everything had moved with such clockwork precision, that before the noon had fairly approached the right column was moving against the foe. Before this was accomplished General Evans had sent a detail of military detectives to see what they may be called to find out when the fighting hand of the foe was really was.

"Well, you military detectives what did you find out?" he demanded. "If Federal is in command, what happened that we don't know where he is. Come on, be quick about it. I let have your report. My army is moving fast, and we need news."

"Well, sir, the battle everywhere sir is so deadly fierce and savage and so dreadfully violent that it was hard to trace him, but here's what we found out. On the day of early yesterday when the engagement began and when General Warkute fell wounded, and after you had the assaults of yesterday morning fully established against the Glandellian works—were that is too, after the attack was so badly repulsed, General Federal, came up with another general and concentrated his forces near Vintana, and Santa Grutes in the San Francisco Creek district. General Turner is there yet—Federal had a tough job getting his forces into position on account of the lay of the land and of forest fires threatening the neighborhood—finally he got the position strengthened, but early in the engagement Turner piled up with his forces into disaster, and terrible loss, and the general that is blind was killed by the explosion of a big shell."

"Blind?"

"Yes, he's as blind as a bat since the injury, and Federal during the fray didn't send him no support. We trailed the battle line toward General Greek but we couldn't tell where Federal was in command and whether he was your opposer or not. But we could not discover a trace of him, but then when he must be too far off to trouble us, and maybe concentrated before General Aronson, before we know."

"So the Glandellian general Turner is blind, and his army broken up?"

"Well, that's a break for us. No general, not even Federal could beat a combination of blind men, but just the same I feel much better if I knew where that Glandellian fighting eagle is right now."

The battle on this morning was a sort of broken up one though equal in violence of the day before, and far more extended, but nevertheless all the boys and girls were without the movement of the various Christian commands were so excited that no one cared for the sleep they had lost the night before, in fact no one had ever dared to sleep at home at last was grand action. Now General Evans' line of battle was fairly launched on the great adventure. Every half distance that the advancing columns covered was driving portions of the enemy lines back, and the boy and girls were going heavier to the scene of actual fighting, the destroyed a good portion of the main line of troops. That was coming too close for comfort, too."

"One single dozen!" make a flock!" replied "Blind," "At that time we didn't believe the enemy could make such a move, and after that flanking column slipped past General Frederick Hanson's troops there was nothing to stop it before it got upon Hanson's rear. But you bet it won't be no such since to do it now, with all our general's people on the job."

The next few minutes the progress of the Christian column in their advance was increasing. The great Christian column moved across the shell swept fields with tremendous speed for the men were all on the swiftest run for the enemy's sake. As while he declared the Christian advance was so unusually steady that there was little, very little hope for the Glandellians in the position in their front to oppose them successfully, and too there was so much to be seen and done under these novel conditions that every minute during this time was filled with interest and great excitement. Two minutes later other Christian batteries were coming into position, and seeing this, and how the Christian forces were working ahead the boy and girls all felt a shiver, a very comfort in the knowledge of the presence of the newly arranged line of batteries with the business like air of their gun crews and their wicked looking eyes. Other Christian troops kept pace with the main line of attack, within easy supporting distance, occasionally exchanging signals, and keeping their flags waving.

"General Williams is the finest army in the world," cried Jack with enthusiasm as his kindling eyes rested on the Christian troops were now making. "This is one army that has never failed yet the countryman for him gun for him, and with his division, there's nothing in the world that can beat it, even though it is checked in its purpose some time. We never retreat from an enemy, whether we lose or win a battle. Just watch our batteries, along up the enemy should be attempt to counter charge."

"They'll do to General Marley, what General Hanson did to Federal at Evansville at Clark's few months ago," said Jane. "Every nation feared General Hanson could not disaster there, but that idea of danger did not make a hit with him, and he almost wiped General Federal's army off the face of the earth, and what did to Federal he did to Marley."

Jack's eyes, however had been idly roaming over the battleground, while the others were doing their talking, but suddenly his gaze became fixed, and he started to his feet.

"Do you see that boy?" he demanded sharply.

"No, sir."

"The enemy is pushing forward in a counter charge, and their artillery is increasing its fire."

"Where?"

"I don't see anything," said George.

"They are fear you of a long wave in gray," exploded Jack, pointing. "There see, they're coming forward with a rush. Great Scott, it's Marley's main line rushing forward. He'll be a storm sure. How were in for it. Our troops are falling back."

Almost as he spoke the new Christian batteries with a rolling thundering roar added to the din of Baldwin's batteries, other batteries from where they couldn't tell roared their challenge, followed by the deeper base of the guns from a battery to the left, and for a time everything was hidden from view by smoke. In an instant there was the greatest excitement, though without the slightest trace of panic. The boys almost strained their eyes, but at that moment the smoke began to clear away, and the receding troops could be seen going about as if they were going around to another direction in response to some sound of a loud bang. The bell from somewhere and in receding but with their front to the foe began to suddenly dissolve away in smoke, and from the column came a dreadful sound, something like hitting on a hard hollow piece of wood with a million hammers, something like becoming a continual roar. Then along the enemy advancing, the surge of a long white wave of smoke also, and then the wave of smoke broke and the boys and girls could hear their "devil yell" which was like the howling of a hurricane at that distance. Nearer and nearer it came, and the slowly receding Christian forces, and the Christian troops continued the retreat or gave faster, or broke away in confusion the assault could have been fatal. As it was the Glandellian column had to swing to the left, and crashed with the line of troops in purple but ran like a wave to the rear and then back by a breakwater.

The troops, and the reserves in the rear came rushing like mad toward the shattered Christian line at this section for but for a time no trace of any other scene was visible because the smoke again hid the view. Thousands of children eyes watched for the result in vain while in their excitement their ears almost forgot to breathe. Minutes passed, the smoke again cleared and a mighty cheer went up for the Glandellian who was a wreck of a boy, and in an hour passed and it receded back toward the hill of the Glandellian drumbeat roar of cannon, the shriek and crash bang of so many shells, and scenes of many hand to hand fights with the stubborn enemy.

"It sure must make the Glandolinian generals sore-headed," said Willie to think that none of our best armies is being against them so repeatedly.

"That is not the point," said George. "It is to think that one of their own batteries now in our possession is covering the advance with a curtain fire."

"Part of it," said Willie. "I heard the Glandolinians felt they had the best of us yesterday when they smashed up with our army," said Willie. "They figured it would take at least a year or two before we could get our broken lines of battle into fit shape again, and yet it's only since night time since they tore through our lines, and here they're again pounding the enemy's lines as if nothing had ever happened to them."

"And the Glandolinians say the Christian dogs couldn't fight," said James.

"Well, dogs can fight cats at least," laughed one of the girls.

"It's not the first mistake the Glandolinian generals have ever made," said Jack. "What was it the general Jackson Manley called us? 'Little boy and girl devils of the lost world?'"

"Yes, and whether we are or not, we got onto his game nevertheless and some day will send him and his Confederation a running for life."

"There goes the call for the other line of troops to advance," cried Willie, as the bugle rang out its wondrous note for the advance. "This battle view is magnificent and exciting but we ought to have plenty of time to enjoy that. Let's stop for a while and eat a little something for our dinner, for if we get too near the battle anywhere, we'll be wishing we were in China, and you know what Violet, and her sisters said. There's a penalty for any one who gets wounded because he or she got so near the close to the battle. We are not to do so as the enemy don't worry a rap more about us, than if we were flies."

"Little Willie wants to eat all he can," grinned James as a shell crashed like the world and overhead, and as they plunged along in his wake. "He's afraid he'll be killed before the day is over, and he wants to die with a full 'broad basket'."

"Not on your life boy," flung back Willie. "You're too taking through your cap. We can't get injured or killed this far away from the battle field. But look there, the Christian line that is now moving forward is no big and extensive that it could hide half a dozen waves of the enemy's counter attack at once, and general Evans' advance is accordingly a windstorm windstorm."

Although the great Christian onslaught was undiminished as regards what the boys saw on the external appearance, the enemy fire was starting a complete transformation of the whole advance. When the whole wave first started forward with the purpose to storm general Federal's lines it was formed into a magnificent long column partly angular in shape but extensive, but now the enemy fire was ruthlessly tearing the whole attack asunder, but so extensive was the field of advance within view of the children that they did not yet see this. The line of advance was being torn asunder into many breaches from flank to flank. Everything seemed to be sacrificed to the hope of crushing the Glandolinian army, and shells and high explosives by the thousands tore up every available ten paces of the line advance, and it would have been worse had not the Christian guns at all points let go into a terrific storm of their own.

It was a gigantic battle clamor, and apart from the wreckage of shell fire the noise was becoming frightful.

"A Glandolinian counter charge though would certainly make a ten-strike in it would crush against that line of advance now," remarked Frank Wheeler as he bated his lunch. The boy and girl babies were all securing a point of vantage from a high rise of ground where they could see but a of the battle, though there was a risk of being exposed should the enemy suddenly direct his fire that way.

General Federal would get the gold Cross or medal whatever it is from the Government of Glandolinia, sure enough," replied Jack. "That line of advance is so big a target that he could hardly miss it if he took it in his mind to fire forward at a counter charge."

"I don't think there is much danger," said Jack, "to the boys, as the heard the roar of so many guns from the Christian batteries covering the charge. If a Glandolinian battery's charge is made the enemy would be more likely to be the worst sufferer. Since then how in action distance anything that the enemy has, and our line of battle is prepared to meet one if it comes too, I'm sure."

"No way nothing of our reserves," said Jack. "It's all right to counter attack a line of troops not supported by artillery fire but it's a different thing when all of general Baldwin's artillery is on the job. Listen to them roll their thunder so wildly. I can't believe there's a chance of the foe counter attacking."

"There are general Turner's battery at," said Wilfred looking about over the broad expanse which showed no trace of anything but wilds of battle smoke. "They'll be brought up when there's necessity for their use," said Jack. "There's no danger of a counter attack unless our forces are repulsed. The enemy are holding his positions pretty tight to meet the charge our forces are making."

"I don't think we ought to reckon too much on that," said Wilfred. "You know a counter attack in a battle a year ago crowned general Hanson's flank and work. The Glandolinians had struck however an enormous blow and though the counter assault had been repulsed with frightful loss to the enemy, the Christian line was moving back slowly to its own position.

"We got hard hit nevertheless," said Jack miserably.

"The Glandolinians can't get away with it never," said Wilfred. "Blessed with rally them and renew the attack I'm sure."

"The enemy got it worse," said James.

"What did I tell you about our army," cried Jack. "The Glandolinian generals can't put one over on general Jack Evans."

"You've got to hand it to that Glandolinian general who led the daring counter attack," said Wilfred. "He sure had his nerve right with him to try and break up an advancing Christian column right under the nose of such strong Christian batteries."

"Yes," agreed Wilfred. "Although after all the counter charge may have been a chance meeting with the advancing Christians. The Glandolinian commander of that column of the might have been as surprised as we were when he might have been advancing to support general Manley and found himself so close to our advancing battle line. But being there it was too good a chance to miss and he let fly with the counter attack."

"Maybe there wouldn't have been a high old time in Glandolinia and thought throughout her states if our armies would have suffered disaster from that counter attack," said Jack. "Think of being able to boast truthfully that they demolished Abbe's best fighting army under the Virgin General. They'd have hung on the flag and rung the bells, and gave the school children a week's time off."

"Well, a miss is as good as a mile," returned Wilfred. "It's a heap more comfortable sitting here and talking about it, than it would be to be in the rear of a good army on a retreat with the enemy shelling us everywhere."

"Well, that particular particular Glandolinian column of troops will never do any more attacking," said Wilfred. "Since meeting our resistance and as our terrific shell fire tore them all to pieces its ill over with them now it must be a fearful thing for so many of them fighting for such a wicked cause should have made the way many hundreds of thousands of those foolish few fellows did, as if they were like the people who died in St. Pierre when the volcano there exploded. It's no wonder that the Glandolinian generals find it pretty hard to get the officers to send their men forward to counter charge our army's armies."

"At least it sure is pretty rough on them all when luck goes against them like that," admitted Jack. "But if those fellows fought for a more air warbler time, and played the war game fairly, I'd feel sorry for them. Don't forget that if they saw us all congregated on this hill, they'd have their long range batteries trained on us at a single moment, and they're too busy resting general Evans to see what is going on here, and if women and children were burning to death in forest fires, or burning in the floods they'd stand about grinning and looking at us. And if all of the population of California were drowned or burned in the fire it would make no difference to them."

"Might you are indeed," declared a boy scout by the name of Billy Adams. "Do you remember what a Glandolinian regiment did that opened fire on a river and sank a whole town under water by bursting a levee near the region called Prince of Peace Creek. While the people were on the house tops trying to save themselves, or crowding in floating wooden houses, they opened shell fire, and smashed the houses and floating wreckage, drowning many, and taking the women and children as managed to swim to shore as prisoners, and left them on top of a levee."

"Yes," agreed Wilfred. "I've heard of that. Then the Glandolinians let go with a storm of liquid fire burning all their captives on the levee to death about thirty thousand. If that wasn't the worst, brutal and most cold blooded murder ever known on record there was never anything else like it in any world history. Soldiers are wicked as that dumbfound me, may flabbergast me in the fact that in battle they're nevertheless so darned dare devil in their bravery and recklessness, as that sometimes it takes annihilation to stop their assault."

"I hope the Glandolinian regiment which did this terrible thing was in that water assault," said Jack. "Perhaps being under such destructive fire as did not seem to be a joke to them when their turn came to die in such numbers, especially as they went to that beautiful and dark warm place."

"What place you mean?"

"Heaven's house down below."

"From that line on the Christian attack though repulsed was being rallied under the fire of their artillery fire, and because of so many strange movements of the enemy the vigilance of the boy and girl scouts were redoubled, for although general opinion was only that it could be only a chance meeting that the enemy discovered them on the hill, no one knew but that this one Glandolinian counter attack was simply made by one of a grand division of the enemy, whose many division might come on to try for better luck where their comrade division failed."

"biggest column of glandelinian cavity I ever saw," remarked Willie.
"They're no glandelinians," declared Bart after a prolonged inspection through a pair of glasses that he produced from his kit. "They're the Winkie Abyssinilians." "Winkie Abyssinilians," exclaimed Willie, "as close to the battle line as that and a near the foe line. Can't be possible. You're dreaming."
"You can see for yourself," said Bart as he handed the glasses to him. "Take a look at them and you'll see that by the uniforms I saw and the glads they carry that they are not even Glandelinians," wearing the No Starlet."
"that they are not even Glandelinians," said one of the squaddies of cowardly-announced Jack.

"What's the idea that they are there?" asked James with great interest; "I haven't seen a soldier now since the rear of battle in this quarter was now dying down somewhat. Suppose as the officers look spot a troop going through some woods, what would it do him or us?"

"I don't know," exclaimed Jack, "and he sends out a patrol."

"path and the cavalry is going to strike this time..."

Guided evidently by signals from one of the Abyssinians officers, two of the columns formed one long wave of men on horseback with lances thrust forward and with yells that made a noise like a windstorm started advancing as one swift and close together. The other column approached from the other direction, and with a yell Minutes passed, the glandelinian artillery fire continued, and still the enemy forces lay like a sullen monster, apparently beaten and shaken but not subdued. Then it was Baldwin batteries to take turns at the offensive, and they opened,

But the cavalry had no orders from General Evans or Hanson to storm the batteries and therefore remained still in the same positions.

It was the explosive action of the advancing Communist forces, from the force of which the soldiers were being driven, that caused the explosion. One of the soldiers was killed and the others were wounded. The explosion was caused by the action of the soldiers who were being driven back by the force of the advancing Communist forces.

The word had been passed quickly through the whole wood,, wood, and the whole company of boy and girls were on the alert. They waited until the wagon train had passed part way beyond.

"Ready for action everybody" signalled Penrod.
With their small rifles in hand, and all their senses keenly on the alert, the boy and girls waited for the coming of their prey. Half of the number of wagons had passed by but with a perceptible jar one of the wagon wheels of the wagon in front of Jean struck a root in the road, and the whole thing toppled over with a crash, hurling the driver and all out of the wagon. The root had been concealed there on purpose to trip up that wagon and therefore block the road so no one could escape the trap they had rode into.

"Charge" signalled Penrod and out from the woods on both sides of the road the boy and girls came with a rush, yelling and shrieking to terrifying the Glandelinian cavalry escort. The astonished Glandelinians were taken so utterly by surprise to see they were child scouts that they all stood for a moment as though paralyzed. Then the commander of the cavalry barked out a sharp order, and the cavalry quickly formed into a line and rushed forward to counter charge. The foremost of the child scouts, opened a withering fire, so terrible that that whole front line of cavalry went down, horses and men together in a confused conglomerate windrow, and the second line came to a confused stop.

"Forward, surround every one" shouted the boy and girls' scout leaders, but don't shoot no more unless you have to." was the next order, and an instant later the survivors of the enemy, cavalry, and drivers were ringed about with rifles whose ominous muzzled mouths threatened to mow them down at the first false move.

The Glandelinian cavalry officer had started to draw his pistol but seeing the uselessness of this he shoved it back into its holster, and then shouted—

"Hey you drivers you have the chance yet. We'll never surrender. Blow the wagons up even if it kills us all and the Christian dogs too."

The drivers dashed within the wagons to carry out this terrible scheme, but into them shot the boys and girls and had full possession, having shot or knocked down the drivers before they could set anything off.

"Surrender you reckless wild cats or we'll give no quarter" shouted Penrod.

"Go to hell" shouted the leader of the cavalry, and he suddenly urged his horse forward to charge down on Penrod!

"Crack" was the boy's revolver, and the bullet took the reckless colonel right between the eyes and he fell from the horse.

The rest of the Glandelinians seeing the jig was up raised their hands in signal of surrender. Another command from Penrod, as Gertrude now rode up, and the cavalry men were disarmed and even deprived of their horses. A certain number of the Abyssinian soldier escort were detailed to guard them, and others were placed in charge of the wagons. The child scouts though angry beyond endurance at first because of the stubbornness of their prey, were now wild with delight at such a rich prize that had so unexpectedly fallen into their hands. Knowing the amount of ammunition that a single wagon of the enemy generally carried they were sure they had captured a million rounds, if not more.

"We have had a great day boys and girls too," exclaimed Francis "if we never have any other. And this is the day, when we nabbed a big long wagon train and took five hundred soldiers prisoners, and nearly a hundred drivers."

"Glory Hallelujah, and Deo Gratias," growled Bartel, and to think we have all the wagons in such good shape for even the one that is tipped over is good and only needs to be hauled up again. Our soldiers and generals have been crazy for a long time to find out just what kind of wagon trains Hanley's army has. Maybe the officers won't come running when they learn of this. And we make this capture right in a battle field. Glory Hallelujah."

"And maybe there won't be any joy in the army," jubilated Tom O'Neil, and perhaps the little "Glandelinian pussy mews" won't kneel their teeth, hunch their back and spit with fury," chuckled Whillie. "Oh Regiments all we sure had luck when Gertrude sent us out here this afternoon."

"The other Glandelinian officer who's a captain is a hard loser," remarked Jean. "See that scowl on his face. A thundercloud from a tornado has nothing on him now. He's as mad as a tiger through and through."

"And look at the uniform he has" said Mildred.

"Maybe he stole it from the King of the world," sneered James.

"I would like to have all that tin foil he wears to sell for fifty cents," chuckled Delores. "That's all they are worth."

"He's a hero, bah," said James.

The child scouts would like nothing better than to have a chance to over haul the contents of the wagons and see the many interesting and novel explosives, and munitions in them, but they had to be doomed to disappointment, for they wouldn't dare let the enemy catch them at the slightest disadvantage or they'd lose their prey and probably be blown up too. They were all inflexible in their resolve to be on their utmost guard, and to allow absolutely nothing on the captured wagons he disturbed until they were brought safely within the Christian lines, and therefore though sorely against their wills the boys and girls were compelled to content themselves with an exterior view of the wagons. Sixteen men had succeeded in righting the other wagon and placed all the explosives and ammunition that had fallen out back in. The Glandelinian captain being utterly without means of escape unless he wanted to commit suicide by fighting his way through the trap had not been put under the custody to which the cavalry and the drivers had been subjected. He stood stiffly by the side of his boy scout captor Penrod awaiting the disposition that the latter might choose to make of him.

Penrod sought to question the Glandelinian capt, but found his prisoner inclined to reply even in a few words. Penrod however when he wished to be very courteous to prisoners, which usually is the only way to get one to even speak, for roughness, persistence in fury, and so forth only makes the Glandelinian more sullen and surly, and wicked as they are they're just as brave and as determined as their righteous brothers of the other side. Penrod's courteousness soon had its effect, and the Glandelinian captain became more communicative but he refused to tell whom the ammunition was, or where he had been going. After answering a number of questions which were of no importance, the Glandelinian captain began to question Penrod.

"To what Christian dog army have I been compelled to surrender?" He demanded.

"To a child scout Regiment called the "Hangers," replied Penrod.

The prisoner looked at Penrod with a bewildered look in his eyes.

"You mean plain advanced head scouts," he suggested by way of correction.

"I said Boy and I girls' scout advanced hangers," said Penrod more positively.

The puzzled look in the officer's face deepened.

"That is impossible that you belong to the Regiment under the Vivian Girl demons," he exclaimed. "There is no girl or boy scout ranger regiment in this region because the Vivian Girl guttersnipes are prisoners in various parts, and one of them are with Augustina St. Claire."

Despite himself Penrod, had to turn his head aside to hide a smile which he found impossible to suppress.

"Just listen to him" exclaimed Jean to Francis who stood beside her both who were within hearing distance.

"Didn't I tell you the Glandelinian booms would believe anything their lying generals told them?" replied Mildred.

"My but this is the best ever," chorled Joy St. Claire.

"I wouldn't believe it under any conditions if I hadn't heard it," chuckled Gladys Wentworth in a tone too subdued for Penrod to overhear.

"I assure you positively" said Penrod "that there is more than this here of the Regiment of boy and girls' scout rangers under the Vivian Girls despite your doubting be. I can even bring proof that the Vivian Girls are here by bringing you before them, why should it seem so strange sir?"

"But you couldn't positively have gotten this far in such dangerous territory when you have to cross dangerously flooded, regions, go through forest fires, and too meet with our patrols," persisted the prisoner.

"And why not?" asked Penrod.

"Because your many patrols would have stopped you," was the reply.

"No use" murmured Gladys to Joy. "He's top floor is empty. Nobody home."

"Padded call number six hundred and forty four," whispered Joy.

However Penrod found it was of no use to argue against such credulity, and the boy scout general gave it up, though he forced his handkerchief into his mouth to keep from laughing right out.

The prisoners were marched back to camp, while the drivers under the strictest guard were forced to drive the wagon train into the rear of the Christian lines, while the rest of the force of boy and girls' scouts remained in the woods to watch the developments... 2.2.2

The capture of the wagon train and five hundred well prisoners besides half again as many wounded and so many horses, created a great sensation and was the main topic for many a day afterwards...

"It's been our best adventurous day ever," remarked Violet Dale "that afternoon as she prepared to lead the wagon train through."

"You bet it has indeed," agreed Mammie. "We bagged a train of thirty seven wagons, and many prisoners, and shot down the most reckless ones..."

Two or three minutes after all this had been accomplished a stir of expectation ran throughout the whole entire camp of the childscouts. They could see that evidently some important move was in prospect among the christian lines, for the enemy had gone back and the firing was now only at long range. What it was the rank and file did not know but rumors and conjectures ran riot.

"There's something big coming for the armies and I'm going to get as near as possible and see it," said Frank, as he watched the whopper of an explosion far distant tear everything into the air like a volcanic scene.

"That's plain enough," agreed Penrod, "but I'd give a lot to know just what is going to be."

"Gertrude herself gave me a private tip," replied James. "She didn't go very far into it but what she must have hinted puts me in mind that general Hanson or Evans Evans is going to hurl a general and final effort against the foe."

"And none of us under any condition are to move from these woods, and those with the prisoners soon will return."

"What?" they cried in chorus.

"That's what," returned Dean, "but of course it may be a false alarm. Gertrude herself wasn't any too sure."

It was not long before the others returned and just as they did, the bugles within the armies blew. It was the command for the largest portion of the armies to fall in. And sudden as it was, the boys and girls could see that the men had a high state of discipline for there was no confusion. They were all veteran soldiers, and fell into line by their many various companies, and divisions and so forth, and all the troops within easy sight of the watchers waited for the order.

"Forward March."

The order however was not long in coming, though the men did appear as impatient as the child scouts, and as quietly as ghosts, with no band to lead them, the various commands swung into step and started off.

"They're on their way to the various positions deserted by the enemy, and from which they're to prepare instantly for the assault," whispered Francis to Bartle, who watched the long waves of troops marching swiftly on his right side of the view. "Well, off to the deserted trenches, I suppose first to wait for more reserves and the covering artillery fire." He continued.

"Yes that is so," agreed James. "Well I'm glad it is all over. Now they'll have a chance to show what kind of soldiers they are. If they do not carry the enemy's works before night fall then it's no use to continue the battle on our side."

For three whole hours the troops continued going forth without a halt, and there seemed to be no end to the numbers. The air was somewhat clear of smoke in that locality the ground was dry and springy, and the going good. The clearing of the air too revealed signs of the battle. The clearing air revealed bits of wood land where every leaf and twig had been stripped from the trees by shell fire and bullets leaving only the scorched and ghastly trunks. They could see immense platoons of the enemy retreating while still firing through villages, or what had once been small villages but were now only heaps of crumbling stone with here and there a shaky wall left standing, and the ruins smoking. The soldiers too who were retreating had to watch their footing more and more to avoid falling into craters where the ground had been torn up by shells and bombs. There was no beauty in that part of fertile part of California that had once been like a "Garden of Heaven. The horrors of such a long battle had breathed its blighting breath upon it, blighting and blasting every living thing, except the dauntless dauntless soldiers who were fighting the enemy desperately and would fight to the grasp in defense of the cause.

At last the christian troops moving forward reached a long line of sentinels by whom they were greeted not with challenges, but with exclamations of delight and welcome. Then as the troops pressed a little further on to they came to the breastworks that stretched in every direction like a long worm. They had reached the works which had been abandoned by the enemy after its capture by them the morning before, but the advancing troops did not stop there for they continued onward over them and past another line of trenches.

"See they must be going on ahead after all without stopping," whispered "George."

"That is what," answered Francis. "The assault I believe is on."

Just on the opposite side of the works however the whole troop suddenly halted at the signals of their commanders. Then it stood at attention and presented arms while from out the trenches before them came an endless line of men who held that position for the cause, and now were to make a junction with the reinforcing body who were to move forward soon and storm the enemy position, however there was a very strong impulse to cheer both from the armies of troops, and the boy and girlscouts, but that might have betrayed to the enemy the child scout position and this for good and strategic reasons it was desirable to avoid. There might come an assault of overwhelming numbers and disaster to the Regiment of child troops might result. Soon the last of the moving troops were lost beyond the reach of sight. All of them with the greatest caution had been marched into the various trenches and so perfectly had the movements been planned and had been so carefully mapped out in advance, that the exact location were well known and so that within an hour the entire force within sight was in position at the ready. Looking at his wrist watch Penrod himself saw it was exactly five thirty now. Indeed curiosity was running riot, for at last the christian line was preparing to make another good and daring assault, that magic word that the troops had heard again and again during the last two years of fierce war, and the boy and girlscouts were with their glasses studying every detail of even their own surroundings with the keenest interest and zest. The thought of what might happen if from an unexpected direction the enemy was to hurl an overwhelming assault upon these woods with the purpose to flank the christian army was sobering, and during this time there was no gaiety and jesting that had marked their lives during the earlier part of the day.

"Well Jean old scout, if the enemy should come here unexpectably we'd be in for it," said Mildred, as she placed her hand on her friend's shoulder.

"And we'd be in for it fair too," responded Jean.

"We would be up against the real hell," added one of the boys. "We had often a little taste of it elsewhere, but this is a different different proposition. But I do not think the enemy plans any such desperate move."

"The proposition I would make would be to retreat to the shelter of the troops" said Bartle.

"Just then a shell came screaming overhead like a tornado and they all involuntarily ducked.

"That seems to prove what danger we could be in," said Tom O Neill.

"That was very bad shooting though," remarked Francis, coolly. "but maybe that was a random shot, for all Glandolinians are good as pie with their guns."

"There isn't much of that sort of thing going on now," remarked Penrod who came up to them. "All is more quiet now, this is what they call a lull in the battle. But I know we're all used to the sight and sound of shells. This is a deaf and dumb asylum to what we'd get if the foe was going to do as you spoke of."

"Jobs comforter," murmured Jean. "To hear the general talk you'd think this was a rest cure for all of us."

In the hours of liberty allowed them the boy and girlscouts explored the woods for a long distance in every direction to see what they could make of it in case they statements statements for an enemy attack could come true, and what they saw tended to upset a good many of the notions they had formed. In a vague way indeed they had figured the woods to be merely a sort of park but they found it to extend to the west in an endless distance and thicker and thicker. There was a bewildering density of trees as impenetrable as a labyrinth, but there were also open large in the forests like spacious rooms and apparently an endless series of communicative roads and paths, and there were also telephone wires and poles.

"These woods would make a good ambush," remarked Tom as he noted the vast extent of these woods.

"It's the biggest woods," said Bill. "The only difference is that they not all pine and they contain a lot of live kids."

"Knock wood," counseled James. "We wouldn't be very long if the enemy was to surprise us here."

The boy and girlscouts looked carefully at the trenches and saw that the main breastworks along side the main and front line trench de bono a facing the enemy lines was guarded by a long line of machine guns which had not been there before, and on which a long line of sentry soldiers were standing on the watch. There was also a long line of cunningly contrived loopholes which enable the sentries to look over at the enemy breastworks and other positions without them, selves being seen. Rows upon rows of huge and small sandbags were piled on top of the first line works in numbers and height sufficient to stop the flight of the bullet storm or even the impact of a shell and its forceful explosion. The silent men standing on watch as far as they could be seen were gripping their rifles, and peering per peering through the loopholes, and seemed to be like so many dummies for they stood as still. Francis and James peered cautiously, in that direction to see what the enemy was going to do. However they could see absolutely nothing, and nothing now like objects moving broke the wide monotonous expanse of shell and battle a torn earth, except wreaths of smoke and puffs and shells bursts...2.2.2

The boy and girlscouts were getting a sort of uneasy feeling, as though they were the only living creatures who had been condemned to perdition body and soul without having, died...

"It took me as though all the Glandolinian fools had deserted their own positions and gone back home, and that the smoke only was from a fissure in theolith," remarked the Irish lad in an undertone.

"Does it?" said Jean grimly. "Give me your cap."

He took the cap that the boy handed to him and lifted it high above the ground while lying down, but so high that the farthest Glandolinian sniper could see it. He had lifted it on a long branch. Instead of a bullet that was expected there came a shrill shell missing the cap and striking by a hair, and exploding with terrific force in the rear and splintering a wagon standing near the back.

"I'll take back what O' said" said the boy as he resumed his cap. "Those crazy gray coated spalpeens are on the 'jerry on the job."

A few minutes passed, by with only a little firing closer at hand, and yet before Evans wished to launch the main attack there was something which he wished to learn, and Violet herself rode up, and called Penrod apart.

"Penrod," she said, "Evans needs some assistance and I have ordered a corporal to take a squad of men on this early morning to go and find out who commands the Glandolinian army in person, but either of them they took cold feet and gave it up or they haven't returned. We're to hold a short council with Evans. So I want you, the Irish lad, two other boys, and Gertrude, and Angelina, please to go with me to the council. We'll decide what to do."

"Good," said Penrod, promptly. "We'll be ready. When do you want us."

"Right away."

Penrod sought out those who were to come with him and eagerly imparted the information.

"ully," cried the Irish boy who got the news from Jean who could interpret for Penrod could only speak Abbeannian and French.

"Best news I've heard since Hector was a pup," shouted Gertrude.

"Here's hoping we'll slip one over the Glandolinian army, and get in on the Abbeann mystery," chuckled Angelina Riches... gleefully.

They did not take long at all to reach general Evans's headquarters even though it was quite some distance away.

As soon as they were all there, Violet, herself shut and looked the door, pulled down the shades, and then making positively sure that not a soul except she, her sisters, Evans, and the chosen scouts were in the room, took out from her waist a fold of large papers and looking them over carefully said with a slight smile partly of exultation:

"Here's a bunch of cables from Angelina Agatha, and Dorothy Gale, and Glinda cities--nothing much in them except about the disastrous progress of the flood continuing down there. Here's a note sent to me by Walter Starring mentioning one of our general officers by the name of Frederick Parson. I don't know him yet but just the same all our officials say he's a reliable man and--and--"

"FREDERICK PARSON. Great Scott," shouted Evans. "He's just the general, loyal, capable and he knows the lay of the land, the way of the enemy, and how to storm a position in the face of the greatest odds."

Violet then went to Penrod and said:

"Send our message in code to general Fredrick Parson on the right,--tell him the whole story, tell him to come here in a jiffy--and we'll put him in full charge give him unlimited credit to carry the enterprise through--have him use up all he can on artillery resources. We'll have him smash that Glandolinian army under that mysterious general out of business so we'll have no Glandolinian army here to interfere with our plans. He'll know how, hurry Penrod. We depend on you too."

General Frederick Parson was watching all the developments of the battle with his staff officers and wondered what it was going to bring forth. He had never experienced a conflict yet with an enemy so unbelievably stubborn.

"Another dreadful disaster threatening," he said. "You generals must take every thing coolly. We have so far a sound army, and plenty of artillery. Why the enemy never attacked me is a wonder. Of course I ought to be satisfied, but maybe we can't take too many chances. Wish something would come along that I could try and tackle--but I'm supposed to be on the defensive--huh I think it is foolish." "Look some body is riding toward here like crazy," said one of his generals. "Must be a mad man."

The one mentioned was riding so furiously forward that it appeared he might have literally gone rode the general down.

"Here you confounded runaway, hear off," shouted the general. "If you collide with me I'll put you in the guard house for a month. You ought to be fined for speeding through camp like that. Watch where you going."

"The man halted breathless at this and gasped

"I have an urgent message for you."

"From whom?"

"From Violet Angelina Vivian!"

"Wait from the Vivian Princess. Well quit acting foolish and let's have it. This is a critical time with such an insanely wild battle. Out with it don't delay."

"Princess Violet wants you to ride to your headquarters and talk to her by wireless telephone. She will explain everything in detail general. She says there isn't a moment to lose sir."

"I'm with you then," said the general. "Violet, and her sisters are always the ones to move and act fast in any crisis. Have you any idea what it is all about?"

"Yes your Excellency. But she wants you to come there and she'll explain as I can't say anything--but I can tell you in your ear." He bent close to the general's ear and whispered:

"She wants you to establish a strong assaulting column with the support of Evans and by an overwhelming battle storm against the foe to try and put the enemy out of business. You have a strong army and Evans through their suggestion wants you to take full charge."

"Aye--It'll be a fight sure--but I know the lay of the land, the enemy and his ways. I always wondered how it would feel to lead a charge with a great big support at my back. Here's the wireless telephone call son."

"In your headquarters sir."

The general went and answered it, and then with his fastest horse rode madly till he had reached Evans headquarters.

Just as general Fredrick Parson came in another officer handed Evans a message. Evans looked it over and then cried out:

"Great Scott Princesses. How did the Glandolinian army general ever know I have big reserve forces near Santa Cruz. It is the one enterprise I was counting on to carry me through this gigantic battle. Why in the world did general Vivian have to get wounded at a time like this, and Walter Starring, and Warbucks too. Now this message from a signal station operated by the Signal Corps of boy scouts says that a part of my army is in danger of being tied up with 'Battle instructions' my best generals lying wounded, general Vivian down, our losses terrific in men and provisions, and a Glandolinian force one million strong heading for Turner woods to strike me a flank blow. Who in the world is this Captain General Stanfords. Must be acting for some Glandolinian general in chief. Princesses they're 'killing our arm' he continued turning to them. "Who is Captain General Stanfords...! He's missing millions and millions to break us and smash through us--who in the world among these chief Jackasses we know nothing about does he represent!"

"None of us know anything about him," said Jennie Vivian. "But I tell you we must stop at nothing. But as you demand, who is the brains of this outfit we are up against. It's not Hanley as he's out badly wounded. We must find the new head of the Glandolinian army and crush it."

One of the officers stood up.

"What have you to say?" asked Violet.

"Well Princesses, our investigators say it is this general called 'Break in the Neck'--all the instructions and advices comes from him. You know I told you he was smarter than you or your sisters said. I knew from the first that he was dangerous--"

"Well we'll meet him generally," retorted Jennie.

"Break in the neck," muttered Evans to himself now seated at the table, but speaking loud enough to be heard. "That Glandolinian rat. Bah he never has had an army or a division of troops big enough, nor brains enough to run us out of a position or a network. He's fronting for nobody and I think I know who is behind him. YES. And I know what to do about it too--This is no time to be nice and dainty, and hand cream puff slaps with lolly a pope--It's general RAYMOND RICHARDSON FEDERAL OR ME, AND IT WON'T BE ME."

In the meantime two Glandolinian spies had been sent by the enemy to try and pry into the intentions of Evans. They were in disguise as two traveling men and were close to Evans's headquarters.

"You," said one of them, "that's general Evans headquarters all right, and where we are to learn the details. Looks like an old rickety farm house but they say it's fixed up good in the inside. It ought to be easy to break or get inside."

"You--is that so. But Evans is a devil in human shape and it don't pay to take any unnecessary chances. You know those easy looking places if often the toughest to get into. General Evans too is no sap and in all the christian armies

"There is no man more dangerous in the whole wide world than him." They worked their way to another prison of the building and tried to get a peek in the window. They saw the shade was drawn, and though they heard voices which sounded like that from Evans they could not make out what was said. Three times they had to hide behind bushes to avoid being seen by the sentries.

"Wonder what it is all about any way!" asked the first man as he looked down the road to see if the coast was clear. "General Break in The Neck paid us five thousand and said there'd be ten thousand more if we got all the papers. He must want them papers pretty bad, something about the battle I suppose. We must be losing."

"Yeah," he said to not worry at all if we had to shoot any christian dog we met who interfered with us. I got the idea he wants us to secure those papers even if we have to shoot general Evans."

After looking around to see that no one saw them, they crept to the back way and reached an easy looking doorway opening up which a flight of stoop steps led. They first waited for some body to come out but as there was no one they got in patient.

"How about going in?" demanded his helper.

"Sh-h-h-h. This is the back way into the place. It looks easy but maybe it is a trap. Come on. Let's get away from here and where we can talk the matter over."

In a few minutes they were under a small but high culvert.

"It's a cinch," said the leader. Half an hour later in we go, and whatever there is to be done we'll do it. Then back to general Cleveland and collect that $10,000. This is easy."

The other one said "Yeah, and if we run into any christian officer in that place we'll let them have it like the general said. That way we'll avoid pursuit, and there'll be nobody talking afterwards."

A little later the spies had sneaked in by the back way, and having a duplicate key placed in the door one said:

"Now if we run into any sort of christian dog officer or private, scout or civilian girl no matter who they are it'll be just to bad for them."

"You sure don't think I'm yellow you don't think I hope. For fifteen thousand I'd shoot down my own brother if he was on this side of the war. Come on, the door is open, here we go."

And he cautiously swung the door open.

Both then stepped in with pistols drawn. They saw the whole party at the council and also Angelina Gronburg sitting sideways to them with her hand on one table and Evans with his back to them in a listening attitude to what she was saying.

It couldn't hardly be said why but the two had marooned it out of the place as fast as their legs could carry them and were racing madly to get to where they had left their horses.

"See Wilkerson, did you see who she was, and know who she is. Don't you! If she saw us we ain't got a chance. Hurry to our horses."

"Sure I know that girl officer—that's Angelina Gronburg, whose sister is disguised as a boy and called 'The Rattlesnake' I don't think she saw us, but no body can ever tell about that girl scout, she's too dangerous for my meeting. Let's get going, gosh why did we leave those horses so far. Seems like a million miles to nowhere."

"Halt, Halt! why your running for. Halt I say," cried a voice.

A soldier was riding toward them but one of them whipped out his pistol and fired bringing the soldier down wounded. Two more came and opened fire in return and then more and more but the men got to their horses and leaped on. Then as a score of pursues came racing forward, the men swung and opened fire bringing six down, and then urged their horses on full speed and was safely before beyond reach before the hue and cry aroused the whole camp.

"That guy general Break in the neck never told us that 'Gertrude Angelina' girl was mixed up in this affair of the christian army," he said as the two raced on, hotly pursued now by cavalry. "Gee we might have got murdered."

"I'd like to fix that general, Break in the neck for getting us into this trouble, but we ain't got time for it now. I won't feel easy till we're a thousand miles from this camp." And he looked back to see to his dismay a hundred cavalry were racing toward him and his companion.

"We be we ought to have taken a shot at that Gertrude Angelina. We had the drop on her. General Break in the neck said he's take care of us no matter what."

"Yeah, I heard about many that thought they had the drop on Gertrude Angelina, and she dropped them. That girl is worst than her sister see."

"The more I think of it John the more sure I am that Break in the neck was trying to get us into a jam. Don't you think he know all the time that dangerous girls spy was there."

"Aw if you wish to know that, go back and ask him. As for me," cried the spy I'm sleeping right on as long as this horse can run. A thousand miles ain't nothing, if that girl Gertrude did spot us. For she'd sent after us so hot haste we'd never escape. We're in a pinch."

In the meantime James had suddenly noticed that the door was open. So the spy surprised of Evans and the rest he was out in a moment but quickly returned.

"Look everybody!" he cried. Look Princeness. Two pistols in the back hall, and the door wide open. Somebody must have been spying on us or came to rob us of our plans. But not a thing has been touched. Looks like who ever it was threw away their guns and ran out fast. Wonder who scared them."

"Hm-m-m-m" remember I did hear a slight noise," said Evans "but I did not think much of it at the time. They could have shot me or any of you, easy as not—I'm surprised they'd didn't. A Glandelinian general probably Break-in-the-neck must have sent them. Now I suppose the enemy knows who's incoo command. Still if those spies failed they'd hardly go back to the camp. I wonder."

"I tell you it must be general Federal," said Fredrick Parson. "Men sent to even spy on him are never heard of again. Even the agents we have recently sent over to find out what the general was have vanished—swam or disappeared without a trace—if they haven't run into Federal they'd have reported back here to us before this. We still can do something other wise if we delay we'll be ruined, RUINED."

"Well," said Evans grimly "I'll get general Evans for this if it is the last thing I ever do. You General Parson direct the assault. I'll place the full responsibility upon you."

"Very well sir," and he departed.

In the meantime from a wireless signal the others of the boyscout leaders, had relieved word, that a great Glandelinian column might start to move toward the direction of the wood, with the purpose to take the assaulting christian lines in the flank and rear. It was a smoky sombre late afternoon upon which a large strongly armed reconnoitering party (hearty tarty) including many girls besides the boys, led by George was sent out with orders to get as close as possible to the enemy's lines and learn all they could regarding their intentions, and where the rumored attack was going to strike, and whether it would really happen or not. This also concluded information in regard to the general direction of the advancing flanking columns, what Glandelinians they might, the extent and length of the assaulting columns if they were forwarded and if possible the main force with which the assault was to be conducted and what leader might bring on the storm. If there was danger the rest of the child scout force could best determine what was to be done, to hold the woods, themselves or recoil to the main defense of the christian armies. Of course for men soldiers this order would have involved not exactly taking long and hazardous chances but suicidal ones, but the boy and girl scouts sent out could do it much safer, they had put on uniforms the same color of the ground and grass and were also smaller than men soldiers, quicker, and more self collected, and it was not only a part of the afternoon's work to them, but the excitement of such an expedition was in truth something of a great relief from the growing monotony of such refugee life, going from one part of the camp to the other all the time...

They left the woods with the least possible sound and crept cautiously forward toward the direction of the enemy defenses from which the flank attack might have been planned, planned... The afternoon was heavy, hot and more darker than usual, and smoky and an excellent one for their project. The soft dry earth dead and deadened their footsteps, and therefore they were like a large company of spirits in childish forms as they slipped forward without without hardly a sound breaking the a full stillness except the distant roar of battle that caused the ground to quiver and quake beneath their feet. The smoke mist from battle and forest fires enveloped them thickly, and with an east wind rising began to grow denser every minute but not thick enough to cause any discomfort by breathing it but yet before they had gone more than half a mile they had the greatest time of it trying to keep from becoming separated. Inf indeed for these young boy and girls scouts it was quite an uncanny experience, and every one were excited and yet eager to show themselves worthy of having been chosen for the work.

George had proceed on for a shorter distance and was about to go on faster when suddenly he thought he heard a subdued sound somewhere to his left and instinctively stopped a full minute to try and hear it more distinctly. In that minute his comrades whom he had been leading, and who apparently did not hear a sound, of if they had did not pay any attention were swallowed up in the smoke fog. Then George's first impulse was to hasten after them, and started to do so but he had only taken one step forward when he halted again, for again he heard the same sound. He was tempted to call or signal to his comrades but then he suddenly checked himself, for he did not dare to utter a slight sound for he knew that such a sound or even an outcry or a signal as if from a bird, or dog or cat would probably betray them all in case they were very near the Glandelinian positions. Then he thought suddenly to return to his own camp in the wood, but again as he heard the sound he was very reluctant to go back, for he knew from the langga language spoken and the curse and obscene words used from that direction were Glandelinians speaking to one another or quarrelling whatever it may be, and that made him very unwilling to go back without investigating the matter farther. Besides here for the first time in his young life was the beginning of an adventure after his own heart, an adventure he never thought he would even dare think of undertaking, and he therefore thought with a quickening pulse beat of the heart of the satisfaction that would be his, and the disaster he could avert to the christian rear if he could without any one else's aid, gather valuable information and take it back to the first boy scout or leader he encountered. This reflection made him decide and slowly and with infinite caution he stole in the direction from which the sounds seemed to come.

He had gone only twenty yards when he found out he was not mistaken. Through the mist of smoke he heard distinctly the sound of voices not so subdued this time. They were not quarrelling even though they cursed so frequently, but he knew something important was in the conversation, and he thanked God he was not able to understand the langga language which was somewhat the same as the Abbeinnians. Still further he crept as quietly and as stealthily as a jungle cat, and he finally caught the voices more closer and knew they were the Glandelinians.

"I must be mighty near their works by this time," he thought excitedly. "If I can only get closer to them I ought to be able to hear something. This part of the enemy line is not in action or maybe it is newly arrived. Here goes for a try at it anyway. I know we were not supposed to go so near, but it won't be doing wrong, for we did not receive any orders not to do so."

He dropped to his hands and knees, and after first saying "Oh Mary Conceived without gin, pray for us who have recourse to thee" ten times, started working his way along, one hand outstretched feeling for a bobbed wire fence which he knew must be close for he had seen one before the smoke settled down. Sure enough the boy scout had not gone far not even five feet, when his hand came in contact with the wire. Other times he could have leaped one safely no matter if it was ten feet high, for he knew how to do it without even catching one point in his cloth, but to do so now might make noise and arouse the fog, and therefore he dropped flat on the ground and carefully drew his wire cutters which he always carried with him, from his belt. Cautiously he nipped a section out of the thickest strands and crawled beneath, wondering what the farmer might think when he sees the wire cut. He knew that he would soon be closer to the enemy and he was not mistaken for he could hear the murmur of voices more closer, and above these came every once in a while a sharp word of command and the click of gun mechanisms being inspected together with other sounds indicating a state of bustle and preparation.

George knew the men by these sounds were not in any trenches but were standing in the fields in huge columns, the boy lying prone on the dusty ground with every danger of the winds blowing dust into his eyes, and danger too of making him sneeze these sounds conveyed a very definite and significant message.

"I'll bet they are the flanking party as sure as I'm living," he thought. "I'll bet they're preparing for the attack on Evans' rear. They're as busy as bees."

"He lay quiet a minute or so longer until the sounds of preparations increased to such an extent that he felt sure the Glandelinians would soon be on the move. Then came the command:

"Shoulder arms."

"About time for me to hunt over," the boy thought with a grin that even his dangerous position could not repress. "The sooner I get out of here and warn my friend and the army, the better it will be."

Then with this thought in his mind he turned cautiously about and started back when suddenly he saw something that made his heart seem to stop beating. He could not tell how the Glandelinians must have done it, for it was only the field bobbed wire fences belonging to the farmer that once owned the farm, but all the wire must be suddenly electrified for George saw that from the wire that lay before him there was escaping long sparks that leaped and hissed with a subdued crackling, sound like the snapping of a wood fire. He felt sure that the Glandelinians had put electricity into the wire fences probably through some mysterious means had put electricity into the wire fences probably with the purpose of trapping any party of christians who may have come forth to do any scouting in that direction. George indeed was in a terrible position, and it was impossible for him to find the spot through which he had entered in such a long stretch of wire, and he felt sure that with the heavy current in the wires it would be certain death if he even but touched them with his clippers. But he suddenly thought of a way. He had rubber tap in his pocket and this he would about the handles and a part of the head but keeping the cutting part clear. He knew he must be quick for probably on the other hand the enemy would shut off the current only a half minute before the flanking force was to make the advance. He therefore crawled quietly forward, and tried the clipping process though he muttered a prayer with all his heart "Oh god help me in this trial." The work was successful he succeeded in cutting the wire through. He got through but heard sounds that made him halt. From some unseen point troops were marching by and he found now his only chance lay at was to be in lying still and waiting for the sound of footsteps to cease. Another thought struck him which was making him shiver with the thought of it. The fog was getting rapidly thinner. Therefore he resolved to make a dash for it the second the sound of footsteps died away.

As he lay there, he suddenly caught the sound of measured steps approaching toward him.

"I'm a sentry or a guard," flashed through his mind... His hand flew to the small sabre at his side, and he prepared to strike quick and hard... put suddenly another thought came to him. There must be a way through the danger zone that this guard could show him. If he could capture the sentry he might be able to make him guide him through. It was taking a grave chance—and a most desperate chance indeed, for Glandelinians were as stubborn as mules. They usually would not do anything to even save their own lives, and too the sentry might be dangerously alert and resourceful as Glandelinian sentries are, and his love for country and his wicked cause, and the same training would probably cause him to give the alarm at the expense of his personal safety. Oh if the Glandelinian sentry would only be slow too act and think. Or would he be more of a self reliant and be quick to yield to intelligence and the police that was his. He thought the best way was to strike. He suddenly shifted his hand to his revolver and drew it forth. He knew it would be absolutely fatal to risk a shot, but he therefore grasped the barrel of the weapon, and waited. The heavy footsteps soon came closer and then was abreast of him, and the boy leaped to his feet and brought the butt down with stunning force on the head of the dim stolid figure that loomed through the smoke mist... The man who was an officer after all dropped without uttering a cry, but George listened carefully and anxiously to find out the sound of the man's fall had reached the Glandelinian troops beyond, apparently it had not, and hopeful of this the young German boy turned his attention to the inert figure at his feet. Presently the Glandelinian officer stirred, and then in a dazed fashion, started to struggle to his feet. Then George pressed the muzzle against the Glandelinian officer's neck as quick as a flash, speaking a language that all Glandelinians understood. The officer stood quite still and George felt that the man untrusting by the sudden and unexpected attack would not risk death by giving an alarm. He however was at a loss to convey a command to a Glandelinian however, for he did not know what to say to make the officer lead him through the danger zone. He knew little if any of the Glandelinian language or Abbeinnian yet, not as much as he needed to. But it occurred to him he could speak in some words which would aid him nevertheless.

"Show me the way out of this zone sir," he commanded speaking very slowly. "Do you understand?"

"Yes, yes, yes," mumbled the Glandelinian officer. "I will show you lead, only please don't shoot, come this way. Follow me."

"I'll follow you all right sir, and mighty close too believe me," the boy assured him, "and my name is not Keed. One move from you that is false and you'll be cooking hash for Satan."

The Glandelinian officer made no reply but crawled sullenly through the dusty road, George following with the muzzle of the gun pressing the man's side. Soon the Glandelinian paused at what appeared to be a sort of clump of brush and the smoke fog began to disperse so much that the boy could see the direction to the woods, and that he was too far off from the fire-lines to even be shot if he was seen.

"Forward march Mr Gatt," commanded the little brave German. "We will now make a fine visit to those 'Christians' you call dogs, and whom you and your followers are so fond of insulting all the time. I know they'll be glad to see you. They'll prepare a meal of dogs for you."

"Listen kid you are a German, what you do in christian ranks—?"

"Never you mind. None of your business, and none of your lip. Forward march I say. What I am and what I do is my affair."

The Glandelinian officer only hunched his shoulders, pointed and went on doggedly. In a little while they were near the woods, and after answering the challenge of a sentry they entered the woods, and were among their own regiment. George was met with a wild rush by Jane Malfort police, and others, who had been almost crazy with anxiety because of his failure to return with the others.

"Why where in the whole wide world have you been, no lo! long George!" shouted Dolores, "and where did you get the Batt officer?" "I'll tell you all when I get back girls," promised George. "Take care of this Batt. I've got to report right away. Warn all the others to be in position and on the alert, and have our Abyssinkilian escort in position in front and rear of us. I think the Glandelinians are going to attack the troops under Evans on the rear and a portion of the flanking attack column will come toward our woods, and I'm determined not to retreat. Sent a warning to Gertrude and Evans." He hurried hurried away to the main Abyssinkilian commander, told him what was going to occur and told him to prepare accordingly.

"You've done mighty good for a little German lad, very well indeed," spoke general Bruno. "I'm glad to hear this, and if the enemy comes this way he'll expect I suppose to find these woods clear. Well, we'll be ready for them and our own surprise will put a link on their flank attack. Where shall we post the men?" "Any place you choose sir. Gertrude will know directly. I've sent the warning to her and general Evans."

George then saluted and hastened back, and told Dolores all he had overheard. Orders were issued by all the various child scout commanders, and then every Abyssinkilian soldier was at his post strong to the highest pitch of excitement and expectancy. They were very strong in a numbers whole divisions of them in scores. The battle had recommenced along Evans front in the meanwhile and the assault had been launched with might and main upon the enemy position. But whatever its result was going to be or being just now, none of the child scouts knew or paid any attention. They were straining their eyes through the lifting smoke fog for a while to see whether the flankers were coming, but yet could not see anything. There's was not a sound to the rear, neither a crunching of a twig by a footstep, was not a sound to the rear, neither a crunching of a twig by a footstep.

"This is unusual," said Dolores, "consider if they're coming this way." Just as she spoke, a rabbit ran past her as if scared away by something. Then came even a wolf, then a deer. Then suddenly she saw row after row in endless length of men moving forward toward the woods with deliberation and a menacing weight that might have well struck terror to hearts less stout than those of the soldiers, or the child scouts. Their hats which were all in form like those of College Professors or graduate Students showed them to be the dreaded Glandelinians and all objects of secure, tense, ready for the word to fire, all facing the crushing foe who really did not know there was a single soul in those woods. However a thrill of impudence ran through them as the enemy came nearer.

Were they to wait there, until that green wave overwhelmed them pouring over the woods like a surging flood. The strain of waiting became unbearable, but their commanders knew best, the closer they were the more effective would be the fire.

Dolores gave a cat call. The signal was heard by the general and he signalled a command, the command was heard by all the other officers, and suddenly to the surprise of the Glandelinians there was a terrific crash from the woods as if all the trees were falling down and all became shrouded in smoke. The Glandelinians fell in a whole line. In vain they tried to push on, the fire was too terrific for them. They strove to rush on, in columns, in lines, and in waves but were moved down in those waves or columns as fast as they rushed within range. The Abyssinkilian general shouted a command, and forward rushed the Abyssinkilian soldiers like headlong flocks freed from the leash. But just as their leader was exposed he fell headlong stricken with a bullet. The Glandelinians opened a withering fire, and it was the turn for the Abyssinkilian soldiers to fall in frightful numbers, and for a moment the men hesitated, and waited, being uncertain, hardly knowing what to do. Though he was only a boy George surprised every one by sensing the situation and acting like a lightning. It was no time to consider whether he was a boy or a man, soldier or a child, with that cry again surging on and yelling like crazy demons and filling the air in an uproar of their blasphemous defiance and derision. Above the noise and tumult his voice rang out sharp and shrill.

"Come on men!" he screamed. "Forward and at them! Make them scared of a little boy's cry on."

At the same instant he leaped forward and the whole line of troops in front of him followed. On rushed the whole entire Abyssinkilian wave now like a storm wave but looser. They fell before the enemy fire almost seemingly as the number of guns would be in a yard at once, but the surprised survivors pressed on being at devil fighting pitch themselves. All the pent up fury and rage had that had been gathering since the floods and fires raged leaped to the fore. Looser and the boys of battle! They scorned death in its greatest wholesale numbers. They laughed over that. They went on like so many demons against demons yelling themselves faster and faster, rushing purring onward, in ever increasing numbers despite their losses until with tremendous and irresistible force they fell like a breaking wave upon the suddenly recoiling ranks of the enemy. It turned out to be a terrific bayonet fight with both sides contesting the ground equally as stubborn and determined, but the progress of the Abyssinkilians could not be stopped, and into that green mass forced their way, shooting, thrusting, and stabbing. Glandelinians held up their hands in token of surrender and were sent under guard to the rear. Five thousand in a short time had surrendered. Ten battle flags were captured, and six officers, and when the guns of the Abyssinkilians were empty, or they were too close to use their bayonets the Abyssinkilians grasped the weapons and swung them about their heads like flails. There was worst than a red mist before their eyes and red patches on their yellow shirts. Countless numbers of them fell, but the others kept on stabbing backward, hewing their way into the solid mass until that mass veteran soldiers as they were wavered and broke before the wild breast charge led by a mere brave German lad, slowly at first, and then more swiftly the enemy along this front retreated pursued for a short distance by the Abyssinkilians, who having tasted blood of such a wicked foe were not to be denied. They would have pushed on forward much further, but this could not be in the plans of their commanders, for the other section of the flanking line was coming on and the repulsed soldiers were being reinforced and worst of all the enemy guns, behind them from the foe positions fronting Evans had got the range and a murderous fire was creating dreadful havoc among the Abyssinkilian columns. The enemy had had a trowing that he would not never forget but he had killed, and was advancing fiercely again opening fire in such a steady manner that the noise was one continuous sound without pausing.

The recall sounded, and the Abyssinkilian soldiers turned back reluctantly gathering up their wounded comrades as they came or resting the advancing foe with all their energy. George had been separated from the soldiers in the wild chase but he secured himself behind a tree. All the Abyssinkilians recoiled back to the woods, and to their various defenses. All the rest of that afternoon, the enemy stormed the woods, as wildly as it was in their power, sixty thousand Glandelinians were killed, and a score thousand times a hundred thousand wounded within a short space of an hour by the murderous annihilating fire poured from those woods, and to make a short story out of it reinforcement sent by Evans added to the horror. General Tom Watson of the Abyssinkilian was killed, and six of his assistants wounded. The woods in some places became ablaze from the fury of the battle, and brush and twigs were cut down everywhere by the return fire of the enemy.

Never in any battle did soldiers try more desperately and vehemently to carry those woods. The Glandelinians were brave to recklessness, regardless of death. They repeatedly went against the christian positions in waves only to be moved down in waves. Finally the Glandelinians seeing more reinforcements approaching from the christian side, and their losses appalling beyond description, finally gave it up of their own accord and recoiled to the shelter of their own position.

Nowhere else the flank attack had been a bloody crushing failure. Now that the reaction was upon the brave defenders, defenders and they felt unspeakably weary, and breathless, for nerve and brawn and lung power had been taxed to the utmost, put in their eyes showed the light of splendid victory. They had met the veteran Glandelinian flanking troops and given them a taste of Abyssinkilian missiles. It was the first battle too that had taxed so fiercely around the boy and girls and they had borne themselves as if they were steel lion hearted men and had added the terrific fire to those of the men.

During what they believed to be only a lull all the many wounded who were within the woods were now being attended to. Not one of the child scouts had suffered a scratch though hundreds of them had suffered some minor wounds and the most severely wounded of them all was Tom O'Neil. When the smoke had cleared away, and the enemy was not within sight, the boys peered cautiously over the scene of battle. They shuddered as they looked, for there were as many still forms beyond the woods, lying there, and everywhere else within sight, that they seemed as countless as the stars in the sky, and such forms had not been there before this branch of the battle had begun. What among the many Abyssinkilians had gone, oh many countless thousands of Abyssinkilians, all from that army of jolly eager, vigorous, young, or old manhood with whom their surviving comrades had been living and training for weeks and months—indeed all those whom they had come to like and respect as they killed and pleased and fought side by side. And yet not one of those dead who had gotten through that hell alive, or who had succeeded in escaping from those awful battle fields beyond where had been left so many of their bravest comrades but could have gladly given their own lives, that this Monster Glandelinian was crushed.

But every one took comfort from the fact, that despite their own dreadful losses in slain, which had been innumerable, the greater number of those still form were Glandelinians. The enemy can fire from their rear, coming from the same direction as of Evans christian army was still sending a rain of death and destruction across the intervening space, and many explosions of shells and shrapnel were occurring in the woods, but so far not harming any one. Yet it seemed though no living thing could endure on those infernal fields beyond. Bruties were occurring everywhere at once some times, appearing as if all the world was being tumbled at one time and the noise was immeasurable. Suddenly Francis's eyes seen almost as an eagle observed a movement on the part of one of the nearest apparently lifeless bodies and he gave a sudden exclamation.

"Look there, Dolores, over there!" he cried. "There's a soldier still alive. See how hard he is making the effort to get up on his elbow--and he's one of our men too. That is he must be, but he's not an Abbeinnian, nor a Glandelinian, for he's got a hunting blue uniform. He added in great excitement, as a shell burst over his head like a camp of thunder. The next instant to the surprise and dismay of all he had left his part of the position and was heading for the danger zone.

"Francis Stanok, Francis Stanok!" cried Dolores desperately clutching at him. "What in the world are you doing now? Where are you going? Are you mad? It's certain death out there." And just as she finished there was a crash as if the whole world was blown to pieces and a shower of debris fell over everybody from that far distant eruption.

"Never mind I'm going, Dolores," grunted Francis between his teeth, as he tore away from his girls' friends grasp, and ran forward. A shell exploded dangerously near him but he had thrown himself flat and the fragments flew harmlessly past and over him. An instant more and he was on his hands and knees making his way toward the stricken soldier, who was only thirty yards distant. Around the boy fragments flew from shells, and bullets rained. Rang went a shell again dangerously close, and still another. Then a distant of five hundred feet an eruption tore the earth in a great thunder head cloud. Again shot through his shoulder as though he had been stabbed by a red hot knife, but he kept on doggedly, and reached the wounded man, and tried to lift him to his feet. But then the effort was futile for the man sank back with a groan. An explosion tossed a storm of earth at them. Like a flash Francis dragged the man after him, going on his hands and knees. So fierce was the volcanic horror around him from bursting shells that the lad thought it was a million years before he reached the woods safely. A dozen boys and girls relieved him of his burden, and then was caught by Dolores and Jean.

What happened the next half hour or so Francis scarcely knew. The wound in his shoulder though serious was not fatal, though it bled freely, and his tremendous efforts had taxed his strength to the utmost. However his surprise was great when after he felt he could go about after his wound was dressed, he was ushered into the presence of the man he had saved.

"Why it's general Fred Perkins," he gasped.

Of course the Angelinian officer showed him he showed himself to be equally surprised.

"You are a very brave boy," he cried. "How can I ever repay you?"

"You don't have to repay me," returned Francis modestly. "I didn't want to leave you out there."

"But I shall repay you," and the Angelinian general grasped the boy by the hand very warmly. He was still very weak, and spoke with difficulty.

"I am glad I have saved you sir," remarked the boy scout.

"It's very unusual," murmured the general. "When I am well I shall tell you something more. I am your friend. I shall see to it you receive the best of honors. I have heard from La Polam and all about the Vivian Wickey horror. You may have a strong fight here to get at the mystery but I shall give you assistance."

"Then you think the enemy did it?" questioned Francis eagerly.

"I am certain of it my boy," was the colonel's low reply. "Then he had to stop taking by the doctors' orders."

"When Francis came back to the woods all the army there and the scout force hailed him as their veritable hero.

"You were there with the goods," cried Jane.

"All lion and no sheep," came from John.

"An Abbeinnian to the backbone, don't forget that," added Dolores.

Or rest indeed was the excitement throughout the whole army and through the force of boy and girls' scouts when it was known toward evening that the battle was evidently ended and had ended as a tie. Susan Carrol had not been able to come with the rest to the woods, but had seen the whole detail and feared all was lost until the Abyssinians had destroyed the flank attack. Jenny Nichols was discussing the matter, and had asked if it were not time to send for help, when she together with Ella and Ida were to send for help. In this last capacity Ella had been requested to act, but the tears quickly came to her large mournful eyes when she saw the frightful fury of the conflict in that woods, and fearing the worst for the defenders, had turned away, and wondered how the very world and skies could mock her grief.

From one point of observation to another Jenny Nichols had taken her, and finding that as long as the enemy would not desist in the attack, and nothing therefore because of that had any power enough to rouse her drooping energies, she had toward the close of that bloody afternoon of battle, brought her back to the rear of the safe portion of the Christian encampments, hoping that some lull in the battle, favorable ending or a change in the scenes and familiar faces would effect what all other things had failed to do. The sad case of Jack being laid up for so long now by wounds had cast a dark shadow across Susan's pathway though of course Jean and everybody else had felt the same. Hour after hour she had sat gazing upon the picture of Jack, who told her of the closing scene, in a letter, how he got so badly wounded, and when he would have given anything to have her there to cool the heat of his fevered brow.... Every word of love and look of tenderness was treasured up, and the belief fondly cherished, that he had always loved his girls' scout comrades thus else why in all this fearful struggle with so determined an enemy was she and the other girls' scout friends remembered.

Not even the excitement of the battles approaching final could awaken in her the least interest, and if the battles were mentioned in her presence she would weep wondering what even all of righteous Calvernia and her state had done and all her people, that it should be the unhappy, unhappiest country in the whole wide world, and Jenny Nichols remembering the past could answer but in her heart, that Our Blessed Lord knows best what is in store for the future. Calvernia some day may be a far better country for bearing up with her affliction.

Often Susan accused the recent members of the careless Government official of Calvernia of neglect and over confidence, saying if they had thought in time to do something to prevent these things the war would not progress so long. It was in vain that even Mary herself strove to convince her of most of her mistake. The enemy were too wise for any one then. Susan only shook her head, hoping that no other nation in the world would never know what it was to be as desolate, devastated and wretched as Calvernia was. Susan could have told Mary too of many weary days and sleepless nights, when there shone no star of hope in her blackened sky, and when even her parents were murdered and she her self and her aunt a fugitive from Glandelinians for a year, who were hunting her like hounds do a rabbit, but she would not from sheer pride, and wiping away her tears she went back to her tent desiring not to see any more, and to be left alone. He had no hope that her friends in those terrible woods would ever be escaping from that raving foe who was attacking the Abyssinians there.

Because of the dreadful conditions resulting from so Violet a "storm" of battle, as so extensive a scale, had Jenny Nichols, or others of the scouts who had remained in this territory generally had so much upon their hands at one time. Even when shells raved orally in their explosions dangerously close, Susan would not leave her tent, caring naught of what might happen. Two boys' scouts were continually signalling for every time they saw danger within the Christian lines. A boys' scout officer with a flaming red turban on his head, came up to the front to superintend the working of things, and was soon in the field hospital with a bad arm wound, and a shattered leg so he would never walk again. A girls' scout by the name of Ella Campbell had her upper chest torn away by a shell and lay mortally wounded in the field hospital. Mar tin Ford had brought with her a quantity of grenades of all sizes and dimensions, the uses of which she would not tell any one.

No one despite all their efforts was able to learn anything definite with regard as to how Evans' grand and final assault would turn out, or what was still transpiring in those bloody woods, and as a last resort Jean Perkins appealed to Jenny who he thought ought to know, seeing she was a general scout.

"Don't worry about those woods," laughed Jenny mischievously, as she pulled from her pocket a bit of brown and white plaid silk. "I've got the details by a telegraph and really I ought to feel sorry for the enemy who attacked there, but I ain't." It's all over there, and every one is safe, and I mean to tell Susan so she'll cheer up. Occasionally this boys' scout felt some doubt, as he heard rumors of the battle how General Brocade was wounded and his division shot to pieces. "But haven't those troops this afternoon cannot in all the world carry the enemy positions. The enemy may do anything now, though I suppose we could win out if our armies try it long enough."

Then later that evening when the "War Storm" had died down and its cloud black as it was slightly breaking Susan's heart was made glad with a card of invitation to General Kane headquarters, and with the sight of the return of all the boy and girls' scouts, and of the news that though the attack upon the enemy's position was not successful, the Glandelinian army was badly out of sorts just the same and sooner or later would have to retreat, as Federal was in no condition to renew the fourteen day and a half battles. He wondered why however, this could so suddenly turn out to be so amusing to see how Susan's delight made her carry on when all the boys and girls were returned, with only the numbers who were wounded only were slightly

Nothing so much excited her into so violent a passion as to have such things occur without knowledge.
"If we ever find out who sent these orders to Gertrude" said Violet the "The"

General Elwood's adventure had also been a successful one as he reported though his loss had been heavy, and not long after he returned from the battlefront battlefront he received from general Hanson himself a letter of recommendation for his bravery through the ordeal, among other generals who had showed splendid achievement were general Watson Parker, his son Hanson Srn Grundy, Jack Homer and Pedro, and they had held the enemy at bay through the battle every day without a break in their lines. General K Knight also had accomplished much and also received a letter of recommendation.

"What in the world are you thinking of now Francis?" Dolores asked that day early that morning after he got up when Revalle scouted, after an unusually long and sickening silence on his part as he sat outside on a log.

"Well Dolores, I was thinking of a good many things after yesterday's horrible storm of war. In the first place as there is distant much firing again, yet they say there'll be no further battle, I think I began with wondering what we should do for we do not know what the army is going to do to day, and as the situation is unusual that led to such a train of thoughts about even ourselves and our comrades and our terrible circumstances that I hardly knew where I was when you rode up and spoke to me."

Mary Stanck's brother spoke cheerfully, but Dolores keenly eyed as she was aware once that it was with a great effort that he did so. She dismounted from her horse, and stood in front of him pulling it closer. The boy was sitting near a small camp fire listening to the far away thunder of guns, and thudding of explosions.

"This is a serious question at that that we all will be compelled to do about our regiment," said she. "The situation is the same, general Hanson does not know whether Evans will renew the battle or move around toward the north of Yantura. Perrod is our leader you know and it'll be up to him or Gertrude. I am wondering myself what we shall be doing. Oh isn't that awful!"

as a heart shaking crash tore the air far above them.
"That's only a bomb. There's seems to be no opening here in the army for any cause of the battle resuming in case the enemy doing it starts it himself. The whole rear of the army camp and all the field hospitals are crowded with the wounded, and that prevents the army from making any general advance without leaving a large portion behind even if that were not all altogether beyond its means, as to a retreat that won't do, for the army will stick to this territory till Manley or Federal moves, but if something would turn out for the best we would be far happier and nearly as well paid. The fact is Dolores" and here Francis paused a little, as if to gain courage to say what he feared and here Francis paused a little, as if to gain courage to say what he feared would be very disagreeable to poor poor Dolores. "The fact is, we're all together too crowded with our disasters here, and if the army doesn't move elsewhere we'll never learn anything about the facts as to the causes of Abbe's destruction and the floods accompanying. The best thing for all of us by far, and I think the best thing for ourselves, would be to get a stronger force, detach ourselves from the army in disguise as little tramps but bums and vagabonds and try some thing something ourselves."

Dolores gave a little sigh, but said nothing, and stood looking quietly into the camp fire as Francis Stanck went on. "You see Dolores, we are just in a terrible predicament here, some one is threatening to 'Get' Gertrude, and all of us I believe are safer from the army than nearer to it. Nor is there any strong possibility of an increase of the luck we should have if we stayed close to the army and doing nothing as we had been doing. We have seen enough of little fighting, especially the way it has turned out, with our side gaining little if nothing at all. The Glandelinian army is still like a threatening cloud and its lightnings and thunders are still on. The boy officers as you say are going to hold a council this morning after breakfast, though little I care to wait, and I see no prospect of any of us getting a fair start in anything. We all had experience yesterday in those woods we do not wish to see again. We have lost too many of our comrades, poor Rose is gone, Ella too and many others, Jean and Jack are laid up for weeks, and no one to take their places, maybe Jean will never come back. If we go forth we should of course rough it certainly as long as we are doing now, but at least there is no fear of the outside as long as we're away from both armies, and we should start on some adventure then with a fair certainty of success. Still Dolores "Confound those explosions!"

I do not of course mean that any of our leaders have made up their minds upon that subject. That is only my own thoughts, and it is far too serious a matter to decide upon too hastily. I only threw out the suggestion, and if you after thinking it over, are against it, there is an end to the matter. If not I'll bring it before the council this morning and see if they agree."

Dolores was silent for a few minutes if not longer and a tear sparkled on her cheek, and then she said it!!!!!!

"I'm not at all surprised at what you say Francis. In fact I and many of us have expected it a long long time. There had been battles every day elsewhere this dreadful month of September and its only really the 17th I believe. Our country rules predicts many defeats even near Julio Gallo and there's been so many battles it seems the war is running wild. I have observed you looking over histories, geographies and other books upon different territories of this country, and have seen too that you have often sat thoughtful and quiet. I guess guessed therefore what you may have had in your mind, and that was that it seems as if Mildred's prediction had been verified. The Glandelinian victorious victories this year as been overwhelming in number and victories of our side have been few. Of course Francis as a Superior I cannot accede to your plans without the council's councils own agreement but nevertheless as a consequence of what might happen I shrink from the thought of our scout forces again leaving all the armies and going to different parts of the land, when there's no means of travel except down the floods, flooded rivers, or through burning countries beset with too many perils to be counted, but I don't think we are afraid of the hardships or discomforts for we all have stood such tests already.

But you must know this war is not a small affair, in fact from the numbers killed in all the past battles, and so forth, never before. In all the world's history was there ever such a violent and wild war and its growing worse and more severe every day and there's no let up, bloody and frightful battles being fought somewhere nearly every day now. Remember the recent horrors at Marconio, Marichanic and other places. The fighting around Vivian Wickey is becoming a Hell and they say 10,000,000 is the loss every two weeks. Think of it. Thousands hundreds of thousands of us child scouts have gone through more sorrows, perils and hardships than the solde soldiers, than even the pioneers of old, and there is no reason why we should shrink or shirk them now. I do not however think with you that it would be a good thing for us to do such a thing however but if it is a case of necessity maybe we'll have to. But we cannot do it without the consent of Violet and her sisters or the heads of the girl and boyscout movements and that is Perrod Gertrude, and chiefly our main superior Angelina Richee and Angelina Jennings, and Mary Howard. If they agree to it all right. Glad Gladys Wentworth and Joy St. Claire and Eva St. Claire are also our main superiors of the scout movements and we cannot do anything if they do not agree. So you see Francis, you may meet in your plan plenty of opposition, and perfect deliberation, but if you really determine it is the best thing to do I agree you should put it up to the coming council, but it is hard to think of just now, so please do not say anything more about it until the council begins."

Francis Stanck, who was the brother of Mary Stanck Stanck was or always had been since his entrance into the army a great boy spy, as his father too had been before he was captured and executed by the enemy. This boy however had not entered the Christian army of boyscouts at the same time his sister had, but a few months after. He first went out to visit his uncle to get his consent, and after spending some time with him, he got the permit, and the love of cause and adventure had first taken the lad to the armies in the far west which were besieging Vivian Wickey, and there he had served, spied, and scouted and done everything possible for the cause for nearly thirteen months without a misadventure or an injury. till a letter long delay, long delayed on the way, untended him to go to general Vivian's army as his services were needed there. He at once under an escort had started for general Vivian's, but could not then find his way, he found the country in a horrible condition, floods, fires and things' we do not want to write about happening, and the armies here and there not even in a condition to carry on the war business against so foul a foe. Francis then saw that in this situation he was unequal for the travel, and so sending a telegram by wireless that he couldn't come as the way was impassable had entered service under general Cranier, working hard however in all he could to make up for lost time. He proved himself to be a very good boy scout, and was shortly able to take the burden off the very general's shoulders. He had not been long however at this general's service, before in a battle mentioned in August at Marconello the general was mortally wounded and his army practically wiped out, and to gain some respite and to escape the horrible stone the boy went forth to try his luck at finding general Vivian's army alone. He then during these travels was beset by countless perils on every hand, and although the lad was no competitor in his own boyscout and military business the force of recruits who finally got around him was by no means a large one, and the increasing dangers he encountered rendered the struggle to find his way to general Vivian's daily and hourly more severe and perilous. He had been persuaded and fired on at every spot. He however had become commander of a small troop of boy scouts, but had then rashly entered into a perilous country, and though his escapade was a miracle he lost nearly half of his followers by death from wounds, and once he and his survivors were pursued for a hundred miles or more by fifteen thousand Glandolinian cavalry. Then he had finally reached general civilians, and was now long with his troop. Scouting the dangers now produced by the mighty battle at Stomoltero the lad had look forward to having the scout force move off toward what remained of Abbieann but had abstained from broaching the subject to Gertrude Angelina, or the higher superior officers until he was sure it would be safe and advisable to do so.

He decided to try and interview the girls' scout Supreme leader Eva St. Charles when she should ride into camp. If she did not agree all would have to be cast aside. Francis himself was tall for his age, and very active, and the life he had lived since his entrance into the army had hardened his muscles and given him the full use of every faculty. Marie Stanek was two years younger than her brother, and yet did look much older, though she was slightly taller. She was a high-spirited girl scout, stern, and firm well fitted to be the companion of her officer friends in the dangers and hardships of a child scout life.

The subject of this move once started in the council, was debated on, and books and maps were then being consulted, and the advantage and disadvantages of the trip through the country toward Abbieann were debated. Finally Evangeline St. Claire, one of the supreme child scouts, who about twenty nine years of age agreed that the Abbieann region offered the greatest advantage but it was best if any one wished to go there, to travel only by night and sleep in hidden spots by day as to travel by day was impossible because of such dangers in meeting with roving parties of Glandolinians who were fiercer than Arabian bandits. The decision once arrived at it was determined to announce to all the other under officers and the privates as well, who had up to this time no idea of the great change decided on. Breakfast was soon over, and after the Grace after meals was said, the boy and girls' scouts hundreds in number in the mess hall (great hall) were about to rise and march out, when Evangeline St. Claire said:

"Wait a moment please! children, there is something your little girls' scout officers, especially Angelina Riches wants to talk to you about, and wants to know whether you'll agree or not."

The children therefore resumed their seats. "222 One of our boy scout officers, who is Marie Stanek's brother" said Angelina Riches have been wondering what to do next as we have been more than idle here so close to the Christian lines, and have done nothing for what we came up here for, only except to see a big battle which turned out every way except which we wanted. We do not see any good luck starting here. Now what should you all say to us all heading for the north of Abbieann and take possession of the parts that still remain and reside there until we discover the mystery. We can make habitations there, and repair even ourselves buildings that are not badly ruined."

"What going abroad from the army?" they all exclaimed in astonishment. "That is what Francis plans. He thinks it would be safer too for us, than being with the army. You see our losses have been bad for no reason at all."

"Oh that would be a jolly experience and thrilling" many of them said. "I know" said one "we might even then have to fight Glandolinians ourselves and all that sort of thing. But nevertheless it would be glorious."

"Well Charles" Angelina Riches said smiling, "I do not know or hope to have any future fights with Glandolinians, at least Francis's decided this move to avoid such encounters in the future, and if we did have trouble with Glandolinians, scouting patrols, I don't think I would like it. This war is getting me weary. The less I see of it the better. But if we go beyond the army we should have to work rough it more than we do now you know and every one of us would have to work in all our military ways, to help me in everything necessary, and to keep on my watch, for we're in a country burning up you know, and we might run into many 'Red Plagues' of the forests..."

"What fun, indeed what fun!" shouted the boy scouts. "We should like the exciting experiences more than anything, should like it of all things in the whole wide world."

"And what do all you girls think of it?" Angelina Riches asked of all the little girls who were looking very much surprised, but rather doubtful as to the pleasure of the fights with so many Glandolinian patrols, encounters with fires, floods and on other perils, which the boys had spoken so delightedly about.

"All of you will have to be very useful girls and will have to help us as well as the boys. Very likely we'll have lots of thrills in our trips toward North Abbieann which is fifty miles northwest of here and we'll be going through forests, and we shall have to do everything to make the trip a safe one and not lose a single comrade. And that seems impossible. And I for one don't like to go away without Jean and Jack, and only Heaven knows when they'll be better. Jean is worse this morning, though Jack is better."

"The expedition will be fine Angelina" said one of the girls Mu. Mad who was rather over ten, while her sister was just eleven. "We could bring them along in our covered wagon. We could do the same as all the boys you know, and there's not one of us girls who can't cook. The expedition would be fine. We are not afraid to try it. We don't care a rap for the enemy patrols. And she finished the last words with a snap of her two fingers."

Jane who always agreed with her sister Maud (see Haw), did so now, and many many of the others became quite uproarious in their plans for making themselves useful. At last Gladys Wenthworth called for order.

"Now every one of you keep silent, and listen to me. This affair that our boy scout Francis Stanek had put up before us is a most serious affair, indeed."

"I'm afraid he's wrong, and that the situation we might meet will be worse than if we stayed closer to the army, but nevertheless we'll make the attempt, with a strong escort of cavalry, and although I hope and believe that we shall all enjoy our thrills very much, still we must prepare for it, and look upon it in earnest, and not as a sort of adventurous game. To be lost on a savage filled island would be mild in comparing with our adventures here with the enemy who know to mercy to no one. I have heard that there has been recently many extremely bloody battles, and perils are everywhere. We have business here which we cannot finish before another eight or nine hours. Therefore we must make the most of our time before we start, and have this thing also investigated and find out how clear the coast is. In the first place despite the way this battle has terminated, it is nevertheless greatly in the favor of our own armies, and the enemy being defeated is more dangerous now than ever. I'd rather fool with a victorious foe, than a defeated one. Besides we'll find out too on our way that we'll meet with not a single soul. That we get to be sure to have plenty of provisions or we'll face starvation so dreadful is the deed, and we must all learn to sacrifice ourselves more than recently if we want to endure. For the next three hours we'll work together, at the preparatory exercises, and then I will try and collect up a very powerful commissioned Abiesinkilian cavalry escort, who will accompany us on our mission for it won't do for us to venture out alone. We not on a landscape or in a country now you know, we are as living humans in a seething hell for as if to say since we never committed before. The enemy has made it a hell, and therefore our adventures are just as dangerous as if we really were in that dreadful world. In the next place it will be well that every one of you should try to dig up new recruits among the refugees. I'm sure that can be easily done, for they suspect the enemy did all this and would do anything to get in. We'll leave out the red tape this time and take them in by draft if necessary but we need recruits. We can learn the new recruits how to ride if they don't know already, and we all ourselves have learned diligently in a riding school. I went yesterday during the battle to general Gurnan and commanded him to make an arrangement with his staff to accompany us on any expedition we may go, and therefore we can use him to cover us on this. He had at once agreed to do so, and will therefore arrange with general Gurnan to come with his squadrons. When all preparations are made, every one of you must retire before nine and get some daylight sleep if possible as we'll travel by night. It's impossible to do so by day. Those of you who because of strenuous duties cannot sleep during the day will sleep at night in the covered wagons on route. I know many of you too have learned carpentering many of you are apprentice carpenters. The expedition will be hard work but if any one of you really want to go on it, it is absolutely necessary that you should be able to do anything that is required of you. As the time draws on too you'll need other things. All of you too must see that you are properly supplied with all the necessary weapons, munition and grenades. Well what do you say to all that?"

Some of the boy and girls' scouts certainly did not seem to like to hear of all this, some did not agree to doing, and some appeared a little downcast at all this recital of what they might have to go through, but Francis himself said at once:

"I go on sounds rather hard comrades, but I'll not allow no backing out since it has been agreed to. As Miss Wenthworth says we shall have to work our way through all kinds of obstacles and dangers, but we are all accustomed to hardships and dangers by this time, besides of course, just now we wouldn't be of no use whatever to the army by remaining here idle. And besides we must know something about the country around Abbieann."

"And are we to try and find some clues as to what the Abbeinn disaster really was Francis?" Maud asked.

"I doubt if any of us can learn anything about that Maud," Francis said, nodding understandingly to his sister. "Violet, and her sisters have tried it and found nothing. If you like we can try it to begin with, then if not make our temporary abode there. Violet, and her sisters are going to accompany us as at least they said they would if they can. Most of us I know have been taught a good deal on expeditions at any rate, and we can make simple investigations, and searches, until we find out something, and if we discover anything we can keep it to have it examined. Besides that it will be well for us to explore the ruins not covered by water, and that is all I know of at present except that all of us must take pains to improve ourselves at scouting. We shall even have to make everything for ourselves out there, as it'll be a lonely desolate region among the ruins and probably among the unknown dead."

"I suppose we will not be able to do any more regular lessons Francis!"

"Indeed we will Maud. You do not imagine I hope that our military education and other schooling is already finished do you with the little time we have at it? and we cannot wish to grow ignorant of what our surroundings are or we'll be like fishes in a net. We will have to improve in our signal drills, and we all will have to make as much progress as it is possible to do, a because although we shall travel by night, there's no telling what'll turn up even then, and now all you privates can go out into the Company Street, and talk the matter over, while we officers hold a council."

"But you have not told us yet where we are all really going to Francis?"

Jane Melfort said, when everybody but the child scout officers were out.

"We are going north to where the ruins of Abbeinn is above the flood waters on the slightly rising hills."

The officers now watched the boy and girl scouts from the windows of the Mess hall. They were scattered in many groups down and along the company streets, some were in the meadows, and others in the road, all talking excitedly between themselves. The girl scout officer, Maud had brought into the Mess Hall a Schoolroom "Atlas" and opening it upon the table, they all clustered over it in eager consultation. Gertrude Angelina turned to Penrod with a smile.

"You will have to get up the subject, Penrod so as to be able to answer the innumerable questions you and I and others will be asked."

"I shall always refer to them to you as you're the smarter."

Indeed there was quite a talk throughout the Christian Vm camps when it was known that the regiments of boys and girls were going to "Bright" emigrate from the army on a daring long distanced adventure. Because of the nature of the war any emigration from the armies of scouts and a forth was far less common than it had been in the past, and therefore the interest was intensely greater. The boy and girl scouts were all popular characters among the soldiers and general and other officers, who had aided them in their training. The officers asked them now where they really were going but the child scouts had little time for talking, for upon the first hour after Francis had told them of his plans they had set to regularly at the work the girl scout leaders had laid down to them. The girl and boy scouts usually rose every morning at five or six, seldom but did rise late as eight, they breakfasted at seven, and would then work at their duties and so on through the day. All of them had been specially instructed even in the raising of signal rockets, and in the firing of signal guns and the flashing of lights. Any kind of drill could be no utility. They too were good trench diggers, tiggers, and it would take an all days work without a single rest to make their backs ache, and blister their hands, they were so accustomed to the work, and always had tremendous appetites. Many could do carpenter work, and make good progress in all other pursuits. They had gone through many months of this kind of work, and therefore there was not a weak or tender boy among them. They were broad across the shoulders, they were strong and muscular children, girls and boys alike, and were healthy and robust, and good fighters. Their appearance did not belie them for they had often wrestling matches, boxing matches, base ball and foot ball games and they would be pitted against each other, and great games generally occurred among the boys and girls acting as rivals, whereas sometimes the boys won, and sometimes the girls won, and at other times the games foot ball or base, could be a tie. There were many boy scouts and girls too who could speak more than one language. Many of the girls in their training far surpassed the boys, and they all had many a hearty laugh at the ridiculous mistakes new recruits would make in their efforts to get through their training, and being laughed at made them more desperate to learn, and all then would soon be alike.

Indeed all girl scouts had been as amused and as diligent at learning all scout work as all the boys were, and there was not one girl scout among them who did not know the mysteries of cooking. At the dinner time or for dinner time, Penrod determined to detail a number of girls to cook an extra parting dinner for all the boy and girl scouts, a meal that would be as special as a feast. He told them all the details of what was to be cooked, too many to be told here, but that he would leave the whole thing in their hands. He told them the hour for dinner will be at about half past twelve punctually. The eyes of the little girls flashed with pleasure as they thought of the importance and greatness of the task before them. Most of those who couldn't sleep hardly because of the heat of the day, ate a little extra lunch to make up for their small breakfast. Some of them felt tempted to go to the Mess Kitchen to see how things in the cooking line were getting on, but they restrained themselves, though they mentioned that what they "Smelled" those girls cooking made their mouths water, and made them wonder whether dinner was to be at half past twelve now, or two o'clock sometime next week.

The dinner indeed was a Great Success. The soup was rather hot, with too much pepper and salt in it, and a sock or two found in the bottom, and the rice had three dead rats in it, and the pudding had stuck to the mould, and had come out with a burst and had broken up into pieces and which had caused a flood of tears on the part of the cook who had cooked the pudding. The fried ham tasted as if it had been fried in the strongest cigars, and the potatoes looked "as if they had passed away" while the carrots, well they were're carrots any longer. The whole dinner of course was spoiled, no one could eat this or that, the soup tasted worst than Limburger Cheese ten years old, the mashed potatoes were like the paste they used to post bills with the coffee tasted like what should not be mentioned here, and the milk was the "comin'" of whitewash and cloridelline. It indeed was a "swell" dinner. Penrod was furious, Gertrude looked suspicious. All knew that the dinner had been prepared and cooked by the best little scout women they had, and when they had waited on the scouts they had looked very scorned in the face, from their anxious peeping into pots to see that all was going on well, and at the start they had been relieved with cheers from the boys and girls.

"Some gosh darn prank or some spy has been at the bottom of this," said Angelina Jichese. Turning to one of the girls who standing in her white frock had done the cooking she asked:

"Was there any suspicious characters in the Kitchen of the Mess Hall?"

"Yes," she answered after we had finished our cooking and sounded the call the main chef who helped us saw some man run out, and caught him. He's in the guard house now."

Angelina went to the chef and told him to have that "man" brought in right away under guard."

The Chef willing done so, and the man looking crest fallen and yet a little haughty was brought before the girl scout leader:

"Let me take a hand at this," said Joy St. Claire standing up, she turned to the prisoner and asked:

"I KNOW you did this. Why did you spoil the dinner of the whole Regiment?"

"I cannot answer any questions," answered the man in a surly manner. "Anyhow I have you kids got to say!"

"I H A HAVE A LOT to say," answered Joy vehemently. "We'll have to hauled before the Tribunal this afternoon as soon as possible. If we cannot make you talk, I know somebody who can. I'll have you brought before "Haddcliffe" the "little snake boy scout."

The man was taken not gently back to the guard house. This had been a blow to all of the boy scouts and the others too, especially the girls who had done the cooking. The whole food outfit was reserved for throughout and strict examination to see if any others might not have been positively poisoned. They had to go and eat in the soldiers Mess hall.

"This is Terrible," said Penrod. "Never even after my two years and over in the service in the army have I ever met such a situation. We'll have him arranged before the proper griller. We who toil for the cause from six in the morning till any late hour at night, sometimes twelve midnight, to have this go on. If we cannot make him confess anything, he'll go before the firing squad, and I'll be one of them to do the shooting, and he brought his fist down on the Mess table with a bang."

Some time after dinner, the man was arranged before the Tribunal, and was brought before Haddcliffe himself. The man however even when grilled so hard by him, a word except to give insolent answers and when asked if he was a "Haddcliffe" he said "No."

Haddcliffe turned to a number of boys who had been about to throw off their uniform cloaks;

"Do not take them off boys, I'm going to take you and the prisoner out with me, him under guard, but do not say anything about it to any one else. I will show you why afterwards. But I'm going to get a confession out of the man or I'll know the reason why. And what I intend to do I believe he'll come to reason."

Rather surprised, the fourteen boys did as he told them wondering where they could be going with the sullen and stubborn prisoner. Radcliffe said nothing further on the subject, until they reached a large clearing in the camp which was a quarter of a mile distant from Radcliffe's tent. Then he said to two or three of the strongest boys who guarded the prisoner:

"Now boys, this man knows we are going through a country on our way to the place we know of might as well say north of Abileann because he knows it too, of which all portions is as free of a single person as a desert, and we'll have no one within miles of us. Now it is just possible that he either attempted to cause the whole Regiment to be sick, or poisoned, for Glandolinian says that you girl and boyscouts are as troublesome to the armies, as a swarm of bees are to a bear trying to steal the honey. I do not suppose we'll meet with any opposition with our plan, but it is just as well to be prepared for every thing. There is no reason why you boys should not be able to shoot arrows as straight as any Indian and I have brought two bags full of arrows and two bows. They are real Indian arrows and bows brought over from America. I have also brought two cargin carbines and they have a revolving breach so that they fire twenty shots each. There is a spare chamber to each which is very quickly shifted in place of the one discharged, so that each of you could fire twenty shots in a very short time without stopping to reload. They will carry upwards to five hundred yards. They are not a new invention but nevertheless boys all accounts agree that they are an excellent one."

I have intended to try to tie this prisoner as an apparent target at the base of some high tree, and we'll shoot to either side of him but always striking the bark of the tree nearest him. I have tried this once before on a prisoner of stubborn will, and believe me he was so terrified he gave in and begged for mercy. I'm a first rate shot with a rifle, and I have brought down a rifle of my own use. I did not want you to speak about what we're doing to the girls or any one else for fear of drawing a crowd which will distract our aim. It is not likely that he'll be so stubborn to as to consume our patience yet if he still refuses to do so, then we'll have him sentenced as a would be murderer, and spy and face the firing squad before sunset."

Then after Radcliffe spoke he showed them his excellent double barreled shot gun and a long heavy rifle carrying a conical ball. Besides these he had two braces of colts revolving revolving pistols. These were all new but there were in addition two or three first class double barreled guns. The test began. The prisoner was fastened to a tree and here Fenrod instructed them in the use of their revolving carbines so they wouldn't really hit the prisoner, and only to fire a few shots at a time each. The firing was certainly rather wild, and the man though terrified thought they couldn't really fire straight, and therefore he taunted them, and defied them, called them poor marksmen and so forth but the firing then in answer became more steady and it appeared sure as if they would make a bulls eye with him at any moment. Believe me readers, he confessed, begged for mercy, and he was therefore released and brought a trembling wretch back to camp and under guard to face a Court Marshal just the same. Thus ended the attempt of a cranky prank to sicken a whole Regiment. The Court Marshall found out he wasn't no Glandolinian but a foreigner who however was in sympathy with the Glandolinian cause, and therefore he was charged with being an Alien enemy, supporting a country whom he had no business to be with, and was sentenced to be exiled. Thus went the afternoon with this excitement. Of all this the girlscouts knew nothing, but they suspected something unusual for they knew Radcliffe's ways, and had seen the prisoners fearful look when he was brought back to camp. It was well for him the boys had learned so well to shoot that they could hit any object near him as close as possible without hitting him. The boys had fired by turns, and thus the scoundrel had been finally terrified into confessing. He did it to spoil the well planned expedition. Nothing was really poisoned, but the food had been spoiled.

It was nearly about eight o'clock, far past the time for supper after Francis had brought the subject to a speedy conclusion before all of the boy and girlscouts were able to conclude all the proper arrangements. This was the great business of packing up and too it was no trifling matter, when a Regiment of fifteen hundred child scouts and their leaders are going to make a move to a new part of the country. Gertrude Angeline who was absent during the council and who as the chief of all the leaders had at first thought of taking the camp equisage and furniture with her, but had been warned by Fenrod that it would be a handicap for them all to have too much luggage, and that probably if they really intended to go to the north section of what survived of Abileann they could obtain anything needed among the ruins, and that should save their bringing along so much heavy articles in the wagons.

Still indeed the bulk of luggage that was to be taken was unusually large, for every one had worked at packing all kinds of cases and in addition to the personal baggage, Gertrude was taking with her picks, and shovels, besides a good stock of blasting materials of various kinds so as to blast in the ruins for certain purposes. When their heavy baggage was placed in the wagons they were sent off as to be put above the huge raft boat by which they intended to do most of the traveling north, and then came a long round of visits to bid farewell to all their friends. This indeed (you are in need) was a sad business, for although the fifteen hundred boy and girlscouts were alike excited and delighted, at the thought of the life of adventure before them they still could not refrain from feeling sorrowful, when the time came to leave the army they loved so well. All well and all the friends they had known so well.

The preparations being over, the forces of boy and girlscouts were formed in line for the trip toward where the raft was about ten miles down where they were to embark, while Gertrude remained behind for half an hour to see to it that she had not left anything in her place behind which she might need the best. Then taking a chair she sat down at a table to write a note to General Constantinian Gronburg, and had just finished the letter and signed her name and placed it in the envelope when a tall stout looking man, rough and uncouth in appearance, and with a pistol in his hand suddenly entered the room closing the door behind him.

"What do you want sir?" she demanded. "Oh you're the man sent by the enemy to get me eh?"

"You bet your life you little devil and now I've got you right where I want you. Thought you and your followers could break general Federal's army and get away with it eh, with your accursed signalling! If those two idiots hadn't fumbled I'd have had you two days ago. Packing up to try and escape me eh! Ha. Ha. Well you little devil in sheep's clothing when I get done with you—you—YOU—YOU—"

That was all the further he got for with one swing of her arm Gertrude sent the lighted lamp to the floor with a crash, the light going out out in an instant from the shock.

"What th—!" growled the man as Gertrude sprang upon him like a wild cat grabbing the hand with the gun causing it to go off with a loud report. He is a powerful man but Gertrude's many years of hardships, and labors and all her tough experiences had caused her to be his equal despite her size. He tried to strangle her to make her let go of him and there was a fearful struggle. Finally he did wrench himself free, and fired the pistol four times but the bullets hit only the wall, and again they were at the grapple. Again during the struggle he fired the pistol this time pretty close to Gertrude. He then dropped the pistol accidentally and not being able to find it he grabbed a chair as she rushed him again and swung it into the air, but struck it against the table instead of her, and smashed it into pieces.

Gertrude had another chair now in her hand, her aim was true, and in a second more he was lying unconscious on the floor, just as some one rushed in with a light. It was Angeline Richee, followed by three Abyssinilian soldiers with still more coming into the room.

"I heard the firing and got here as quick as I g could Gertrude—Goodness Gracious I hope you don't need any help to take care of yourself. Goodness Gracious you sure have made him a wreck." for the man's coat was torn ragged, and he was lying outstretched on the floor with her standing beside him and a big lump on his head. Angeline Richee picked up the pistol, while the soldiers picked up the spy and carried him away.

"Gee Goods" cried Angeline Richee I surely can't get over the way you so cleverly outwitted that Glandolinian answer in when you put the light on him so that he couldn't see any better than you could. Now you're the only little girl I ever knew of who could give such a big man a little handed and armed with a gun such a beating."

Just then one of the Abyssinilian soldiers returned.
"I'm afraid we do not need to have him face a firing squad for that," said the soldier.

"I never had such a thought, but why not?" said Gertrude.
"Because if he lives it'll be a miracle. His skull is fractured. At least we don't have to watch out for him any more."

"Well try and pull him through if possible. Now Angeline!" She added I've got another job for you. We'll start the trip now. There's no need for us to remain here any more. We have lots of provisions millions of rounds of ammunition and we'll have more. We might as well be comfortable during our trip. Go off to the raft. Come."

Toward ten o'clock that night they were all about him embarked on the huge raft. Greatly were the new recruits among the girl and boyscouts amazed at the huge cabins on the raft those to be allotted to them especially. The size of the huge vessel part raft and part boat, the smartness of it, the way it was armed, and the style of its fittings alike impressed and delighted, them. It has not been mentioned that Sally Jones accompanied the regiment but she did, and so did Violet and her sisters, and also Starling, whose wound would be taken care of on board the raft. Knowing the scarcity of people in the country they were going to, and the number of enemy patrols that might roam around Gertrude had considered it a precaution to carry as much weapons and munitions as possible otherwise they might be might be handicapped. This time too they took no horses as they were really a handicap on the big raft, and took up too much room, however they took with them a strong escort of Ay Abyssinilian soldiers. The last looks, . . . which the regiment of scouts cast toward Abbleann and armies, as it disappeared at of sight in the dark distance were less melancholy that thought to be for their going away was not for good. They were doing this because they were determined to solve the mystery of Abbleann disaster. The girls and boys were all full of hope and excitement, while even Gertrude Angeline felt but little disposed to give way to sorrow as it had been arranged should it need to do so the army can come up toward Abbleann and make a re-union with her force.

Very hot and dark was that late first evening on the raft, and as many often sat in large groups together upon the decks, while the boys made preparations for supper as none had eaten yet the little girls remarked that they did not think they were on the flood at all, or if it was it didn't seem so terrible as they had expected, and that they did not feel the least bit seasick though the raft rolled because winds were blowing and the waters were in rough rollers. Penrod said:

"Wait a little till you see things my dears; there is an old proverb 'don't halloo until you are out of the wood.'"

The next day however was perfectly calm it being the 19th of September and when the new scouts during breakfast were told that they were now getting fairly into what part of the flood is now known as Lake Abbleann with the city under it, (if not washed away) they could scarcely believe the news.

"Why one would think Hazel!" Penrod said to one of the new girls "That you were really disappointed at not seeing rows of houses standing out of the flood waters, and that you really wanted to see more of the city than you think you would."

"Oh Master Penrod, I do think it would be great fun, it would be so curious to see all that. But if it is so calm too why is everything rolling and rumbling and it's so hard to walk about."

"It's the movement of the flood currents," said Penrod. "Do you think it would be great fun to have a lot of wind out here."

"Yes I think so Master Penrod, it would be great fun."

"My name is not Penrod, but Penrod!" said Penrod with a smile. "It seems none of you new comers can yet pronounce my name."

"Well young girls," Gertrude who had been standing by watching the shore to the east, and who had overheard the little girls remark "said "if it is any fair satisfaction to you I can assure you positively that you are very likely to have your wish gratified. We are near where the buildings show out of the water. But I question indeed if you will like the scenes as much as you believe you will."

"Oh Gertrude you expect a windstorm or rain?" Jane Elliot said. "I have been thinking myself that the oppressive stillness of the morning, and the look of the sky, and those black clouds banking in such great rolls in the northeast meant a storm. Oooh if it would only be a big rain, that would quench the fire burning up our forests. . . ."

"That does the glass say there?" asked Francis.

"There is no storm I'm sure as the barometer is not falling at all!" Gertrude answered.

"But what does those clouds mean?" They say the barometer also falls slightly if it is going to rain. Maybe it'll fall before or when the storm comes."

"Gertrude looked at the cloud with her field glasses. She sure looked excited."

"We are in for a terrific windstorm a stiff northeaster too or I'm mistaken in everything else," she said.

"What tone of those Typhoons?"

"No. It's the winds produced by a forest fire. One is approaching toward that part of the shore. We'll soon see a big blaze. Have you new kids ever seen a forest fire?"

"No." One of them answered.

Now it appeared likely that they were to soon have some excitement, and they wanted Gertrude to order the men to have the raft go closer to the shore.

"I should say not," she answered. "What do you want to do? Commit suicide?"

As they could hear a funny sound the new children did not seem to be as pleased as they had expected, though one of the boys still declared unflinchingly that he was quite in earnest, and that he did wish to be as close to a forest fire as possible without getting burned. As the morning advanced some of the boy and girls scouts leaned against the bulwarks watching the movements of the waters, and the great banks of smoke clouds which every moment were rising higher but forming like windstorm clouds. There was still quite a dead calm around them and the heavy beat of the paddles as they lashed the flood waters into foam and the dull thud of the engines were the only sounds that now broke the stillness. Now and then however a short puff of wind from the northwest ruffled the water, and then died away again. What also was queer and suspicious was the number of birds "lying in the air, all going in one direction, that was toward the southwest."

"Look at the great cloud Gertrude!" Mildred said. "It looks as if it were alive and appears like one of those typhoon clouds we have seen during those storms."

"Yes Mildred, it is very grand like an immense storm cloud, and there's no doubt about there being wind there but the cloud I know from its appearance is black smoke. See along the lower horizon under the cloud. That's the fire glare."

The great smoke cloud bank appeared indeed to be in constant motion. Its shape too was incessantly shifting and changing, now a great mass would roll up and up as clouds do in a gigantic volcanic eruption, either white and black mixed and sometimes yellow, cream, and brown, now sink down again, or wreath out in front and on top in false cirrus appearance, now again the whole body above would seem to roll over and over upon itself, then small portions would appear apparently break off from the mass and sail off by themselves, getting thinner and thinner thinner and forming at last into sheeted streamers, while up along the whole under mass from the horizon it rose countless shapes and immense rolls and convolutions and tall and globular formations. The smell of burning wood and pitch was in the air.

Momentarily the whole of the heaving swelling mass rose higher and higher. It was very grand, but it was a terrible grandeur, it looked far worse than any Typhoon cloud that Violet, and her sisters had ever seen, and they themselves ever were inclined to agree with many more of the more fearsome of which one little new girl scout shrank close to Penrod and put her hand into his arm.

"I don't like the appearance of that cloud Master Penrod, it frightens me."

At this very moment Angeline Riches, who had been down the deck arranging her special guards came up to the group.

"What an immense and dark cloud of smoke, Penrod and how it moves forward as if it was a storm. Are we going to have a fire hurricane do you think. Is the flames heading for those forests on shore do you think?"

"Well Angeline I think we are in for the gales that the fire heats generally produces, and if you will take my advice you will go down at once while it is calm and see that the baggage and everything else that can roll about, are securely fastened up. All you other kids now keep away from the bulwarks unless you want to get drenched. That'll come any minute now. The breeze will soon change off from northwest, and come from the east."

In about fifteen minutes the necessary arrangements had been completed, but even in that short time they could feel that a sudden change was taking place. They felt a steady and strange rolling and toiling motion, and heard a strange hissing sound, and the older ones laughed as they found it so difficult to walk steadily along the cabin, and now it was growing very dark, and a smog was sweeping over the waters. Upon reaching the decks they observed that the smooth surface of the flood was broken up by long dashing roaring waves white in sweeping curtains of foam, that the bank of clouds covered half the sky and was moving forward and upward, and that the denoted "sea" was now flying overhead and a peculiar lashing fog or haze was covering the shore but not so thick that they couldn't see anything. The previous stillness was gone, and between the sudden whistling gusts of hot wind, the roar of the storm in the upper region could be heard, and a long the horizon the sky shined like molten iron, which flickered every now and then into unaccounted brightness. Sometimes a blizzard of sparks could be seen rising upward, and to sweep over and under the cloud, and then to die out. A pall of deep inky blackness seemed to hang from the cloud down to the roaring water, but the glare now and then seemed to be shut out by other advanced rolls of cloud rising up into the air and they could see the trees withering and twisting in an awful terrifying manner, while a roar as of thunder came from the shore.

It really was the fire hurricane. In preparation for the coming storm which sometimes was cyclonic in violence, all the soldiers had put on their thick water proof coats. Many of the children had gone into the cabins to the middle of the deck, and those who had nerve enough to remain had followed the example of the soldiers, and had wrapped themselves up in military Mackintoshes. Very moment the gusts increased in frequency and power, and the wind was very hot and the waves were broken up into fierce breaker like surges. The distant glare grew brighter and nearer. Then almost without a warning they saw the trees being writhed worse than usual and then with a roaring sound as of thunder the gale broke upon them. The winds were hot and scorching, and the air was full of flaming brands carried from the fire, which every one could see in their excitement coming in long flaming waves reaching seemingly cloud high and making a fearful booming snapping and hissing sound and pulled forward with great speed by the gale. Just before this Gertrude had sent the more timid child scouts into her own cabin promising the latter they should come out later for a peep out if they still wished it. Perrod, Francis, and some of the other boys, besides Harry Stanck, Jane Helfort and Mildred Maxwell, and even Violet, and her sisters were leaning against the bulkhead when the fire hurricane struck them.

For a moment they were half blinded, and crouched behind their shelter to recover from the spray and wind, and crouched down behind their shelter to recover themselves. Then with a hearty laugh at their crouched appearance, they made their way to the main mast, and then holding on by the relaying pins, they ran able to look fairly out on the gale. It was dark—so dark that for a time they could hardly see as far as the foremast. Around the water of the flood was white with foam looking like an angry ocean in a storm, the wind blew so fiercely that they could not hear each others voices, even when they shouted, and the huge raft labored heavily against the fast rising waves. Here Gertrude joined them and for some time clung there, watching the increasing fury of the wind until it became far worse, fairly blinding in fury, then drenched, and almost suffocated and strangled by the straits of the winds and water that they had been watching, they made their way with great difficulty down to the cabin, and had no sooner reached there, when a great terrible brightness overspread them as if the whole world suddenly became ablaze, and glancing shoreward, they saw to their dismay that the air of fire had come up to the very edge of the water near shore. The flames leaped higher than they could estimate, and the frightful winds bore to them even intolerable heat even from that distance that they were glad to dive into the cabin to escape it.

Here the feeling of "sensitiveness" for those not on the water before, which the excitement of the raft had caused so high had ceased and which now were off increased rapidly, and they were glad to slip off their upper clothes and to throw themselves upon their berths or bunks before the main fury of the sickness came on. The whole scene was a sort of horrible nightmare, when one moment those lying on the berths seemed to be on their heads, and the next upon their feet, but never lying down in a comfortable position, when sometimes the roof or ceiling of the cabin seemed under their feet, and sometimes the floor above everything would seem to go round and round, the noise too, the sound of the burning and falling trees, the groaning and thumping, and the creaking, the thud of the waves, and the thump of the maddens, the sound of falling objects on the decks, and bewilderment—although altogether it was a very unpleasant sensation. They all had dim visions of Gertrude coming in several times to see them, and to give them a cup of tea or coffee and to say something cheering to them, and all had many times a distinct idea that they had wished themselves under water instead of on top. About an hour passed, and the windstorm showed some signs of abatement but the fire on shore was something awful to behold. It was an inferno indeed a something like hell on earth. Gertrude came in again and said to the sick children "Now kids make an effort and come upon deck, it's no use lying there, and as it is not so hot outside now, the abatement of the storm will do you good. It's cooler now as the winds are dying down and changing direction. The fire hurricane had swept across and is passing."

However two dim go groans and sighs were the only response to this appeal.

"You I know you poor kids feel very bad, and that it is difficult to get out still it is worth making the effort, and you will be very glad of it after wards. You'll see the big fire ashore too. Come jump up else I shall empty some water over you. There, you need not take much time at dressing" she went on as the children seeing that she was in earnest turned out of their berths with a groan. "Just hold on by something, and get your heads over the tain, I will empty the jugs on them and it'll make you feel better. There now you will feel better, slip on some of your clothes and come to the deck. You will see a great big fire."

It was hard work for the sick child scouts however to obey orders for the big raft rolled so tremendously and was swayed sometimes to the side that they could not even hardly proceed with their dressings, and many times they found themselves lying flat on the floor, and were often also interrupted by sea sickness which the roll of the huge craft produced. However Gertrude sent some one to help them, to joke with them until they were ready to go up. Then taking them by the arms, they assisted them up the stairs to the decks. Miserable as these boys and girls felt, they could not suppress an exclamation of wonder, amazement, and admiration at the fierce and yet most magnificent if not hellish scene before them. The flood waters was tossed up like the seas in a hurricane near the West Indies, these great masses of water which as they roared the huge raft, threatened to overwhelm it, but which as it rose on their summits passed harmlessly under her hurling however at times tons of water upon the decks. The winds were still blowing fiercely from the direction of the land, and hotter winds they were high near to scorching as they brought off the heat direct from the conflagration, and the whole shore as far as they could see was all aflame, but a rift in the flames appeared here and there which showed the places where a great many trees had fallen before the gale. The flames threw a brilliant bright ray of glares upon the tossing waters making many different and weird reflections, sometimes yellow, then crimson and even pink.

The excitement of the scene, the terrific heat, the flames trying to reach across the sky, the difficulty of keeping their feet, and the influence and dreadful heat of the roaring winds, the air being full of fire brands which even fell frequently upon the raft soon had the effects which Gertrude really had desired. The children however looked somewhat frightened and although they still had an occasional relapse of "sensitiveness" they felt quite like people who were almost lost, and yet still in hell were just escaping across Hell's Water Lake and yet would not return to the blank miseries of the cabin upon any consideration as they were held spell bound by the most thrilling scene of their lives. They were soon able to eat a piece of dry toast which Gertrude brought with a cup of coffee at breakfast time.

By eight o'clock in that morning the force of the hot winds had greatly abated (for the rage of a fire hurricane doesn't last long), and although the heavy waves of the flood still continued, the motion of the big raft was very much easier. The glare of the flames shone across the water brightly, and soon as the distance was about over entirely, and a north west wind started to blow the waters was cleared of the smoke fog and finally all were again on deck for more hours of finer weather, with even the sun shining through the black haze, and this recruited all the force and draft was their enjoyment as the raft entered the submerged town of Tagus and stemming between the picture of ruins and blackening debris and past China bunks dropped her anchor there to see whether the gale and winds and waters had not done any damage to the raft or raft. They did not delay long, but through it was their fierce experience in a flood rained city. Then seeing the raft was sound as before the trip was resumed coming now into a much wider stretch of water where they were farther away from the gale, they, and yet they still continued to view the ruins of floating towns.

Eventually were still, and they hoped for broad daylight to see more, but they were to be disappointed. Their heads for miles, and miles there was nothing but a flat stretch of moving water, and they could see in the distance or from the distance at which they were almost slowly floating little except the spires of the submerged churches and the roofs of a few of the more lofty houses above the swirling waters, and sometimes a fleet of floating wooden houses, long stretches of jammed debris, and articles of all kinds. All the scene here was most disappointing.

"That a distance we are floating past that rained town" Jane said when they had passed from their first feeling. "It must be four or five miles

"Oh no please," Jane said, "we "All right. The horses are here, come and take them."
Some of the other Irish boys and girls, Angeline, Ageline, and could rather go with her. According to the girls' opinion, and to the two Jennings girls and the others who were married around Gertrude, all the Angeline please took the load in one knew knew the country by heart, all the others married the horses, prepared for them, all the right amount of was placed on accompanying the horses and tied to the cattle, for the whole party was to start at once, though it was believed they would not reach the party still past dinner time, if not later.

He was very much delighted to see the soldiers. They had halted here several days. The Italian men were very friendly for them, and insisted to which they all had to go and see their tank now and riding on the road back through the hills and rocky atmosphere and exercise had given them the keener of appetite. They were waited upon by the soldiers one of them who was an Italian, and Francis Pickford. Pickford said that there were a good many soldiers of this National National in the Abyssinian army, and that although they were not of the Abyssinian type they made excellent Christian soldiers, and were without flinching. During dinner the conversation turned chiefly upon the condition of the country north of Abbeinn, whether any enemies were in the territory, and upon the events upon the voyage on the flood. After it was over a boy named known as George Thompson, and also another by the name of Jimmie Thompson proposed to some of the boys to take a stroll around the place and view the wreckage before the trip would be resumed. One of the officers lit their cigars or cigarettes and took their seats upon the veranda and some of the girls went to explore the remains of the once handsome and beautiful garden. The conversation of Gertrude Angelina and Francis Pickford (a lad of thirteen) turned of course upon the topics of the isolation of the coast country, its position, and prospects, and upon the many advantages about hardships and working through--and true to what all has been said, it seemed as if we were lost souls, yet spared the real horrors of true suffering, and yet roaming and wandering for a way to escape. All in darkness, no machine, death and destruction all around us, and a stillness that we cannot even comprehend. If people were here in dreadful misfortune, and damn too it would be like a real infernal region. Oh if we ever find out that the enemy did this, I'll--I'll--

"This is not one bit like I expected, Gertrude, after all you've told us about hardships and working through--and true to what all has been said, it seemed as if we were lost souls, yet spared the real horrors of true suffering, and yet roaming and wandering for a way to escape. All in darkness, no machine, death and destruction all around us, and a stillness that we cannot even comprehend. If people were here in dreadful misfortune, and damn too it would be like a real infernal region. Oh if we ever find out that the enemy did this, I'll--I'll--"

"Do not be afraid Jennie dear" Joyce said gloomily however--for her sisters voice had a tinge of worry and apprehension in it. "One of us won't be cheated out of our efforts this time I promise you. Papa wrote me not long ago, to tell you which unfortunately I forgot, he had sent me an offering for a thousand miles said, for the success of our undertakings. He feels sure, the enemy did this, but you know we cannot do anything until we have proof. Then we'll go to Abbeinn and start things humming."

"You and Abbeinn is a very different sort of place than it was when I first came here," said Penrod with a grudgingly. "Now it's under water. I really wish Glandolinia was under the dead sea." and he said this in a way that showed he meant it with all his heart. "You sure have some beautiful sympathy for Glandolinia," said Francis Pickford, smiling. "Of course now this is a very lonely region. There is nothing in sight for fifty miles but this desolation. This country once was deeply settled and now there is not a living soul except as of course, it is like being on the moon."

With some of the daylight coming back again as the northwest wind renewed they spent a half hour riding over the desolate estate which consisted of four square leagues--that is to say six miles each way--and in examining the various groups of deposits left by the flood for valuable articles. Gertrude herself had in the meantime started on a tour of inspection through the iron provinces most likely to suit for good traveling without going through too much mud. While she was away, the boys and girls who wished cleaned up a little around the estate, and to a water themselves to the work and duties of the life they were to lead, as this old building could be used as a sort of headquarters later on. Into this they entered for two hours with the greatest zest. Even long horseback riding was nothing for them for often these boy and girl scouts had been in the saddle not exactly from morning till night, but from morning till next morning. All of them were more or less returned from exposure to sun and heat and many of them looked like young South Americans and gunchos. All of the boys counted themselves as fine looking boys, and being Abbeinnian they all have gingham faces. The dress of the boys and girls are always very picturesque. The girls wear the longer dresses but the boys wear something on the line of loose calzoncillos worked and fringed around at the bottom. Above this is a sort of shirt as arranged that it has the effect of very loose trousers. These shirts are of the brightest colors woven in stripes. The shirt is of yellow in flannel and the coats in the form of jockeys and their hats too. Their coats are very long and are made of leather (this is very strange) They girls and boys alike wear a broad leather belt with holsters attached for pistols and with a number of pockets in the belt in which different weapons like knives and bayonets and still others are stuck. The outside of the belt the stretch for cartridges or cartridges holders. They always, when not on duty wear gay silver and brass ornaments upon themselves and their horses, and therefore do not at all appear as if they were really scouts but just boys and girls out on some gay carnival time. Their saddles are fine and light, and any body can ride them. After two hours had made it a pace, Gertrude returned with the welcome news that she had made her choice, and that she had discovered a tract of land across which her force could march with ease, by way of a flooded river some twenty miles southwest of Abbeinn near Ricardo Creek and consequently only a few hours or a day's journey from where they were now station established. Gertrude looked a little more when she mentioned this, and Penrod said so when he heard her mention the location of the stream but he only said that he was very glad that she had succeeded in finding a land landscape over which they could travel toward Abbeinn more easily. After the first two days were over, Gertrude proceeded to satisfy the curiosity of her hearers as to the new route they were to take.

"It's a clearer land, where there's rolling hills covered with nice beautiful forests, with leaves that make them look like a forest of Parsely in the distance. There's a clearing in the forest about six miles square or of about twenty five thousand acres, and when we get there we can camp for a general dinner. There is a half flooded stream running through the forest, there are a good many openings in the forests considering that it appears to be the Mic-jolleston woods, and there are many good elevations which when you climb a tree gives a fine view over the whole country, and we'll have interesting travel, though from on the travel will consist of going at night. In the small stream falls into the larger one, and will I think be useful for drinking purposes. There seems to be an abundance of game so we'll not go hungry on the expedition to Abbeinn, there is ducks, geese, and swans upon the river, and lastly the woods are defenseless, the woods grow very high so that if there are foes about they couldn't so easily detect us. And a great point is, that it is only twenty miles from here so that we could have a very interesting travel."

"That is the most important point (providing it is sharp) Penrod said. "But Ricardo Creek is the most rising stream in the country, and we'll have plenty of watchouts by and by."

"Is there any Glandolinian army near or near the whereabouts, Gertrude?" asked Francis Pickford.

"There is one within thirty miles of the woods thence to whom it belongs I do not know, and the ground between us is principally occupied by Glandolinians, and we'll have plenty of "Good" neighbors near, but we'll watch out nevertheless, that we won't have them all around us. They're Om-runs. I can tell by their hats."

"If the advantages of travel through that section is so great Gertrude how is it that you have succeeded in finding it so infested with those Glandolinians. I understood from Angelina's phone, and Maud Angelina that all in land not under flood or burning is Glandolinian possessed, and that was likely to increase in danger."

Gertrude hesitated. "Well Francis the land is at present upon the extreme verge of Glandolinian armies, and if they see us the Glandolinians are apt to be very troublesome and make my many make attacks or may not. No doubt I believe the thing has been exaggerated, still there is something in it, and the consequence is, there's worse peril further north which I discovered, which makes traveling that way impossible entirely, and I'd rather chance the meeting with those Glandolinians than chance the dangers northward."

"They say a great proportion of these Glandolinian Tales are built up of very small foundations," Penrod said cheerfully, as the faces of many of the new recruits looked somewhat serious. Then listening to Gertrude's description of her scouting tour they forgot all about the Glandolinians.

Many of the boys and girls however by no means did so, they even knew right along where Glandolinian army was there or near there, and as they walked away to sit on a log one boy by the name of Charles said:

"I think we're going to have the most thrilling and exciting adventure of our lives upon George, for I noticed that Penrod looked very grave when Gertrude first said there she had discovered a "good" route. Depend upon it we shall have fun with them after all. It's a wonder how an army of Glandolinians or I'll bet my hat and its the biggest army Glandolinia yet has in the field. They're was supposed to move against Vivianina to help the rebel Mylatzo, but he's battling general Vivian, and the Abbeinn affair just now."

They would have thought it still more likely had they heard the conversation between Gertrude and "Bright Eyed Mary" after the two were alone for a few minutes, for she too had overheard the conversation between Gertrude and Penrod.

"Well, my dear Francis," said Penrod, how came you with such a nice force of troops at your back to make such a blunder as to think of going through a country so exposed and so possessed by a great and mighty Glandolinian army under general Richardson Phillips. Their army is 100,000,000 strong. And no one dares to go see him. Why if I was in a country infested by Indian attacks I'd think it sport compared to this risk. I look upon your proposition as rank madness."

"There is absolutely all in what you say Mary, and I thought the whole matter over, before I decided it, and went scouting north. The north is straight ahead is absolutely impassable, for the main of the army is situated there as well as an impassable portion of the forest fires. There is a great risk either way—a greater risk than even you think Mary, but I am still more a great risk either way—a greater risk, but I believed if we'd travel through there by night and dress ourselves all in black we can pass through without detection. Otherwise we'll have to abandon the expedition and go back. General Tumorline does not expect us here at any rate, his army too is not in those woods for the Glandelinians fear the fires and that ought to give us an advantage. We shall be all well prepared and well armed and should therefore have no fear of our personal safety. We can also look out in case a portion of the fire swings upon our own forest. As to our horses we cannot use them as the woods are too thick, and the roads are too narrow, and besides to ride them through the woods would cause detection. But we got to take our chance one way or turn back to general Tumorline's army. It's only for a whole night at least and we'll surely then pass the rebel army. After that we shall have open country all around us, and if the Glandelinian army should spot us and move after us as I do anticipate and if, as I believe the Rosario Creek is a fordable one we can in time of peril send a wireless telegraph to general Evans and he'll come here in a rush with his army. I shall take care not to go too fast about it however, and shall have scouts on the watch. I think at the end of the night you will agree with me that I have done wisely in choosing that route."

"I have no doubt that our expedition will be made with evident success as you say by night and that in the long run your spec. speculation will be a very successful one, but it is a terrible risk. I think I've heard lots about general Tumorline, and he's like little lambs marching to meet a flock of lions suffering from Hydrophobia."

"I don't think he's as dangerous as they say Mary. Besides we have a pretty strong cavalry escort, and we ourselves are all good crackshots. There is not a boy or girl among us and you know it. I think I've heard lots about general Tumorline, and he's like little lambs marching to meet a flock of lions suffering from Hydrophobia."

In another hour, or two, Gertrude Angelina (taking main command) and all the Regiment with Violet and her sisters around Gertrude, and the soldiers taking up the front and the rear started down toward the direction she had indicated. They decided it was safer to make the trip by raft, and by night fall all were on board, and soon the raft moved off shore.

The voyage now resumed. Up the flood was marked by no particular incident this time. The distance to the spot they were heading for was about a little over twenty miles which was expected to be performed by the fast moving raft in about two hours or more. The flood here was quite narrow being only twenty miles across and was completely studded by trees and floating houses, so they had to use precautionary measures so the raft wouldn't get jammed. The scenery seemed wooded and dark, and the banks were heavily forested. They were therefore glad when they finally arrived at what Gertrude said was Rosario Creek. However they were all somewhat disappointed at the aspect of the ruined town they came upon, which had been once a big place and looked over now small enough to contain only half a thousand inhabitants, and looked miserably ruined. Here however they were not by a courier to whom general Tumorline had once introduced Gertrude, and with whom he had stayed during his first coming to her camp.

"What are all these poor boys and girls doing here? I had not expected to have seen so large a force of fine looking girls and boys. Why they look like little midget soldiers."

Indeed all of the Regiment deserved this name commendation for they were "midget" soldiers and were remarkably strong for their ages. Many looking a year or two older than they really were. In a few minutes they were on their way toward the forest spoken of by Gertrude, which was about half way, the distance from there they had now left their concealed quarters. They found that the courier had most satisfactorily performed the commission with which Gertrude had intrusted him. He had a company of men with him and had brought a couple of rough country carts, three pair of heavy horses half a hundred riding horses, two milking cows and a score or so of sheep (or perhaps) and cattle to supply the herder for the day. He had a horse brought with him fourteen Germanians—and a dangerous American gun named Herdude Lopez who was a tall swarthy man, whose father was an Irishman, and his mother an American, and brought two other men, one who was a German—Prussian called Hans Fritz, who had been in the country since he was a little boy, the other an Irish man called Patrick Kelly, whose face the boys and girls remembered at once as having coming to their army a little before the time of the battle. The last man was an American one of those kind of wandering fellows who are never contented to remain anywhere, but are always pushing on and if they thought that the further they went the better it would be for them. He was a good crackshot, a good man and there were few thin things which he could not do. Gertrude was pleased with their appearance, they all were powerful men and accustomed long to military life. Their clothes for they did not wear any uniforms—uniform were a real disgrace to them. Their clothes were being rough and of a miscellaneous kind a mixture of European and Indian garb and a little Indian too with the exception of the Irishman who wore a long blue tailed coat and brass buttons of the "old country". Despite the fact that there might be grave peril in going through this part of the country every one was in the highest spirits at being at last really on the way, and as a light sometimes showed some of them from the reflection of fires they had a hearty laugh at the appearance of their cavalcade.

Through these woods there were no road or tract of any kind, and consequently everyone instead of following in a file as they would have done out in the open the whole force struggled along in a most confused body. First came the Glandelinian soldiers, then the animals, the sheep and the horses. Behind them marched the child scouts and then came Lopez in his full uniform and a long whip in his hand which he always carried and which he could have cracked with the report of a pistol had he not been cautioned to be quiet. The first man to be seen was Hans Fritz who sat upon a horse and his disguise was certainly the berries. His head was covered with a very old and battered straw hat of farmers kind through several broad holes in which his yellow hair trailed out in a most comic fashion and over his blue flannel shirt a large red beard flowed almost beyond his waist, though of course the beard was false. The Irish man was walking by the side of one of the crackshots in corduroy breeches, and gaiters, and blue green coat with a high black stovepipe hat battered and bruised all out of shape, on his head. They had worn these disguises to get through to find Gertrude and her troop. The Yankee himself rode sometimes near one, some times by another seldom exchanging a word with any one. He wore a fur cap (regarding the heat of the weather) made of fox's skin, a faded blanket with a hole cut in the middle for his head to go through fell from his shoulders to his knees. He and Lopez each led a couple of spare horses. Two Matiff dogs trotted along by the horses and two fine retrievers called Nero and Cain galloped about through the thick brush. The forest was over a high rolling plain and the trees in some spots were so thick you couldn't get through, and therefore they had to keep to the wide trails and the others all wondered not a little how Angelina, whose she acted as guide, knew the direction she was to take. After about an hour or so of marching and the riding Angelina Kichee pointed to a rather large clearing, a clearing much larger than usual in the distance and said:

"There's where we were going to stop for our supper."

"Hush!" shouted the English boy. "We ride on Angelina!"

"Yes boy, I will ride with you." And off they started leaving the rest of the party to follow on behind.

"And how you gallop gallop boys! The ground is honeycombed with many pitfalls left when the enemy tramped through these woods, and if your horse threads in he will go over his head."

"I don't think there is any danger of that!" the boy who had more than sufficiently good opinion of himself said. "I can stick on pretty tight, and also—" He had not time to finish his sentence, for Angelina's horse suddenly seemed to go down on his head, there was the crack of a rifle shot simultaneously and Angelina was sent flying two or three yards or more through the air, descending with a heavy thud upon the soft dry earth among the weeds and thistles. She was up in a moment again, except for a knock on the eye against her gun which she was carrying before her and after a minute's painful look she joined heartily in the shouts of laughter of the others at her expense. However the horse had not tripped but had been shot down by some sniper or the crack of the rifle had been heard.

"Angelina managed to jump on another horse, and they were soon off again, but this time at a more moderate pace. There was no use then of trying to locate who had fired the shot, for it was too dark to see. They had however reached the clearing and soon crossed a little stream, running east to fall into the main stream which formed the boundary of the clearing. Clearing upon that side, and they all saw they were now upon their own chosen land for the supper. They had now drawn rein and as there was some light from some glare far away they looked around upon the clearing which was to be their supper and temporary resting place. As far as could be seen the darkness the clearing was like a flat plain with a few slight elevations and some half dozen trees, extended. The grass was tall and stiff intermingled with the tall forest flowers literally mingled with innumerable flowers at that. Strange objects could be seen lying in the distance, and a short examination enabled Gertrude to see with her glasses that they were a scouting party of Glandelinians, to the surprise of the boys and girls.

"Where have you fixed for the day, carrying outfit for the day?" Angelina Joanna asked....
"There, have those three green men standing upon the highest swell you can see (about a mile and a half further). We will point once, the others will see us."

Another ten or twenty minutes took them to the place Gertrude had pointed out and her companions agreed that nothing could be better for a camping spot for it was impossible to travel further through the woods without daylight. At the foot of the slope the river which formed the northern boundary flowed distant a mile and a quarter or more from the foot of the rise, to the east another stream came down between the slope of the clearing and another less elevated rise beyond. This stream at this spot had a rather rapid fall and was distant about half a mile from the intended site of the night camp.
The main stream was eight hundred yards across and was now full of flood water. In some places the bank was so thickly wooded you could get to the stream and thick clumps of brush and bushes grew with the forests beside it.
They now took off the saddles and bridles from their horses (those that had horses) and allowed them to range as they pleased knowing that military used horses were accustomed to be let free, and that there was no fear of their straying away.

"Now everybody," warned Gertrude "let us begin by first getting our supper.
We have plenty of provisions with us and we can start cooking right away and then we'll..."

At this moment the reports of guns followed close upon one another.
"Maybe some," signals somewhere," said Gertrude. "But never mind it's too dark and they can't see us. We have plenty of GR. sauce and eleven ducks which we brought with us off the raft."

"One of the boys captured alive four geese and eleven ducks even in this darkness in about five minutes," one of the girls said, when they joined Gertrude. "That is not bad hunting to begin with without shooting." "....."

"Not at all boys, it is rather unusual. What with wild fowls, and rabbits and other provisions I think that at a good pitch we could live some time without starving on route route to Abbeism."

"Yes, don't mean to say, Gertrude, "that they captured rabbits!" "One of the boys asked in astonishment."

"They did indeed Joan, and I am told that they are not at all very bad for eating. Now let us go forth and eat our supper."

By the time they were grouped in the large clearing they found that the rest of the troop was within a quarter of a mile, and in a few minutes they came.
The cattle and sheep however did not need any attending to. Immediately they found they were not required to continue the trip any farther than the clearing, and therefore they scattered and began to lie down some to graze, the horses being unhitched from the wagons, and all hands set to unload the amount of goods they intended to be eating, and which had been brought up in the wagons. Only the things which Gertrude had considered as prizes for the supper had been allowed to be removed from the wagons all the heavier goods being left on. The wagons also contained large cases containing the worst weapons, carbines, and the like, and ammunition and hand grenades, and small machine guns... There also were a number of cartridges with tea, coffee, salt and pepper a sack of flour many cooking pots, frying pans tin plates, deeshes, and mugs, the shovels carpenters tools and fire fighting implements pickles and the like a number of rolls of felt dozens of wooden posts and ten large coils of iron barbed wire. While the others were busy unloading the food provisions for the coming, supper, the German had had cut some high turf and build a rough but big fireplace, and soon had a hot but well shaded fire blazing for they must take means that no fire in seen by the foe. Besides it to be protected so breeze would not start to blow the sparks and entern around and produce another forest blaze here.

"Shall we pluck all the birds?" the English lad asked.

"You don't know as way of cooking yet son," said Violet herself and took one of the ducks, while her sisters and some of the others did the same.
They broke off their heads and pinions and in another minute they had roughly skinned them, and threw them to the German and Yankee soldiers to do them and put the various fowls into the frying pans.

A similar process was performed with the many other ducks and a little pepper and salt shaken over them and in a wonderfully short time the first batch was ready. All drew round and sat among the high grass the 'in plates were distributed but were only used by the officials, the others using the 'better dishes and so on, as the officials believed in treating their followers better than themselves. The operation of plucking the fowls could not have flourished to place at had they not been used to it, and if they had not been used to it indeed it would have made them all lose their humor, but their former experiences had made it so. This was not so with them in the last, per-boy and girlscout. Some absolute primitive cooking and it was nevertheless always excellent, and after enjoying a box of treas all felt ready for the work.

"But in the end, the first thing was the question."

"The first thing is to get these boys into the wood, and to form up a wide force to form an enclosure for all our animals at night so to prevent them from being stolen in case the enemy would find out of our presence and start a raid. We will put in ten posts each side, and pace them at ten yards apart or so that will take about thirty or forty posts for the full completion. With that we might have left we can form a division to separate the sheep from the cattle as they may not get along together. Unless we do this, the enemy might take it to his head to clean out of every animal we got, and besides this earlier to defend too."

A good spot was therefore chosen between a portion of the clearing, and the more impassable stream on the left. The distance was not measured and marked by the help of the conflagration rows and while Hans carried down the heavy posts one by one upon his shoulder, all the others assigned to do so went to work. Indeed the soil was soft and rich and the holes were dug to the required depth in a far shorter time than would have been believed possible. Too all the while the work had to be accomplished without causing the slightest disturbance or noise to even speak. The fire was stretched and fastened and before ten o'clock everything was in readiness. The animals were driven in and the entrance which was narrow was blocked up with brush and wreckage from the river. Then followed another half hour of toil in setting up small shelters for those who feared to sleep outside. By this time all were really tired and were glad when Hans summoned them to come to another meal (breakfast) and this time one of the sheep. Then Gertrude and many of her girl and boy scout officers to long taking their mugs of tea and retired into the shelters prepared for them and sat and talked over the events of the night and as to the march on the following night and then wiping themselves up in their blankets lay down to sleep listening for some time dreamily to the hum of conversation of the soldiers who were sitting and smoking round the fire and to the hoarse roar of the innumerable frogs in the stream below and occasionally the cries of Abbeismian sentries so far distant.

In the morning they were up and abroad with the time for daylight, and a cup of hot coffee and a piece of bread or toast prepared them for the next move of the expedition. Gertrude, her boy scout, and the Yankee went on for some distance and decided then to scout, while the others were sent to work upon the framework of two damaged wagons which had been found while others went down to the stream and cut a quantity of long coarse rushes, which they made into huge bundles and brought up to the wagons. The framework for the wagons which were about each fifteen feet long was already fitted and also numbered and it took a very short time to erect and when one was done Gertrude and the Yankee set to aid the boys erect the other while Francis Stano and Pickford drove in the nails and secured the work already done.

So many helped at it that the work was done only in a few minutes say fifteen minutes and a perfect stack of rushes had been raised in readiness. A great number of long rods had been cut from the bushes and as most of them were as flexible as t and tough as willows they well suited for the purpose.
After breakfast the whole party of boys nearest waited to their labor to get the wagons somewhat armoured. The rods were split in two and were covered round with sheet iron and were nailed at intervals across the rafters of the top. Upon them the long rushes were laid and over all heavy iron was fastened by the soldiers who were mechanics. The sides were treated in the same way except that the rushes were woven in and out between the battens so as to make quite a close compact wall and iron also being fastened to it.
The other wagon was treated in the same way and it was not until ten o'clock that morning before the two wagons were finished.

Gertrude and her officials decided to take possession of one of them.
This however was to be only temporarily used. After this before the main trip was to be resumed Gertrude told about ten of the boys to scout through the woods for a certain distance and see how the way was. The patrol work however was over, and the trip could soon be resumed in a regular way. Hans and others had decided to dig holes or pitfalls for those who might be enemies and follow after the regiment. James the Yankee had formed a mine to blow persons up as soon as they stepped there. The Mexican Abbeismian Lopez was still to accompany them, and each were well armed, for some how or other they seemed to small trouble brewing in the air. The morning was very very gloomy, absolutely like a dark twilight--about as hot too almost as if the had been travelling through some African jungle. Gertrude proposed that they should go on the march and that the scouting party should first ride slowly as far as the clearing extended, six miles from the river that they should then go to the northwestward until they reached the main forest and should follow through that to the river by whose banks they should proceed in general, and too while on the march to try and capture or kill game but to use their bow and arrows instead, which they always carried for shooting could make noise and disturb the enemy.

one of the shareholders killed was a Kingman.
Gertrude first came to remember the fact that they were captured.
One of the men however had his shoulder laid open by the stroke of the axe and at last, and rather too late, he saw the danger. Gertrude decided to return back to the clearing at once in order to save the boys' shoulder dressed, and they started on their way back...

The Abingdon-Killam soldier was accustomed to the work, and knew the way. "The boy could not do about it, the American and the Irishman knew a lot more about it and was willing to turn their land to anything. First a large piece of ground was cleared of grass, and was leveled, and then some boards were hammered together so as to form a rough table. They decided to form a wall around the house out of logs. A piece of extra ground was chosen near to form the works. The turf was taken off, the soil was dug up, and one of the soldiers drove the horses round and round over it trampling it into Heavy soft mud for they intended to use it for forming a parapet to catch any small arms fire, and a water tank for use in case of necessity. The boys had not been prepared for it. When this ditch was full they prepared to start another. It was hard work for all indeed, and the heat of the morning was too great to allow them to all work at it too steadily, but they did it by turns.

Bridge were made over the ditches. The boys had just finished the last ditch getting it ready for the mail, and were moving away, when one of them cried:

"Stop! Jam and down flat on the ground - quick."

Startled by the suddenness and sharpness of the cry, the boy obeyed and lay there without moving, and as surprised to see the other boys drop to their knees and suddenly open fire with their rifles.

"We've killed them," the boys cried triumphantly, and the boy looking toward where the shots had been fired, saw a number of Glandelinian soldiers on horses drop to the ground, with a number of others on the swift retreat and the men coming up to see what was the matter, the Yankee said that if they had not seen them at the time and seen quick enough the Glandelinians would have ridden them down and captured them, for those Glandelinians were a woods patrol and had seen them there. The Glandelinians of that sort were more watchful than the others. Those who dared had returned to carry away their wounded. The boys grew pale at the thought of the narrow escape they had, and the one who had been exposed to the enemy fire was half inclined to cry at the thought of what might have happened. It was evidently they were indeed in dangerous territory.

Just at that moment they saw a large crowd of objects in the distance and the boys cut at once went off, to meet Gertrude and assist her to drive and the provisions she had captured in the raid. They found her reaching her that she had captured several wagons of provisions, and twenty cavalry horses - the horses being very well bred, and fast, and brought special especially for their own riding. Upon their arrival at the house the animals were turned into the enclosure and picketed. Indeed Gertrude was very much pleased at the sight of the two ditches filled with mud some distance in front of the house and gave credit to all for the amount of toil which had been done during her few hours of absence. Then before dinner she assigned to every one their share of the future toil. A number of boys were to go out and watch the movements of enemy patrols.

Those who could were to work at the house, while a number of boys were to take horses and plows and to plow up the ground in a way to make it hard going for enemy horses. Others were to dig pitfalls, which lying below the house near the river. Others were to dig pitfalls, which although already begun had been stopped during the press of more urgent toil, and the water required had been fetched from the stream in barrels placed in the wagons. In the rear of the house there was a large barn built in the adobe fashion or as mud houses are constructed and it is believed all readers must understand how such houses are made. It is as follows:

"The Mexicans and South Americans prepared the mud as if for the formation of bricks, but instead of being made into such, it is formed at once into the wall. The foundation is first dug out, and then leveled with stone with such mud between the boards are then placed on edge right down to the ground or two or three feet apart, that is depending how wide the walls are going to be made. These are kept in their places by two pieces of wood nailed but not too tightly across them. The space between these boards is filled with that sort of mud (just as good and reliable as mortar) in which chopped straw or straw even dried grass or turf and rye straw have been mixed to bind it together. When the boards are left for a day or so sometimes longer, while the builders proceed with the other parts of the wall.

The boards are then removed and the next of the mud soon dries the wall into a mass almost as hard as the brick. The boards are then put on again somewhat higher up and the process repeated until the walls have been built as high as the owner desired. However therefore had culled in the woods must have been some Mexican for they could tell that the walls had been finished in a fortnight and the walls of the barn inside were plastered with lime to keep in the mud with a bulley would continue to come from the walls. The boys who had employed the men to do the work had seen to it that a considerable amount of ground had been plowed up, and so now covered with weeds and other grass so as to hide the deep depression. Upon the return of some of the others who had went out scouting, the trenches were filled by earth, since underground. Gertrude intended to have regularly attended with many small pitfalls for one understood that the enemy frequently endeavor in their assaults to rush across open ground, and she therefore decided to have a line of many pitfalls made as possible.

But at last it seemed that all was finished. All the ground was made into numerous pitfalls, and whatever was to be done inside the house was accomplished. It was exactly close to dinner time closing on the last week of September that they had come here and all were very pleased that they had now quite a good fortification which they could use as long as they were compelled to stay here because of the barricade northward. They all gave three cheers for their new temporary abode. The tower they all agreed was in especial feature. It was built of heavy stone up to the height of the roof of the building itself but the upper stories had been built of brick over a foot wide and laid in mortar. The top had been embattled, and those who cheer boomed it laughed, and said the house appeared as if it were a sort of church they remembered going to at Home. It was a joyful day nevertheless, and the whole party sat down to a dinner of mutton and wild fowl of two or three sorts, while all those outside ate what was served to them.

At the dinner hour Gertrude told her officials that she was going to start right away to bring up the rest of the troop who were all getting very impatient indeed to be out upon the clearing. She explained to them that she should bring up the many coats with bedding, but that she relied upon them to increase their stock of axes and benches, and to put up shelves which would do for the time of being there. Gertrude thought also that she should not be away later than three or four o'clock, as by taking a long tour toward Rosario Creek she could catch the rest now to be coming off the raft, and as she had already signalled to Penrodd saying she would probably arrive, there would be no time to lose. Therefore she started immediately after dinner the last words of the whole force there saying:

"Be sure Gertrude to watch out for the enemy patrols, for the Glandelinian patrols are getting worse and worse, and more watchful and dangerous. We hardly closed an eye last night because the enemy made so much noise in their camps."

Hot as the weather produced by the distant forest fires was, the boys and even the girls worked incessantly at their carpentering for the next few hours and at the end they had the satisfaction of seeing a large table for dining at in the sitting room, and a small one to act as a side board, two long benches and a table and a long flap to serve as a dresser in the dressing room or kitchen, for the house had been found empty of furniture. They also had put up some shelves in the bedrooms, and some nails in the doors and walls for hanging up clothes. They were very tired at the end of two o'clock but they glanced around with a satisfied look, for they understood they had done their best. Then three of the boys followed by an escort and led by Angelina Hines were to ride to Rosario Stream to meet the rest of the scout force led by Gertrude. It was indeed a most joyful meeting, when Penrodd and the others stepped off the raft, but the first embrace were scarcely over when George Zimmerman exclaimed:

"Why comrades, what is the matter with your uniforms! I should not have recognized any of you."

"Well my dear, I thought that they would perhaps leave something of us till morning, but I felt almost inclined to go mad and jump overboard," said Penrodd. "It was a most dreadful night last night. It was something terrible."

"What was the trouble Penrodd?"

"Oh it's those dreadful Glandelinians," said Angelina. "They came in boats and tried their most desperate efforts to capture the raft. I fancied they were demons, and added to our discomfiture in the fight came those dreadful mosquitoes, there were millions on board the raft. I really thought they would take advantage of the fighting and eat us up. Didn't you think Jane?"

"I should say so. I didn't believe Glandelinians were around. I hope so certainly hope they are not around here Gertrude!!!!!!"

"No Mad not just now anyhow, they nothing so bad as they were last night in making so much noise, but as we are close to a vast Glandelinian army they will no doubt be, be very troublesome to us by and by, and I question whether the woods will protect us to any certain degree, but if you need my advice, and all remain on your guard we all may manage to do pretty well till we can resume our journey. It's also better to be ho, a than to be surprised by the enemy."

In spite however as they told all those who had been on board the raft and passed a bad night, and were quite ready to start the tripp. They were all to ride, with the exception of Gertrude, who decided to go in one of the wagons and they would therefore reach the clearing before night fairly set in. Verence having been told that Gertrude was not going to ride on horse this time had cut some boughs to use for lashing at brush. Gertrude at first felt rather anxious at the thought of leaving the raft almost unguarded, but Penrodd assured her, "Sure Gertrude, you have a strong force of men on board who will guard it, and no danger shall come near the raft at all for it'll be safe. The enemy cannot reach it now."

So for sale went ahead without suspense, and they all started the pretty fast for the clearing. While on the raft every one had been able all night and were able to talk away without ceasing of all that happened during the night. That now made the others realize that all the shooting was they had heard continue way into the night. The only caution now Bertie had to live with a hide back at James Greene was "Lay out for pitfalls" made to insure any attacking parties of the enemy. They had not gone more than half way before they met Francis Fitzpatrick Piskford who had ridden thus far to welcome his comrades. One of the first questions Dolores asked after the first greetings were over, was:

"Are there any glandelinian patrols around the clearing near Piskford?"
 "How many so far?" Francis said "I have no streams near either, but I understand a vast army under Phellinka Amerline is close by, but he doesn't know yet we are so near."

After waiting for a few minutes to rest after traveling through such a heat of the day they continued on down the stream where some of them saw a number of glandelinians spying on them from behind bushes, and shot them. They all soon reached the clearing, and the officers entered the houses where Jane and others swept the place with the greatest care, spread the table, arranged the benches set everything off to the best advantage and then devoted their whole exert energies to cooking, a whole excellent supper, which they would be sure every one would soon be ready for. This was just ready when from the lookout on the tower they saw the remainder of the regiment approaching. The supper was too important to be left, and they were therefore unable to come out to meet them. They were at the gate however as they rode up.

"Hurrah, hurrah!" They all shouted, as the rest of the regiment rode or marched up, and they too set up a cheer in return. Some of the Abyssinilian soldiers ran up to take the horses, and in another minute they were in their new position. The glandelinians themselves ran everywhere wild with delight, ascended to the lookout. Lookout clapped their hands at the sight of the sheep (the peep) and cattle, and also horses, and could hardly be persuaded to sit down and eat some supper. Penrod himself was less loud in his commendation of everything, but he nevertheless was greatly pleased with the new home and positions in the clearing of the woods, which was much more stronger and comfortable and better protected than he had expected.

"This is good and plentiful food," Penrod said to Mary. "It is more like being on a picnic than being in camp, now we should and shall enjoy it to be sure, if the enemy is not too near to put in any interference. They we set too after supper, and wash up. We haven't been clean really for weeks or months, and this is our first opportunity for real baths, and so forth."

"Certainly Mary, and it is well that we all could have the chance to get cleaned up for once.... Now too we shall have to be upon our best mettle and see how nicely the boys, and the other glandelinians, have prepared the supper. These beautiful geese are excellent and the chicken done to a turn. They will have a great laugh on us if we the professed chefs do not do at least as well."

"Ah but see what practice they have been having Penrod."
 "Yes Mary," Penrod said, "and I can tell you it is only one or two things any of the rest of us can do well. Birds of fowl done in this fashion, and chops and other meats are about the limits. If we tried anything else, we made an awful mess of it, as to puddings, we will never attempt them, and shall be very glad in the way of something for the creation of bread, for we are heartily tired of these flat hard breads." "QAZ"

"Why did you only have this high middle wall white washed only half the way up Gertrude?" demanded Penrod.

"In the first place," Gertrude said, "I did not have it done, and in the second, it was white washed before we came here by the owner, and in the third we are going to set to work at once to put a few light rafters across, and to nail felt below them, and clean it so as to form a ceiling. Too it will make the rooms look less bare, and what should be more important it will save them a good deal of color."

"You get milk for all of us I hope?"
 "Yes," Gertrude said, "The cows we have secured are brought along, with us are accustomed to be milked, and I and other have done it until now, but we shall hand them over to your own milkers, and your girls will have to learn and not be afraid of cows, because they have horns."

The girls first glanced at each other triumphantly.
 "Perma, we all now more about milking than you think," Gertrude said.

"Yes indeed," said Penrod, "All my glandelouts and boys too are going to be very useful little children, and Gertrude I will tell you a secret. A very good secret, while you were all here in the clearing during the time of day and night, my glandelouts as the boys too often during the same day left the raft for the shore, to try and capture game and poultry for theirs and our use, of which we secured a great many.... I saw how very anxious they all were to learn to be useful, and so as we had secured a good number of cows I offered to teach them to milk, and to manage a dairy, and to bake butter and cheese. And believe me they worked regular and willingly, till I saw any one of them could form butter as well as I could. It has been a great secret of course for the girls and boys did not even wish you to know it yet, so that it might be a very pleasant surprise...."

 "Very well done comrades," Gertrude said, "You sure gave me a surprise indeed, and it is a most pleasant one. Penrod you kept the secret capably, and never so much as whispered a single word to me about it."

Gertrude's boys and girls too were delighted, for they had not tasted, butter since they had first joined the boy and girl scout force, and they promised already enough, to make a number of rough churns with the least possible delay. By eight seven o'clock more wagons arrived with the others and some of the baggage brought off the raft, and then there was toil for the rest of the evening, putting up the beds, and abating everything in order. The men to certain ornaments were fitted to the beds and therefore all felt gratified at the thought that they should be able to do the day the little blood suckers. They observed that on their calendar the following day was to be Sunday and therefore no necessary toil was to be done. After supper the benches were brought in from the bedrooms and the boy and girl scout officers assembling, Gertrude read prayers from her Prayer Book offering up a special prayer for the blessing and protection of God and his blessed Mother upon themselves and their stronghold. Afterwards Gertrude and the new comers were shown over the whole place and clearing before it got too dark, and also showed them the storehouse, and the places for the men to sleep the night through, the rivers, and the fields plowed up to hinder the advance of a foe.

"The ground is very rich, burned up by some recent fire that once passed through here," Gertrude said. "If a fire would ever come upon us here...."

"Ah but I have a good plan to prevent that," Gertrude said, "And I did carry it out. See if you can tell what it is."

Neither of the boy and girl scout officers could imagine or dream. "First when I described the place to you I told you that there was a big stream or river with a smaller one running into it, and I thought that this last would be very useful. I had examined all the burned over ground very carefully, and I discovered that the small stream ran for some distance between the slight rises of ground which narrow in sharply to each other just below our newly found fortification. Now I found that a temporary dam of not more than fifty feet wide and eighteen feet high or more if possible would form a sort of large body of water a quarter of a mile long and about sixty feet wide. From this the water would flow over the whole flat due to the river in front of our fortified home and away to the left and will cause our lands to remain moist. That will prevent any danger of a blaze coming upon us. My boys had entered with great enthusiasm in our scheme and many of them had gone to work at the spot where I had wished the dam to be formed. I had not the slightest doubts that if the earth was properly puddled or stamped when wet that it would prevent the water from coming through too soon. It had been accomplished most excellently when it grows lighter to morning I'll show it to you."

"There is one point very important point connected with this new spot which had been absolutely forgotten or neglected, do you understand what that is?" demanded Penrod.

Gertrude, Angelina and the others glanced at each other in great perplexity, and in vain endeavored to think of any important omission. Then Gertrude suddenly said:

"I know what you mean Penrod."

"What is it?"

"You mean," said Gertrude, "our new place which is temporarily has not been given any name. I suggest that we fix upon one at once. Now what name shall we all give it.....?"
 The suggestions made indeed were very many but no one agreed to them. At last Mad Angelina said,:

"I have heard that there is in America a city called Chicago, though I cannot tell what part of America it is in. Now what do you say to calling it Chicago Fort? It's a nice name and it'll be a very pleasant place to remain until the barricade north of us passes."

The approbation of the suggestion was general and amid great cheering it was settled, that the fortified home and grounds should be called "Chicago Woods." Gertrude then told of how the dam had been prepared. That morning the boys had been steadily at work at eighteen wheelbarrows, for which which had been made out of wheels and iron work, and fifty of the boys and men had went down to the stream and toiled hard to strip off the turf and to dig out a strip of ground eighty five feet wide along the line where the dam (what a name) was to come. The ditch was then walled and puddled... when the barrows were completed, they had been brought into the work, and so many hundreds had been toiling that in ten hours a dam had been raised at least seven feet high, six feet wide at the top and sixty feet wide at two inches. In the middle of it, as Gertrude explained a space of two feet wide was left through which the little stream was allowed to continue to run. Two posts with grooves in them were set driven in one on either side of this, and thus the work was finished. A small sluice had been put at the entrance to this to regulate the quantity of water allowed to flow and then the boys had been progressed in closing up the dam. A great quantity of earth was first collected and made wet as possible and piled on the top of the dam and on the slopes by its side so as to be in readiness, and Gertrude had often watched the operation. Gertrude explained how a number of boards four feet long, and cut to fit the grooves, had been slipped down into them forming a solid wall and then upon the upper side of those the padded ground had been thrown down into the stream, many of the boys standing below into the water, and pounding down the earth with rammers.

The success as she explained to Penrod had been complete, for it only took a few hours before the tap in the dam was filled up, and they had had the satisfaction of seeing the little stream finally overflow into its tanks and widening at above out above, while not a drop of water made its escape by the old channel.

Gertrude promised Penrod to show it to him the next morning. That evening before taps the boys had started in forming the channels, and others were getting some large cloths and some more shovels. This occupied them till the time for the taps came. "I thought it was not sounded because they didn't want to attract the enemy by any unnecessary sound, and indeed a bugle would surely be a startling, alarming. The girls had tried even then their first experiment at better with the first churn that was finished and the result had been more satisfactory than expected though it took four hours to make it. During the night before taps Hans, expressed his deep desire to leave on a scouting tour and as Gertrude and her officials had determined to lessen their dangers—she offered no objection to his purpose. Therefore he went out, but later came back saying the enemy was very quiet.

From what Gertrude had learned all Christian generals had been rather uneasily surprised at George Andrews the Yankee having remained so long in the Abbeysman service, as the war had plainly stated to general Vivian, and even to Violet, and her sisters, when first engaged that he thought it likely that he should not fix himself as he expressed it for many weeks. However he had stayed on for over fifteen months, and had a fancy to all the boys and girlscouts he had come in contact with, and was still now interested in the brave little girls, whose Abbeysman ways and suavity character and their strange and yet fanciful language had been very strange and interesting to him after so many years wandering in many countries as a solitary way. He was a man of very few words, using only such as were necessary to necessity, and his answers when obliged to speak were as brief as possible. This habit of taciturnity was they found out acquired from a long life passed either alone or amid dangers and dangers where an unnecessary sound might have cost him his life. To the child scouts however he would break his habitual rule of silence.

He had had in his earlier life many experiences with the Glandelinians, and when Gertrude had asked him "But of all the near escapes that you have had which was the most dangerous?" he had never had for which do you believe was the most dangerous. He had been shot of near being killed. "The war had considered for some time in silence. He turned his plug of tobacco tobacco in his mouth expectantly and two or three times he was how custom when thinking and then had answered:

"You have asked me a question, little girl, which is very difficult for me to answer. I've been so near being wiped out each hundreds of times that it sure is not an easy job to say which was my worst experience. In thinking it over I frequently conclude sometimes, that one experience so near dying, sometimes that another, it ain't no more easier to say now. In my younger days little girl, I had been in Indian Wars in the United States, and in the Philippines. Oh, Indians are terrible fighters and fierce and maybe you have heard of them 'Glandelinians'?"

"Yes," he had answered. "Well the Indians and Philippines are gentle little things compared to your foes the Glandelinians. But I believe that at the time I never felt so much that my time for giving up the most and come when I was wounded near Hendrick Junction at the battle of Cedarline."

"And how was it you were in that battle?" asked Gertrude. "I was in general Anderson's army when the enemy came there. I've never in my life heard of or seen such a frightful conflict. It was as if two hosts of hell and the evilly creatures of heaven and earth were fighting that great battle that comes just before the end of the world. I saw the Christians came off with colors flying."

"Could you give us a detail of the battle or the experience you were in?" "No, but I could tell you of my way of getting in the army."

"It would be a long story, to tell it out," the Yankee said. "All the better for Gertrude," said "at least all the better as far as I'm concerned—if you do not mind the late time, and tell it."

"For your sake I don't mind a little late time," the Yankee answered. "I'll just tell it over and find where I'm to begin."

There was then a few minutes or so of silence, and then the young girlscout leader composed herself and comfortably for a good long sitting and then George Andrews began his story.

About fifteen months back I joined the army, then not as a soldier but just to serve a little and see what the war was, and which side was the right not realizing then that your country was such a holy one. I first thought of joining the Glandelinians, but hearing so much of their method of warfare, that they were and all the other details, I shrank from the idea as I would from a long position and knowing it is such. My mother used to always tell me to watch my step before I do anything. I obeyed her warning. At first I did not intend to join any regular up and down fighting, though I had then seen some of the most severe battles of that first year, especially Delilah's battle and Evangelina's battle. But I was always in a mischief, and a mischief here and there keeping one's eye always open, for man woman and child hated all Glandelinians live poison, and it was little mercy any Glandelinian a stranger might expect if he was suspected as a Glandelinian when going through any town and was caught away from his friends. The Glandelinian raiders and soldiers half robbers did you see Christians more harm than the regular Glandelinian soldiers, and mercy was never given or expected between them and us. He and John Stanley had joined together, and worked together. We had fought with the Indians out on the American prairies for years side by side, and yet never saw the fiercest Indians as these Glandelinians were. They were not possessed persons would not be as dangerous. We enlisted into your armies as scouts, that is we made the agreement to fight every now and then as much as we ourselves desired to fight and to be on in front as scouts in which way we had many little skirmishes on our own account, but we didn't wear any uniform, or do drill, which couldn't then have been expected of us. We should not even had been as good as any regulars, and yet every one now there were no better scouts in general. I was more than my companion and myself. I never what a fellow my companion was, but he was a real fighting man, means, I'm strong enough to lift a hundred pound weight with one arm strength, but I was a mere baby by comparison to him. He was six feet seven inches and so broad that he sure appeared to be short unless you saw him by the side of another man. I used to believe he was the strongest man in the world, until I saw him compared to General Hanson, Jacob Baldwin, Jack Evans, and Walter Starring.

I have heard George Andrews went on nodding "Of that famous man called Samson, it was said he was a very strong man indeed. I never came across any one who have rightly been compared to him but a good many have spoke of him, but I believe Samson would be no match for that Jack Evans. I should have desired to have seen him and Evans in the grips. I expect Evans would have filled him with astonishment. My companion James his name is came from Missouri most of our own big chaps do. I shouldn't have wondered what Samson did if he ever had wrestled with Evans, though I never had seen it and besides that he was too far back. I'd give anything for to have seen that Samson go ahead with the jawbone of an ass and give it to those called Glandelinians."

Gertrude had great difficulty to prevent herself from laughing at Andrew's idea of the subject of Samson with the jawbone of an ass fighting the Glandelinians. He however with a great effort steadied herself to say: "Samson died a great many years ago, Andrew. His story is in the Bible."

"I sure now he was and all that he did do. He carried away the huge gates of Gaza on his back. Of course I didn't depend on how big the gates were. He continued after remaining thoughtful for some time. "The gates down there were pretty heavy but I believe he could have got carried away two such as that as he sitting on top of them had there been two, that also did he do in you. He was bound in his heavy cords stronger than chains, and he broke them under. Gosh I wish he were here now. That he wouldn't do to those called Glandelinians."

Gertrude did not appear to attach much importance to this and inquired:

"What could he do to the Glandelinians, if we're having such difficulty with them ourselves."

"He destroyed thirteen hundred men with the jawbone of an ass."

"He killed—Barnabé—do?" asked Gertrude. "An' that wouldn't help us. There are millions of them in one small army."

"Would it be possible?" he was asked, and then turned in sheer amazement.

"He was placed sharply in a word; "You're making fun of me little girl. The Glandelinians can't be that lame as to fierce."

"No indeed," Andrews answered. "Gertrude said nobly. 'It is quite true. We are and that Samson did destroy over a thousand with the jawbone of an ass. I couldn't have been so. I should try to talk with the weapons these Glandelinian soldiers use. I hear they were all dead, and ever it would be a good job."

"Ah, it is good, Bob, with you friend. I might have been laded (in her mind) for the good" and she said "I should have known by your size, even snappd space have the Americans too with you. Good, put

"I have just had an expert, but his of course is Walter Starring he is a real one, much cleverer than you know." "Who have you got inside, John?" he asked. "I now I can tell you but for the million I won't tell them. Others whom I know them, and I don't want to be known by even by accident that I am here."

"The tent is empty," John said. "My director is out there in only my side-de-camp as you call it here. He can't do anything."

At this moment a man I shall say need not make his appearance, at the tent opening, and at a word from John took the three horses, while John signed to them to enter.

"Excuse me, sir," the English lad said. "We will go first to see that our horses are stalled. It is our custom always, and may never know when they may want them."

The girl smiled and then she said something to the side-de-camp, who nodded his head, and went off toward the rear of the tent (do not) the three leading their horses, and following him. The tables they observed were also tents but singularly large and well kept for tents of their size, and to their surprise instead of going to one of these tents, the boy led them to a tree.

"Ain't you going to see the station?" said the English boy.

He shook his head and tried to get the lad to understand and in his own mind (for he couldn't speak English) that they were full of nonsense. Being the boy didn't understand, and the others appeared not to believe, he moved them for proof. The three horses were then fastened to the trees, the boys and Starring putting the pistols from their holsters into their belts, and carrying their small rifles in their hands, entered the girls tent.

The girlhood received them very warmly, and she herself smiling as they entered the side-de-camp to get their horses and to eat, after which she and Bob began to tell him their story, and at first it really seemed as if they did not agree to do it, and request them to give up the plan as it was too dangerous. It was the work of the soldiers to do it. There was nothing but a girl for any of the boys at Walter Starring, a feeling, except that the girl promised not to tell the side-de-camp what they came for when they entered the tent, they felt convinced however that there could be some danger for them all if they were not watchful for Glandelinian patrols are dare devil enough to make an attack or raid upon the heart of a camp sometimes and here they were in a tent as close to the edge of the woods.

Even the girl was somewhat uneasy, and shortly made some excuse to leave the tent, and wander round about it, and the girls, her side-de-camp, and her three visitors. The boy had accompanied her and neither found anything to excite the smallest suspicion and therefore were content to return to the room of the tent, and one of the boys threw himself down for a desire to go off into a little sleep before the time for starting off, and in the interval he found that John and finally given up his plans, and that the delightful Jim was arranging with him to join him at the time proposed, for of course neither had any idea whether they would be successful in the mission or not. At five o'clock, Bob roused himself and a moment after the side-de-camp came into the tent with some memoranda.

As she was the first to receive the memoranda, Bob was obliged to refuse his offer as he wasn't just then thirsty, even in spite of the heat, when the tent covering was violently torn asunder and the entrance was entered with a violent exit and with suspicious faces. Five or six shots were fired into the tent without any effect and then a quietly a crowd of the men rushed into the room of the tent. As they appeared Walter Starring sprang up with the exclamation "Ain't you shot?" and then fell flat on his back (put in the sack) apparently shot, as the others believed through the hand. The boys rushed to get their own rifles and seized it, but before they had time to even fire, it was hurled from them. Half a dozen Glandelinians then threw themselves upon the two boys, and the girl and the side-de-camp, and they were prisoners even right within their own camp. They could see that there was no mistake, for the soldiers though they were purple were disguised as Glandelinians, and that to resist would be suicide. Therefore they did not show fight when the rascals laid hands on them, because they knew they would have to pay in them at once, and though they might be slain in a few hours after they were caught still upon the whole it was better to live those few hours as not.

Also there was such a clamor or hubbub and a shouting at first that the boys and girl could not hear a single word, but at last they understood they were a party of the band of Glandelinian soldiers under Colonel Ribbon, who scouting troop had been close by near the neighborhood, and had decamped upon the camp to make a raid. Much fun was made of the four child scouts by the Glandelinians for they knew why the three boys were there. Bob felt mad with grief for having been caught so foolishly.

The boy Bob could not feel angry with Jim but he was angry with himself for having come to be caught in a tent with a girl scout. While he was thinking this out in his mind he had his eyes fixed upon "Poor" Starring, whom no one except the four children thought of noticing, when all of a sudden he gave quite a start, for he saw him move. He couldn't see his face but he did see a hand stealing gradually outward toward the leg of a Glandelinian soldier who stood near. Then there was a slight pause, and then the other hand began to move. And it also was not at all like the aimless way the arms of a badly hit man would move, and he saw at once that Starring had been playing dead right along.

He realized he was just pretending to be dead. Bob held his breath, and so did the other scouts, for they saw now that Walter Starring had come to some conclusion they couldn't divine, but nevertheless he was up to some strange move. In another minute there was a sudden and shocking crash, and shouts, curses, and blasphemies as the two soldiers nearest to Starring fell heavily to the ground with their legs knocked clean from under them. They tried to stop themselves from falling but caught hold of two other men and dragged them down with them. During the confusion Starring suddenly leaped to his feet and made a desperate rush for the tent door. The nearest purple coat with a curse tried to grapple with him, but Starring's heavy iron fist took the man squarely under the chin, and he went down sprawling over the cot, with all his front teeth knocked out and his chin broken.

Another Glandelinian rushed at him but he nicely caught him up as if he were a little baby doll, and hurled him against four others, who were going at him bringing them on the floor of the tent together in a confused heap, and leaping over them, dashed through the door as after he grabbed the four child scouts forcing them to come with him, all this before the Glandelinians had recovered from their astonishment. The boys could have laughed out loud at the yell of rage and amazement with which the rebels set off when starting in pursuit, but Starring warned the boys to be quiet. A Glandelinian who was standing outside aimed his rifle at Starring. But Starring grasped the rifle and struck him down over the head with its butt. Two others made for Starring, and died for it. Another on horseback rode at Starring and tried to jab him in the side with his sabre, but Starring had that same hand in a jiffy, and he let go with his wrist or hand almost twisted off. He then felled the horseman with a blow from the sabre. Starring wild with fury turned upon some others and brought them down with the same sabre. The boys and the little girl surely did feel mighty glad to see Starring was alive, and so glad that he hardly remembered that he wasn't to be long or they would be long either if recaptured, but nevertheless no fierce was the attack of the Glandelinians that it was evident he could escape. The Glandelinians threw themselves furiously upon Starring. The nearest man Starring cut by the throat with both hands, choking him so hard that his face was contorted and his tongue protruded nearly all the way out, and though the crowd of rebels who threw themselves upon him pulled him finally to the ground, he never let go but brought the strangling man down too on to of him. The boys were quite mad to join in and help too and they did as best as they could. For a while they lay struggling on the ground, and then Starring shook himself free of them for a moment and got to his feet. A dozen other men were upon him for in a moment, but he was blind with rage and would not have minded it if they had been a thousand or more. Those who came in front went down as if shot from the blows of his fists, but others leaped on him from behind, and then the desperate struggle went on again. The boys and the girl never saw such a desperate fight before, and never probably would again.

It was downright awful, fearful. They could not hold his arms. He raved and roared as if he was a lion. Their weight over and over again got him upon the ground, and over and over again he was up on his feet, but his arms they could not hold, and the work he did with them was terrible awful beyond believing. Anything he hit he hit went down never to get up again, and when he could not hit he gripped or kicked. When he got a strangle hold upon a man, that man was soon dead. It was like a lion with fighting with enraged leopards, he caught them by the throat, and when he did it was all up with them. None of the Glandelinians made a grab for bayonet or dagger but they had no time to use them. They swung their rifle butts at him he had these in his hands and dashed out brains with them but smothering the gun too with the force of the blows he hit. In a moment their eyes would seem to start from their heads, their tongues protruded, and then as they were hurled away they fell in a dead lump. How long this went on it is hard to say—some fifteen twenty minutes. No one but Evans or Starring could fight so many armed men this way, but Starring because of his strength never thought of or stopped to think of the odds or chances when his fury was up. In less than another man there was the sound of scattering shots, and a party strong party of Abyssinian illans had come up but the fight was over, the others had surrendered to their former prisoner, but stood glancing at him as if he was some terrible devil, and no one. Thirty seven Glandelinians lay dead on the ground and many more were lying panting and bleeding around, and those who survived and surrendered showed marks of the desperate fight. All Abbieannians were active races of men, many were strong even as if they were average Americans—but Starring was a Giant among men, and in his rage and hatred of Glandelinians he seemed to have ten times his natural strength. When the big squadron of Abyssinians came up and the remaining Glandelinians were secured, Starring never moved, and except giving orders to the men not to destroy the prisoners but this time give these men at least quarter, he stood with a defiant smile on his lips.

At the ending of the fight there had been one Glandelinian who escaped and made a dash round to the tent stables, where he had found seven or eight Abbieannians taking care of the horses, that he had struck down one of them who was in his way, had leaped upon the nearest animal which had been Bob's, and made off at the top of his speed, but a dozen Abyssinians had been after him in an instant, and seeing that he would be hanged and thrown from his horse he had stopped and thrown up his arms in terms of surrender. His hands had been then bound tightly behind him, and he was led back to where the ten other prisoners were.

Starring then gave a loud laugh when he saw the surprised boys glancing at him so stupidly, and amaze and said:

"You boys seem surprised at my method of fighting. Don't you like it. That was a Samson strick wasn't it Colonel?" so the officer in charge of the squadron. "If those Glandelinians had carried to children of you'd have been dead before you say a nother camp, but I couldn't resist the temptation either when I saw those fellows legs moving about me just as if I were a log of wood. The thought then had come across me 'A good sharp blow above the ankle and over they'll go' and when I once thought of it I was obliged to do it to save you children from being murdered. It was fun though to fight that way. I wouldn't give the survivors any quarter either 'the finished with a scowl as black as a thunder cloud' if it wasn't that I might grill and torture some information out of them."

"It was as you say some trick all right," said the colonel. "But don't say anything we don't want overheard general, some of those fellows may understand and if they succeed in escaping would warn their army generals." "Right you are colonel. I am sorry boys, and you too Joan that we had to get into this scrape but I expected we would get out of it somehow and we did. They didn't reckon with my strength. I'm not going to let any of my friends be wiped out."

The boyscouts had hoped this too before Starring had made his move. They are brave too, but not tired of life, but at first before Starring showed fight they had not seen any way out of it. However they had had one comfort when they observed his cautious movement, and understood that if any strong man could get them out of an ugly mess, it was Starring.

With a scowl on his face Starring told the prisoners who were bound with their hands at least, behind them to sit on the ground in half circle, three of the red coated soldiers taking up their position by their sides, and two at each of the circles end. There was a moment's discussion as to what would be done, which was not pleasant for the Glandelinians to listen to. The Abyssinians swore in favor of hanging them at once, but Starring wouldn't have it for he desired to bring them to the main body of the cavalry under general El Zeres of Gertrude's strong bodyguard for her regiment, and have them grilled later on for information, and also to find out the reason of the raid and attempted kidnapping...

He too had frequently vowed vengeance against all Glandelinians trying to do harm to any children, and as he understood what Glandelinians would do to child scouts who were known as the head of the christian army he had vowed very solemnly to his patron saint that he would protect them all with his life, for all children captured by the enemy would always go through unheard of and unbelievable tortures, and as the Glandelinians celebrated captures that way so Starring never felt like showing mercy either.

The Glandelinians however who were kept red seemed to put a good face on the matter, for it would never have done for them to let the Abbieannians see that they, Glandelinian soldiers, who had fought so fiercely in battle were afraid to die when their time came.

Joan had stood still for quite a long time, and she looked to the boys as if she was an uncommon pretty little girl. She now came straight up to the Glandelinian prisoners and looked them full in the face. The others paid no attention to her, but the officer non added with a scowl.

"Well signora child, so you Christian pig dogs were always making fools of us Glandelinians, after all, and are trying to learn the mystery of what happened to Abbieannians. Well I ain't the first soldier, that's been fooled by a pretty little christian poodle dog, that's one comfort any how. I suppose you believe the discovery of that mystery would bring the end of the war to your favor, eh?" and he laughed.

"You dirty Glandelinian dog!" the little girlscout said, her eyes flashing with furious rage. "Did you think that you could capture us with that big good protector we had. We are Abbieannians, and we hate you Glandelinians as you're all vipers." and she stamped her little foot with passion.

The Glandelinian officer who was a lieutenant laughed with great unconcern. "Well, signora child of the Christian dogs, after what you permit me now to see of you, I am really thankful that you are so kind and lenient. Thunder of thunders, what a fate yours would have been, and your boy companions if we had succeeded in bringing you to the Glandelinian camp. I overheard your conversation in that tent in passing by, and that is why we tried to capture you. If it was not for that big dog with a scowl at Starring, we'd have succeeded. You were to capture some one in our lines with important dispatches. You babes in woods are dirty spies and your giant is your bloodhound."

There was a general growl among the men at the cool but insulting way in which the prisoner treated the girlscout, and the enraged girl herself struck him a blow on the ear with the narrow part of the handle of her riding whip. It was a hard one, and it made a wound which bled but the lieutenant's face hardly changed, and he said still smiling:

"We have a custom in the Glandelinian States little wildcat, that when a girlscout of the christian dogs boxes a mans ears, he has a right to give her a blow in return. If my hand was wasn't tied, I'd had you a wallop that would stretch you out there on the ground."

There was again a roar of growls among the red coats at this, and the enraged girlscout drew a small scabbard, and would have stabbed the Glandelinian to the heart, had she not suddenly changed her mind as was her way, but she said:

"Very well you insult me coolly but I'll repay you when the time comes. We girlscouts are fiercer than you Glandelinians are and we'll prove it. Men bring them to camp, and the one who is responsible for their escape, will be discharged from the army in disgrace whether it be a soldier or any of the boy or girlscouts. Away with them."

Indeed these Glandelinians were kept in a large tent under a guard so watchful, that any escape or thought of escape would have been a great miracle. It's impossible usually to escape from the Abbieannians, though you may sometimes succeed in doing so from the Glandelinians.

At the exact hour appointed by Gertrude, for the trip to be made, by the boys and Starring, the horses were then saddled, and they were soon off, the three boys, and Joan, Starring riding in the midst of the little party, with his eyes watching everything as closely as a cat does. They had found out from the conversation that general Tamerlins army was only about thirty one miles distant. Upon their ride, Starring himself found an opportunity for the first time since the desperate fight with the enemy patrol for a talk with the boys...

"What do you imagine of this proposed expedition, Bob."

"It ought to be a success."

"What do you think of these Glandelinians overharing us as the lieutenant conferred?"

"Loo's bad general," Bob said. "If any one of them escape, they'd come hastily to camp and warn their officers of our intentions, and we'd be caught sure. And if we are captured, we'd be made prisoners as spies, or even thieves as they call us, and I expect they'd make short work of us. If we can get through we shall be able to follow the plan through to morrow morning. If we are to succeed though it must be to night."

"To night," said Starring scornfully. "Of course we are going going to succeed to night with God's help. The question is though, how are we going to enter the Glandelinian camp, and which way into the camp are we to choose?" and he laughed merrily.

"I don't quite see any way to get in yet," said Jim himself, "however we shall see what sort of a place we could put in for to night near the fence camp, and then can come to some conclusion as what to do. We could pretend to act as some bad persons, and we might get in easy. They'd even welcome us. You could act as a drunken man and we are your children."

"O, wicked as they are, they had hate drunken persons as a snake. We must think of something else," said Starring. "There comes the forest fire now. We must watch sharp now that it does not reveal us out of season."

It was about eight o'clock when they approached within sight of the Glandelinian camp, and as they approached within sight of it, which too a part was revealed by the distant reflection of the fires glare, they could have declared that a far better place against a sudden surprise could hardly have been chosen. They halted. The ground beyond the forest was flat for many miles, but the upper side of the series of huge camps rose or was builded on a slight mound of nearly circular form, and perhaps for fifteen thousand yards across and beyond, and the central part was as forty feet or so above the general level. The main camps extended as far as eye could detect in the night. There was all the assemblage of military order for the bundles of materials and other camp equipment showed that it was evident that the men because of the heat of the weather slept on the outside. In the center of the circle of upper camps upon the highest point of the rise, was a small country house.

Within the lines of small shaded or half concealed camp fires the horses of officers were picketed in rows. As they approached most cautiously, they could see a slight stir in camp, a party of men were mounting their horses as if for an expedition.

"I hope though they're on the point of starting somewhere Bob said, "that they won't head toward our camp or that they are too great a hurry to stop to amuse themselves with going anywhere in particular toward us; for it's otherwise upset our plans."

"I hope so," Jim said. "It's hard if we don't manage to succeed in the next twenty-four hours."

On coming as close as they dared they alighted.

"If we're captured we'll be quite celebrated characters," Joan said. "We have to watch out."

"Ah," said Bob, "we could do without such celebrity at present."

"Yes, from then at least. If they caught us they'd cut our throats at once, but they would also retain us, for a ceremonial murder."

As they were thus conversing, they saw an officer go toward the house, which was evidently the abode of some general. One other officer was standing at the door, tapping his riding boot impatiently with his whip, a man was holding his horse in readiness. One of the other leaders was saying something to him.

"Jehoshaphat," said Starring, "that officer is going out. If we could capture him on some pretence."

Who ever it was, Starring could see with the help of his glasses that the man was a slight wiry fellow, with a small desperate looking eye, which gave one the "squerm" to look at, and a thin mouth curved up in a cruel smile. The officer with him was a tall swarthy ferocious appearing man. But neither of them was Tamerlane. Starring looked at the four scout children for sometime without a word. Then he said:

"We've got near the enemy camp at last. But how we are going to enter is the next question."

Bob and the others only gave a knowing nod but did not say a word.

Suddenly they heard one of those men say:

"I must go forth now to reach Tamerlane. Clear my things out. Select twenty picked men and don't let any one in or out of my house or headquarters until I return. I shall not be back for before tomorrow morning. I shall amuse myself this evening with the thought of how far a christian army might be from from me. I'll bet they're all afraid of Tamerlane. Ha, ha. I promise you all a handsome reward of some sort anyhow."

And he rode off.

All boy and girls scouts had often faced death and were not afraid of it; thousands had died, but the unruffled face and the cruel smile of that man made the flesh of these four creep on their bones.

"And now," said Starring, "it's getting late, and we must try to do some thing. It's safer to enter at night than at day. I now the way to Glandelinian headquarters, as I have the directions from Princess Violet. I haven't gone through such an experience for years. But I'll promise we'll succeed. Very warm would be the than s of all of them to God if they were to succeed on this dangerous mission, and great was the whispered discussion among themselves that arose as to how they could enter without facing a most terrible predicament."

THE GLANDELINIAN CAUTIONMENT UNDER TAMERLINE.
A DREADFUL OUTRAGE! THE FLIGHT, EIGHT DOWN.
RETURNING UNDER THE ARABIAN FLAG. A DASHING EXPEDITION.
CHAPTER XXIV.

AFTER this Glandelinian, officer, had ridden off, the lieutenant himself could be seen by Starring to select about ten soldiers from the men around, for pretty well the Glandelinians had appeared in a great crowd, and told them in the first place to clear the house of the ham oak and other belongings of the general and when this way was done to guard it so no one enters. Bob had sat down on the ground near Starring watching carefully, and closely. He could hear the Glandelinian lieutenant giving extra orders to some of the men outside, to remove the horses to some other spot, and for the rest to go down to their own tents and retire for the night, as "Glandelinian tape" would soon be sounded. Then he entered the house with four other men. As the children and Starring could see the house was just an ordinary farm house, though it was of considerable size.

How many room it contained they couldn't tell, but there were quite a number of windows on all sides. The front of the structure however did not seem to have any regular windows for some reason or other. The house was not built of wood as ordinary farm houses were, but of gray stone (de bone) and was about two stories and one half.

Never in their lives did they feel that the game would be up if they were discovered, as they did feel when they saw there and glanced around. There was a group of Glandelinians seated on the ground just within a stone's throw of them, and in full view of Starring, and the child scouts, and one of them was on guard and jangling up and down. Dangerous as the situation was for them they never theless had an uneasy doubt of what they might do. Walter Starring lay at full length on the ground, or a quarter of an hour no one said a word, as they thought it best to lay there and try to get cooled off a bit, and Bob thought and thought, but he couldn't for the life of him fix upon any plan of getting anywhere within the Glandelinian camps. At last Jim thought he would stir Starring up.

"How did you feel about this general?" Jim whispered.

"I feel as if I had walked a hundred miles right on end," said Starring.

"How?"

"Why it seems we're being fools again, sure enough. As all is quiet I'll just take a sleep for a few hours, and then we'll see about this business. And—"

"Hello there," some one shouted. "Bring me some water."

For a time no one seemed to pay any attention to that call, but he continued to shout, and some one else started to join him, so that several others came up but raising Cain because they had been disturbed from their sleep. One of them brought a canteen filled it with water from a water supply wagon, and placed it down between some of the men, and then went to their pillows. The boys, Joan and Starring had made themselves as comfortable as they could under the circumstances, (if circumstances will allow before of forest fire hot weather, night and day) which was not saying much, and in a short time all except Jim were asleep, for they had only been four hours in bed for three nights.

Being in the army for over two years even before the war, and now so long in it since the war had come on they were pretty well accustomed to sleeping on the ground, and though they tried just the same they couldn't get a wink of sleep, and when Bob did finally almost get to sleep for several minutes he would then awaken suddenly and at first believe it was nearly sunrise, because the eastern sky was so aglow with glow. Yet it was from the fires.

Of course for the boy it was not an agreeable waking, that, for with lying on the hot ground he felt as if his shoulders were out of joint, and that he had two bands of red hot irons around his wrists and hands. His first move was to rub the circulation back into his wrists and then take a drink from his canteen. Then he sat up and glanced around. Walter Starring was sitting up looking at him and the other two.

"So you are still awake eh Bob. Couldn't sleep I know."

"Yes," said the boy, "everything still all right general."

"Everything is as it should be my son," said Starring in his ordinary cheerful tone, "Except that I feel as if I had been lying down on a landscape some distance near the fires of Hell."

"That is about the same way as I feel," said Bob. "I don't mind the heat so much. 'Tis the danger of the fires that always bothers me. It it shall be such a time before we can do anything as the fire light might reveal our motions."

"We needn't bother about that general," said Jim also rising on his elbow. "Any how it isn't far to go."

"I hope it isn't as risky as I fear it is," said the aide-de-camp. "At any rate we traveled a good thirty miles this afternoon. Now we must get in."

"My feet are cramped from lying on this hot ground" said Starring. "I'll be some time before I can move."

"You needn't bother about that general" said Jim. "It isn't much more tramping your feet have got to do."

"I hope they'll be able to do more than they've ever done yet," said Starring. "At any rate they've got a longer distance to do if we're seen."

"Are you in earnest General?"

"Never more so," said Starring. "All we've got to do is get those dispatches, from Mr. Gingsore and then tramp it away."

"How do you mean to find him General?"

"Easy enough," said Starring carelessly. "Get into the camp first, then destroy one of the picket guards that opposes us. I can rely on my strength more than weapons. Then we can do a funny stunt."

Suddenly from some where among some of the glandelinians (for glandelinians too have humor) there came the sound right out loud as if from some hymn book. When one began another began, and it was followed suit by many others until the uproar was tremendous. The boys and girls of course did not understand what the glandelinians were laughing at, but it sounded very funny to hear them all laughing at once and in different tones and paws. Just as even made the boys Starring and Joan even stuff handkerchiefs into their mouths to keep from laughing too was that other glandelinians who had been asleep were so startled and that they seized their rifles and rushed to the spot, and seeing it was only their own comrades they then also had to join until an officer came riding up ordering them not to make such noise at this time of night, or the christians will be down upon them all. The nearness of the glandelinians and the christians of the sentries underfoot friends terribly uneasy. When all was still Starring said: "I'm thinking of some plan." "How General Starring?" said Joan, tell us what you have planned, that if it is in if our really downright in earnest."

"In earnest," said Starring almost angrily. "Of course I'm in earnest. Do you think we're going to fail, Violet, and her sisters or Gertrude were sent when we were sent out to get something very important. Of course if we glandelinians do capture us we'd be killed and frizzled. No it's just as you wished, we must get our hands on those dispatches, if we have to destroy everybody in our way to get into the glandelinian camp... General!!!!!!"

"But how are we going to get into the glandelinian camp... General!!!!!!"

"That is the only point I can't make out," he said.

"How?"

"If there were not so many sentries on duty it would be easy enough, and if there was enough high grass we could crawl through to the enemy's lines in a minute, but there isn't any and we can't do that. So allow them to bring us in as vagabonds would be dangerous any how. Just try and think over some plan boys. The four children did think it over on it, but they did not could, not see any way of getting through, into the enemy's lines. Once through, the rest would be possible enough, and it's easier to escape again by the rear, and flank than by the enemy front. Besides if they each could get hold of the enemy rifles, and take them by surprise, the rest could get fairly on their feet four or five or half a dozen before the rest could get fairly on their feet they had little doubt that they could easily manage the rest, because this picket squad was far from the lines. If successful in annihilating them the way would be clear (for beer)."

Or no doubt every one but these sentries might go so to sleep as it got to be later in the night, to cause more darkness and lack of campfires, and it then would be possible they could pass them without making a row. If that was also hoped for they sure could crawl through the enemy line, and find, Mr. Gingsore. Yet too it was straightforward enough, if they could but get possession of five big handy heavy rifles. As Jim was thinking it over his eyes fell upon a little brook near him. An idea came across him.

"I don't know Starring that it would do to wet up our clothes so that we be soaked through, and then start a fire that'll go through toward the enemy's line. Then in the confusion we could slip through, even in spite of the fire and get into the camp somehow. That would be something, eh Starring?"

"And we'd be guilty of a forest fire too," said Starring. "Nothing doing. That's a foolish idea. If it were to save ourselves it might be all right, but it won't work just to enter a camp. But we can wet ourselves ourselves for a case of emergency."

They shuffled by turn into the stream, and went in far enough so they were fairly under water. The water being cold cool relieved them somewhat, from the terrible heat, for the water was somewhat cold. They felt a little remaining in for some time to remain cool. They however agreed it was no use to try and enter the camp by sending a fire down upon it to cause confusion, as it might only make matters worse, for them if they were caught. They remained laying in the water thinking over what was the next thing to do, and talking it by turns to keep their eye on the glare of the fire, for it was feared it would reveal them to the enemy in the creek.

They agreed among themselves that it was of no use, and then sat thinking over what they should try to do, and taking it by turns to cool the themselves by the water. However they did not hardly give up any hope, and indeed they prayed ardently for success in their undertaking, and then too they agreed to agree that they must try at whatever the cost, in the short intervals between the meeting of the sentries, to try and get through the pickets and into the camp. It was sure possible anyhow, if they could only see the points, for they ought to be able to slip through seeing that a lot of smoke was hiding the glare of the forest fires, and that there was no moon or stars.

Suddenly a new idea struck Joan (not with a club) he squeezed herself back against a tree, and leaned against it.

"It's all right friends and comrades," she said. "We are as good as in."

"How's that?" demanded Starring.

"There is a thick clump of trees extending through into the camp at the left sir, and there is plenty of foliage on the ground between them. We could worm our way through there sir like we were snakes."

"Hoorah, the Christian dogs can't lick the army," shouted some one within the sound of pickets, with a yell that startled all the nearest sleeping glandelinians, and the christian scouts as well, and then he commenced thundering at one of the songs which glandelinian soldiers always sing on the march, and the song was so full of such shocking blasphemous words that the four child scouts and Starring were horrified. Starring looked to just get his fingers on that singer's throat. Several more glandelinian officers came riding up to see if anything was the matter, the same yell and the loud song having reached their ears. They were told it was only one of those "mad fools" who can't keep his mouth shut at night, that he had just come in with a spree on, and with many angry threats of the different sort of yells he would give before the Court Marshall the next day for disorderly conduct, and with the orders to arrest him and put him in the guard house, they snatched off again.

"Some of those darn glandelinians must be possessed with devils," Starring said to Joan, when the noise was stopped and the man was being led away. "If any sound of the 'little fight' we're going to have with the guards there reaches the camp they'll now put it down to some other glandelinians making noise just for amusement."

"By this time with the glare being hid entirely away by heavy clouds of smoke it had become perfectly dark, and one of the sentries lighted a fire near the pickets. A pile of wood had been brought forward for the purpose, and when the smoke had abated somewhat, the sentries were then being changed. Every three or four minutes some of the men would even bring forth a lighted brand and come a little way into the woods to see if all was clear, and that there were no christian spies scouting; on them and being satisfied that there was no one, they went back.

"What time shall we begin?" Joan asked.

"In another hour or so," he said. "Let's see it's only seven now. Maybe we'll try it by eight."

"Will it be safe then. They'll change guards once more and pickets too. They do it every half hour," said Bob.

"Yes, but those who are the sitting pickets will be gambling and quarreling round one of the camp fires by eight o'clock, and the noise, and the talk, the shouting, a hooting of the owls and other cries, and the noise of the horses will prevent them hearing anything here. We must not think of going forth however for two hours later, and then even all the camp won't be asleep as it's so dark and so hot that who can sleep. But of course we cannot dare put it off till later, or we'll be delayed too much and it's then or never."

"Let's arrange our plans for good," Jim said. "And then we can each worm our way through to them. When I am ready to go to start, I will give the meow of a cat, and then you do the same when you are ready. We had better do that before very long, for it'll be a long warming of it before we'll reach any open space between the guards. We'll go as carefully as we can, but we can't do that anywhere but through the woods. However when you are quite ready, meow quiet gently, and the others of us will answer in the same way if we are ready. Then we will remain quiet, till the two guards within our view meow at their backs and pass the moment they've gone out of sight, we'll creep forward, and choose a time when the camp fires are burning low. You creep beside me and we'll go where the enemy rifles are piled. We must then open the pump action the cartridge belts, and throw all the powder out of the pans and the other things and when that is done each take a hold of a rifle and if they see us and start at us we'll hit. No you Starring, and you others quite understand and agree."

"Quite indeed," Bob said. "Is there anything else?"

"Yes," said Bob. "You take a through the recon first, and we'll follow in. You can see now are our Ramon. We of course must try our best to keep them from coming with us to reach to use their knives or axes but if either of us are hard pressed he must call and the others must come to help them."

"All right my dear children. I don't do to be at work."

"So do we," said Jim.

"And now don't let's talk any more," said Joan. "Shut your eyes, and remain quiet until I meow."

Soon the glandelinian pickets were heard talking themselves but in low tones, though nevertheless loud enough to be heard, and they were talking over

The foods and other services they had been engaged in, and of what many of the Glandelinian armies had been doing throughout the war zone, and so involving and cold blooded were the unparalelled atrocities, of which they heard of their armies had committed, that Starring longed for the time when his Christian armies would fall upon them in half an hour. Joan gave the signal. She had picked out a sharp stone which she had been accidentally sitting on and she threw it toward the Glandelinians hitting one of them on the side of the head so hard that he went down without a sound. Rob found his hands were completely numbed by the way he had been lying, but he did not let a long time before the circulation, however it must have been a good half hour before Walter Starring heard the signal from Rob or Joan. As he had suspected, the meeting of the sentinels were less frequent now than before believing the plots should do the most of it no doubt. Fortunately the din and the talk among the players was now loud and incessant, which enabled the five to creep onward. Starring was crawling in the lead, and then lying pretty high on his belly soon reached the spot where the rifles were stacked. The camp fire was burning low and the Glandelinian night owls as they were called were sitting idly around one of them so that everything was in black shadow, so that though Starring was watching out for the safety of his of the child scouts, yet he didn't see them until they were close enough to touch him.

It was a delicate task in dead of opening the ammunition pans but the five of them did it without making as much noise as would scare a mouse, pounce, and then each grabbing a stacked rifle, by the barrel (maybe the barrel was full) they were ready in case while crawling through further they might be attacked. One of the Glandelinians was just telling a story, how when the advanced guard of the Glandelinian army was committing a fierce raid through a large town, and burning all before it, how he himself forced a very old woman and her husband to confess where his money and children were hid by torturing his elder daughter before his eyes, and how when none of them would give up, he fastened them up crucified life inside the house, and set the house afire, a story indeed which was relieved with shouts of approving laughter. This was too much for Walter Starring, he had heard and seen much of the cruelties of the enemy, and soon just as horrible massacres of children, may even worse and was about telling more shocking than Violet, and her sisters did. As the man finished telling of his horrible crime down came the butt of Walter's rifle, on the mans head with a cruel crunching sound, while Rob's did the same on the next man who had laughed the harshest. For an instant there was a pause of the greatest amazement for at that instant not of the Glandelinians could realize what had really happened, then there was a wild demonical yell and blasphemous cries of rage and fear, as the rifles of the two again came down with a crash, and a thud. All the other Glandelinians, there being thirty of them leaped to their feet, the Glandelinian Starring aiming his next blow at rolling over and over on the ground, and just escaping the blow by a mere margin.

Rob however was more lucky, and got his man just as he was rising. "Hoorah boys and Joan" Starring shouted, "Five down already out of thirty." Finally the five of them had to draw to the posts as agreed upon, and the Glandelinians fixing bayonets, made a rush forward but silently, no matter how cruel and wicked they are, or how much they hate our Lord of what their future would be if dead, the Glandelinians are by no means cowards, they're brave to dare devil recklessness. I will write that about them, and when these Omurian-Turmerannians found that five Christians attacked them, and knowing their responsibilities of not to allow any one to slip past their picket position, they fought most desperately.

If overcome the five knew there was no mercy to be expected from the Glandelinians. The Glandelinians with curses divided, and six immediately came each of the Christians. The boys and even Joan were strong for their age and could handle bayonet or their rifles as if they were men, and they each downed four of them as if they were shot, and Joan herself was whirling her rifle for another crushing blow, when she and her boy companions heard a crash, and then a shout from Starring:

"Help Joan, help boys."

The children saw at once what had happened. Walter's rifle, as he was aiming a blow at three men at one time had struck the branch of a popular tree over head, and the shooey though braying the branch at once had nevertheless made both the branch and rifle fly from his hands, and tree clear across the field. In another moment sixteen Glandelinians were upon them with their bayonets. He hit out wildly, and fired his pistols madly, but he got a slight stab across the forehead and another on the arm in a moment. The three boys and Joan made a stride across, and the Glandelinians who were attacking the children, in a stand of trying to prevent them from going to Starring's rescue made a rush to the spot (hot) where their rifles were stacked, which Joan and the boys had left unguarded. For the Glandelinians indeed, it was a most fatal mistake.

The guns of the three boys and the little girl came down upon the heads of five of Walter's assailants before they saw the approach of the children, and the others of his assailants were brought down before they had time to even defend themselves. As they moved from him, the remaining Glandelinians leveled their rifles at Starring, who had grabbed another rifle, and was also at the four children, and gave a cry as the fire fell and there was no report. For five minutes or two they fought most desperately with the butts of their guns, but it was of no use, and the fight because of Starring's strength was soon over, and the five stood masters and masters of this part of the field with thirty seven dead men around them. Every one was indeed killed for Starring had examined every one of them. The stocks of their guns had been broken with the first blow, and the rest had therefore been given with the iron and in no case had it ever been necessary for them to hit twice. The fighting had been scarcely over when they heard a number of men come running up from the direction of the enemy line and one of them yelled:

"Is there anything the matter boys. We thought we heard a fight."

"No nothing," said Starring imitating a voice of one of the men he had heard which he felt sure the Glandelinians would not recognize at that distance to be his own. "It's only these mad drummers yelling. They're not asleep." (Yes they're sleeping all right) The men were quite satisfied with hearing this for in a minute or two they heard their foot steps receding, and then all became become very still. Presently they glanced carefully around, and observed that many of the camp fires of the enemy had burned low, but around some of the others there still came sounds of laughing, singing and cursing, and voices as if in conversation.

"Another hour," said Starring, "and we hope they will be all asleep."

They saw to their surprise however that one of the Glandelinians was throwing some more wood on their camp fire. Starring however took some tobacco and cigarette paper from the pockets of one of the dead Glandelinians, and sat down to smoke comfortably. They were all plagues anxious, and did not even pretend they were either, for at any moment some Glandelinian officer followed by an escort of or retainers might arrive, and then if they were discovered it would be all up with them. At last they agreed to agree that they could not stand the suspense any longer, and made up their minds to go forth and sit down against one of the trees till it was safer to start out, and then if they heard horses coming in the distance they would start moving out at once. The Starring himself put on one of the uniforms of the dead soldier nearest him, and put his own on him, and the five of them each supplied themselves with a brace of pistols, a loaded rifle, and then waited.

There they sat (sat) for another hour until it was quiet enough throughout the camp to start about. Even then they could hear by the noise of conversation and cursing and some laughing that many of the men were still awake but they felt they could not dare to even think of waiting one minute longer for they felt sure it must be near nine or ten on the hour already.

They therefore made it a choice for the place where the fires had died down altogether, and where everything was quiet, and crawled along upon the ground, and they were soon down among the horses. They had been too long accustomed to this sort of experience to have a bit of fear about getting through these Omurian-Turmerannians, and therefore they crawled along, and whenever there was a sound, or the cry of the sentinel, or whenever a man moved and sat up a moment they would flatten themselves flat upon their faces, and wait until all was quiet again. As they crawled they almost very often came near touching a sleeping soldier, and once they did, and aroused him from sleep but he said in a sleepy manner:

"What time is it pard."

The Glandelinians here lay outside pretty close together, but as the five crawled along in the night they made no more noise than mice or rats. An hour and one half of this, and they were through the lines of sleeping men, and far enough on the outside of the main camps on the plain to be able to get up on their feet (de street) and start into a long stride. After twenty more minutes they started off into a run, for there was no more fear now of their steps being heard.

"We fooled them by heavens," Starring said. "Won't the Glandelinian officers curse when he sees thirty seven of his men so mysteriously laid out that way."

"Maybe he'll believe they fought among themselves and slew each other in a spreey rage," said Joan.

They might have been a smile and a half from this part of the Glandelinian camp when in the quiet night air they heard the howling of six dogs. Every one stopped as if they had been shot.

"Thunders, thunders" Starring exclaimed furiously "If we haven't forgotten the bloodhounds."

The four boys and the little girl knew what Starring meant indeed, for it was a well known and very often truthful boast of any of the enemy officers that no spy, scout or any one raiding the camps had ever escaped from them, for that their bloodhounds would track them to the end of the world wide. "There can only be one thing for us to do," said Jim thoughtfully "we must go find, and slay those dogs."

"Wait my children," Starring said "We don't know where the damned brutes are kept. They were no: any where near where we fought the guards to the death, and now we might waste two or three precious hours in even looking for them, and then maybe never find them and if we did they're dogs that cannot be wiped out without a dangerous fight."

"We must risk it Walter," said the girls out.

"Yes I suppose, because it is all up with us if we are suspected and those dogs are put on our track."

to shoot the first number number that comes up, and I only hope we don't shoot Glingiroe. We have a pistol and rifle each and can open upon them from ambush. Better do that by a long way, than be pulled to pieces with hot pincers, or ordered in other ways."

"A long way children" Starring said. "That is agreed then. When I give the word aim your pistol and fire, and be sure we don't waste a single shot. They killed one of us already and we'll get even."

The four now lay close in ambush. As the Glandelinians got to the place where the fugitives had got out, they could see them, pretty close, and in their suspense they held their breath, their weapons at the ready.

The Glandelinians did not pause, however, but went on--another minute passed and they were sure the Glandelinians had passed the spot.

"Bayed. Thank God, and his blessed Mother" Starring said, and they turned and went off at a steady trot. They hoped they could continue for hours.

"How long a time shall we get to continue to escape them, do you believe Starring?" demanded Joan.

"That all depends how long they'll follow down stream. Though he's our friend Glingiroe might not know who we are, and as there are foes who would come to his part of the camp to frustrate even his plans, he'd willingly catch us without doubt so we'd better be watchful. I don't mind the real Glandelinian officers but he's hard to escape from and he usually catches a fugitive. I'm surprised we didn't trick him. I don't believe he knows how far we're ahead. I believe he'll lead his troop two or three miles down, and if they don't happen to be on the right side of the stream as they pass where we got out, they will go up another two or three miles, and near as much down before they reach the trail. We are pretty safe for half an hour's start and we might get if we are lucky, a whole hour. But we ain't safe yet by no means. It's Glingiroe Glingiroe we're up against more than the others and therefore children we ain't safe by a long way. If we could get to him one of our signal signals which he understands, he'd know then and not follow us so hard. But he thinks we enemies frustrating him in his work and he's bound to get us. Other wise we'd not have been fired on like that. It's nearly thirty miles to our woods where our troops is. We've come sixteen of it good I'm sure--I believe it's nineteen I should say, and we've got twelve miles to reach the road, and with him leading the pursuit we ain't safe even then. No our only chance is to come to our own stronghold in the woods or find some spot where we can get horses, and not go to the enemy's lines now as the whole camp may be on its guard now. I'm sure there ought to be a good many cavalry horses scattered about but it's so dark we might pass to within ten yards of one and not see it. There won't be a streak of daylight until six or half past six and it ain't safe yet."

"It's just a quarter to ten" said Joan looking at her illuminated wrist watch. "Is that all. Why we sure went through it so quick. That's strange. But let's get going. I hear pursuers again."

By this time they had recovered their breath again and they quickened up into a fast swing swing, but their hard continued traveling had told on them and they couldn't have gone much less than two miles in an hour. The three child scouts too were badly fatigued, and several times as they went on, they heard a trampling sound in the gloom, and felt sure they had scared some stray horses, but though we had they had a long lasso themselves, they might as well have tried to catch a bird with it. In another half hour they heard the distant dogs again, but they were far off by this time. There was nothing for it now but hard running, and they were still over seven miles from the road they were striving to reach which led to those longed for woods and even the road didn't mean safety. They began to believe after all they were losing the race, for they heard the gallop of pursuers in two directions. In another quarter of an hour they stopped suddenly.

"Heavens" said Starring. "what in the world was that?"

"Lie low," said Jim. "The pursuers are close."

They did, and dangerously close to them a whole squadron of horsemen rushed in a tremendous gallop past them swinging flashlights and torches. Starring decided upon a desperate move and as soon as the last man was up and somewhat distant from the rest Jim said:

"Your lasso" said Jim.

Walker however had made a tremendous rush forward, and before the horse and rider was past, he had got close, and grasped the horse by the mane. The rider tried to down him with his sabre, but Starring had leaped to the horse's back and far more quickly than it takes to write it, he was in possession, and the rider lying dead on the ground.

"Come on children. I've got a horse" said Starring. "He'll do as well as the best horse in the world for us."

The child scouts saw his meaning and in a minute the three were astride the horses back. A shot sounded from somewhere, and the horse tottered, and they thought he would have gone down on his head. Kicking were no good so Starring got out his new and gave the horse a prod, and off they went. They had not gone far, some two hundred yards or so, but the way they had wanted him right across the line they were going, when six shots sounded, and down the horse tumbled.

"All right for once" said Starring. "Howe You've done your work poor horse, but I understand what has happened for the enemy has guessed that's been up, and we are again fired upon. So the Glandelinians would not see the horse, and be able to trail them by its means, they managed to let him to his feet for he was only slightly wounded, gave him a prod, which sent him limping off and then on their way on their course, sure that they were at last safe, for the scouts had felt sure they had thrown the bloodhounds off the scent. They however continued away from their course for over two miles for fear that if they should foolishly continue right on, the enemy would lead the dogs across the trail even though they might have missed the scent, and could easily renew it again, then they turned and made straight for the road.

"I don't think" Starring said now after a short while, that we shall strike the road far off where we left it before surprised by the Glandelinians."

"No I don't believe it would be safe" Bob. We had better bear a little more to the north, for the Glandelinians will most surely come on for that action and we have been so long now on the way that daylight will soon be coming on now."

"I believe" said Joan it's best not to go to the road at all, for I'm sure the Glandelinians most surely will follow it down for a few miles in hope of overcoming or capturing us."

"I hope those fugitives will come down the main road" they suddenly heard some one, say, "and surely I expect so. Won't it be fun though, I believe from what I have heard Captain, that it must be one of those christian spies, with some of those little christian spy or scout snakes."

"What do you mean babe?" They heard another say.

"Meaning didn't the colonel tell us to leave San Miguel before daybreak, and ride on to meet with Captain Glingiroe, and close in on the fugitives? If of course Captain wasn't likely that he meant us to ride more than ten miles or so, so that he himself with his troopers will be within that distance of San Miguel by an hour or two, by daytime, and will be up to our location half an hour later. If those fugitives ride or go on, they are safe to fall into as nice a trap as--2."

"Jehoshaphat" said another. "You're right Rube Hendrick. Let's make traps ourselves. It surely can't be more than a another five miles to the road, and day will come forth in half an hour. How strong do you see one the fugitives to be?"

"Fifty or sixty I suppose" said another. "But we're hundreds strong."

"That's what about I guessed Rube. There are four or hundred or more of our comrades, and they will be fresh. Every road is being watched, every meadow and field. We'll give them the surprise unless they slip in and hide somewhere during the day. I could curse those firebugs for even starting all these forest fires, for though it might seem to help our cause, its making such darn much smoke that sometimes we do not now which is day or night. And fugitives take advantage of it too."

The four of them indeed had been startled by this conversation, and even though they had long ceased to hear the baying of the dogs, which had been most unpleasantly near when they were thrown off the horse, by its being shot it did not at all sound very comfortable. They felt from overhanging this conversation that the Glandelinian pursuers were well ahead, and behind behind them, and on all sides, even even though those with the dogs would probably wait an hour before trying to pick up the trail again. They decided that if they had to be captured at last, it was safest to allow them selves to be overcome by those under Glingiroe for he was the best, and if he did not know the three children, he sure did Starring.

Finally daylight was appearing but dimly and dimly and when it was light enough to see, the fugitives stopped and took a look from a slight rise, and there across a small plain, they could see the road just where they expected, nothing just then was moving upon it, nor glancing the other way could they see any signs of the Glandelinians. Away to the right a mile or so they could see quite a clump of trees some distance beyond the forest's main and something of the appearance of the roof of a country house, among them. This they had no doubt belonged to some farmer. A mile or so down the road the other way was the great forests, through which, the road ran.

"Let's move for that smaller wood Starring and wait," said Jim. "The fierce Glandelinians will be coming up in another half hour, and it ain't likely Glingiroe's force will be long much before that. They are likely to be much further away."

In another twenty minutes or so they were in the apparent shelter of the wood, taking care not to get upon the road in case the enemy should come along with the hounds before Glingiroe came up. They had not been there five minutes before they heard a tramp tramping of many horses, but it was a minute or two before they could decide which way they were coming. At last to their greatest comfort they found it was an opposite direction, not from the direction of the enemy's lines. Just before they came up they also had an idea that they caught a sound from the other way but they couldn't just then have sworn to it. They lay till the troop fairly came up, as it might however be another squadron of Glandelinians. The troop moved in sight and the four got the start of their lives. A big party of soldiers in gray uniform came riding up and at their head apparently it seemed was Gertrude. Then suddenly figuring these were soldier soldiers in disguise, and Gertrude was leading them and believing it was all right, they jumped out with a cheer in the middle of them.

Q. "Don't ask me any questions now Gertrude, for I'll tell you afterwards. We haven't been pursued by the enemy all night. But here's your chance you were looking for. Gimplore does not now who her fugitives are and are following us hard with about I believe a hundred and fifty men and they'll be here in about three minutes I believe. They've ridden more than thirty five miles and their horses are not fresh, so we shouldn't let one get away. That got Gimplore out of it, then he and his force are attacking. But we mustn't harm him. He's our great enemy and he's a great man in words."

"Ride back half of you men two hundred or so yards" she commanded, "and charge when you hear my signal. I with the rest, and the company of girls counts with me will turn off into the woods, and which is very heavy and screens us from view, hurry."

un from view, hurry.

This movement indeed was obeyed. Starring and his child scout followers not having horses were therefore not good to try at a charge, and so they went on in the road, the narrows they could half way between them, so as to be ready to jump out and join in the fight, however it takes some time to write it with a pen, but it didn't take even a minute to do, and in another minute they could hear the Glandelinians coming close. On they came, and Starring new they had passed Gertrude's hiding spot, and he and his friends crouched their rifles tight and peered out through the leaves. On they came, and they could see it wasn't Gingiores band but another, and they observed their leader riding first with two blood hounds trotting along by the side of the horse. Just as he was opposite they heard the new meow of some cat, the meowing cry was repeated, and the Glandelinians halted with a look of uneasiness. They however were not left guessing, for in less than a minute there was the thundering of fast coming horses, and down came the graycoated Abyssinians on both sides of them, just before they got closer, Starring and his followers leveled their rifles, and Starring fired a first hitting the Glandelinian leader in the head, and down he went killed instantly.

The two hounds turned and came right at Joan with a deep growl of rage. Starring sent a ball through each of them, and just as he did so the christian soldiers came down upon the Glandelinians from all sides.

It was the fiercest fight ever seen for such small numbers engaged for the Gandelians were in a trap, and knowing there would be no mercy for them, because when pursuing children the Abyssinians give Gandelians no quarter, they therefore fought like fiends. Starring used his strength and dived down among a Gandelian just with the butt of his rifle. The Gandelians fought their best but were wiped out to the last man. The Abyssinians not being a single man themselves, though some were injured. Starring had never seen a better or more valiant skirmish while it lasted. After it was over Starring, and his three friends mounted four of their horses, and rode on with the rest of them to San Miguel where Gingiores force was to be, but before they started off Starring told the story of his and the experience of his friends that night and of the loss of one boy, and Gertrude sent a couple of men back to bring half the escort as she decided to destroy Gingiores troop at one blow.....

Gingiroe's troop at one blow.....

And only a great cascade of Glandelinians moved in view, and Starring knew he had seen a girl scout have a much worse scare than they & save her life was positively sure it was a main division of Glandelinian cavalry, for there was long squadrons of them, but she was determined not to fall into the hands of these Glandelinian troopers, and though at first she was as white as a sheet for a moment, she was plucky enough enough,, for as soon as she could get her tongue loose she ordered her whole command, out of sight as they were all well hidden before the enemy came up. Starring expected and made sure the commander would investigate the number of men that they'd been lying in the woods plain, but fortunately the troops changed direction and rode down another way. Starring thought too late he looked at her it was lucky for the commander of the Glandelinian cavalry force she handed his name, she'd have shot him if she and her band would have to have a desperate death struggle for it afterwards. They rode on for San Miguel where this troops had passed out of sight, but couldn't just then find a trace of Gingiroe and his band. Gertrude however rode on toward the spot where she expected to meet the troop she had sent for. In half an hour they came upon them. They had a couple of hours to rest their horses, and then Starring led them to the spot where they had almost encountered Gingiroe's force by the stream. The Glandelinian party of pursuers had just turned off their course, they had the Christian troopers coming when they were close, but made sure it was reinforcements, and therefore didn't disturb themselves about it until Gertrude's force had wheeled round and fairly surrounded them did they suspect danger. But it was too late then, and only two out of the whole squadron remained dazed or down upon them, and only two out of the whole squadron got away. And those two battles so close to the main camp it was altogether a most successful business of the war, and Gingiroe was captured alive,

When they got to their own camp in the woods Gertrude said to Olingore;
"Thank you very much sir. It too for our four friends a mighty exciting adventure but we succeeded, and what became of general Dargar sir."

"He's gone down to Anguilina Azathila to do some duties there. I had felt Deneore and had made up my mind to go there for a while and therefore I had scriffled you to go to me and the dispatches which you did. I promised later that you would come and see him, and I've concluded that it is about time to do so. I've concluded to get a fast launch and go by the flood if possible. To morrow I may start. Unless you wish my services."

"I got some startling news to tell you all," said Penrod that afternoon.
"Can you guess what it was?"

"Well read this dispatch which I found dated September the 18th, and this is now the 29th for sure. What do you think of it.?"

They glanced at the paper and this is what they read, those that could,;

FURY OF BATTLE AT ANGELINIA AATHIS TERRAZOES INHABITANTS.
FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND OTHERS DIE: CITY OF ANGELINIA AATHIS
LAIN IN RUINS, HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS, MAY MILLION INJURED IN FIERCEST BATTLE } NOW! SINCE WAR BEGAN.

Angolinla Agathis. Angolinla State News flashed by wireless. As the appalling story of the frightful battle of Angolinla Agathis reached the bedside parts of our war torn country to night, estimates of the number of christian soldier dead rose to over four hundred thousand. Terrible bloody Wednesday with Christian army worsted. Communication in the first hours after the dimatenuous battle had been slight but as the full measure of the battle began to be seen, investigators and the various generals checking up on the roll call said four hundred thousand christians fell in battle never to rise, seven-een million were injured or captured, and most of the army swept away by the irresistible assault of the enemy. Some earlier disatches had set the dead at so small a figure as one hundred and fifty thousand.

That which had been dispatched that the Glandolinian armies (leader unknown) that struck death at the christian armies at Angelina Agathis, had moved toward Forest Hills thirty miles south of Big Girl Knoll, and another disturbance of the war, which caused the loss of life of at least two hundred thousand near San Juan, was also won, and this glandolinian army was expected by the Signal Stations to pass not far from Little Jennie Turner town at midnight to night, and general James Cannon of our armies is being dispatched with large army to meet him if possible. One of the enemy armies were said to be advancing with somewhat diminished force. Ablemannian Vice Consul Turso informed the Ablemannian State Department of Angelina, the news dead among the troops were eleven generals. He said it was a terrific battle. He declared if a new christian army could move to the rescue maybe it could do much good. He said the main christian general and the rest of his defeated army was safe and he strengthened the need of military aid. The eleven christian generals who died in that fearful battle were members of the Gemini and in the Division of troops known as those of the Society of Jesus. They were shot to death in the destruction of one of the main christian divisions. The death list was telegraphed tonight by general Joseph Hendru, formerly of Pandora city, Galverinia, who is in charge of the right wing of the disabled christian army. The dead included six divisional commanders, four Brigadier commanders, and one chief general of the staff of general Cranton. Some time earlier the authorities of Northern Angelina had at the request of Emperor Vivian had dispatched a large division of troops from Maragua Galverinia (south) with artillery and supplies. The army under general Trino as not far away and was ordered to stand by for orders. The general in charge replied that the army would be on the way to morrow ready to head northward with artillery and cavalry. Other troops had proceeded at once to the battle scene to check the foe advance on Little Girl Knoll if possible. Other troops at Beppo lansen were held in readiness if needed.

The city had been under shell fire, and there was not a house that escaped damage. The battle started at about two thirty at mid night, Tuesday or Wednesday, and lasted until thirty thirty the day following, with a lull at intervals lasting about an hour. To prevent news the enemy destroyed all wire communications and this message had been sent out by wireless. All churches in the city was demolished. In the battle many christian regiments were wiped out, but it is said the enemy loss too is very severe, a victory dearly gained. The Government of the Northern Province has organized special home

Some detail guards to guard against the advance of the enemy toward Haidel, the Glandelinians in the battle of the Christian line as if it were a crushing tidal wave before the hurricane storm, and the assault was so violent that at no place could a line of battle be held completely, and most of those who died in the battle lost their lives fighting to the last. The beautiful fields were ruined by shell fire, and by the waves of assault and counter assault, and the generals who were reinforced, killed under very great difficulties. After the conflict many of the first aid stations presented a most gruesome sight as the countless numbers of injured hobbling in, or were carried on stretchers and countless numbers were the painful operations that had to be performed by the army doctors and surgeons. The general headquarters was not much damaged by shell fire, although the veranda was demolished. The Christian defeat was as severe as if it had been a town washed out by an angry sea. Brigades, and divisions, regiments and companies, battered and driven away by the hurricane of assaults were swept from the field. The army might as well have been a town washed out to sea and be seen with the houses bobbing about in the water, nearly submerged. The Galeso river, because of an explosion was dammed at its source or its flowing cut section and because of this had spread over a part of the battlefield inundating the region. The river itself is so full of debris that it seems as if a hurricane had passed through.

With at least two hundred battles since last March including nine terrible ones, believed with varying fortunes on both sides a similar number of smaller conflicts, and thousands of skirmishes, three other battles of unusual interest intensely are raging near Big Birdknoll today. A big Glandelinian army are sweeping northward. The Glandelinian army which wrecked, damaged, or burned every house in Angellina Arathia, and won the tremendous battle there was now advancing on without being checked, coming toward Big Birdknoll and heading toward Alhambra town with increasing numbers added to the army. A second Glandelinian army advanced through the County of Porto Rico and headed toward Cuba town and menacing other points, while a third was sweeping toward burning all before it. With the Abbeinnian Red Cross, and all Nurses, doctors, and Holy Sisters, and priests being compelled to take care of no many refugees produced by the great disasters, there ain't hardly enough to take care of the millions and millions of wounded left by these terrific battles of the past, and all the survivors of the disasters had been attempting in vain to restore some semblance of order to their destroyed cities and towns, where now since June the damage is being estimated at more than twenty two billion dollars.

Scores of disasters have happened in the west, explosions, fires, and floods with great loss of life. The whole central and northern Calvernia all the way down to Northern Angellina State has been laid waste by this enormous flood. Yet all the refugees not drowned by the plagues raging have been steadily marshalling their own forces to restore what they can out of the chaos left in the path of such a disaster or series of disasters. And despite all of Calvernia's suffering we are losing many battles. At an early hour this morning more than one hundred and thirty thousand bodies of our side alone have been buried or recovered from the battlefield at Angellina Arathia and from the ruins of homes and buildings. Searchers probing in the debris estimated that at least seventy thousand more bodies would be found before the searching was finished. Indeed an adequate check up of the loss of life in this dreadful battle on the Christian side may not be possible for days as there are so many hot fires on the battle fields, in small woods, on grassy plains and in the town, and in forests beyond. General Haidel reported that at once many regiments of his own divisions had been swept from the battlefield by the Glandelinian assault that struck like a tidal wave simultaneously with a terrific shell fire pounding their lines to pieces. Rumors spreading among a panic stricken populace of Calvernian refugees placed the possible horror of our side in danger of losing the war. It is placed the possible horror of our side in danger of losing the war. It is reported nine Glandelinian generals lost their lives when their long line of battle facing the Christian fire in the morning part of the battle collapsed before a dreadful counter charge that tore through the enemy wave, before it was itself repulsed by Glandelinian reinforcements. The tidal wave of Glandelinian assault twenty miles miles, long, that fairly inundated the Christian trenches in a wild rush, tore its way through the Christian left wing, trapping its several hundred regiments and moving and cutting them and bayoneting them all to death to the last man as none could surrender. It was reported that fifty two other Christian officers of different rank including the eleven generals lost their lives when they were being swept away to fully their demolished divisions which were being swept before the enemy.

At least half of the thirteen million engaged were more or less wounded in the battle, and yet most of the surviving soldiers forgetting their own troubles, sorrows, and sufferings in the battle, disaster or helped in the first frenzied and haphazard work of restoring order in the demolished and crushed army. The task of clearing away the dead and rescuing the wounded was under way as soon as the first horror of the disastrous defeat which left the army stunned had passed. The road leading to St John's Cemetery was the first, to be cleared of the many dead bodies of both sides and for the burial of the dead to prevent an increase in the diseases. All soldiers that could dig so were put to work digging deep trenches to accommodate the bodies of the fallen.

The Glandelinian army coming from the southwest had struck the Christian army at two sections simultaneously at about two thirty at midnight, but it was not until late the following afternoon that the enemy succeeded in coming up the Christian army, and forcing on a tidal wave assault that aggravated the havoc and devastation. The battle then had continued with diminished force and fury until evening, when a Glandelinian surge 1,000,000 strong at once attacked simultaneously all along the line from the southeast radiating the fury of the battle and then swept the Christian armies before it. When the Christian line recoiled losing the battle entirely, scores of regiments were captured by the enemy. Conservative estimates place the number of wounded at thirteen million minor, and two million mortally. Nearly all the Christian divisions were demolished, or annihilated entirely. General Westle a division, the finest column of troops in the country was reduced to a mere brigade. The division had been reinforced twice during the frightful battle and strengthened by an artillery storm that covered its defended positions but the Glandelinian assaults crushed it like paper mache. Among the known dead was General Robert Foss Fuller, of the Angellian Left Guard division, and the local superintendent of generals. The injured and other officers and generals who numbered over two hundred included the assistant superintendent general, one captain general, the chief general of the whole army general Russell Sanders who was painfully but not seriously hurt when from the explosion of a shell the roof (or roof) of his headquarters was torn away, and the inside wall fell collapsed. More than one hundred wounded men were in a burn when a shell demolished it. Less than half escaped death.

All through the zone relief and first aid stations were established, and hours after the disastrous battle occurred injured soldiers were still being brought in on stretchers, and given emergency treatment. Thousands are blinded for life, others are to be life long cripples, and many have the most horrible wounds of every nature from shell fire.

This list of so under hundred generals severely wounded in the battle at Angellina Arathia was the greatest loss ever recorded in battle among officers. The message of this battle and loss was sent by Count De piff through a signal station on Haidel Hill. The regular telegraphic instruments at Angellina Arathia were destroyed by the flood, but Count De piff set up the new station on a hill.

The whole of the city of Angellina Arathia is in total ruins as the result of the central portion of the battle ending in the midst of the streets and in the houses for nearly twenty hours. There were no loss of life among any inhabitants as they had fled at the approach of the enemy but approximately the hundred and fifty soldiers were hurt when the famous Golden Port was destroyed by an explosion of a mine during the battle. All of the population of that city is homeless to day. Several hundred residents of the community near the city were injured when they were so foolish as to go too near in their eager desire to see the battle. The Government signal station there there probably will be out of commission for a month. Yet this message was received from the signal station operator at Mord and relayed from Angellina Arathia's signal station to Calvernia.

The Glandelinian army which won the battle of Angellina Arathia was believed to be the same one which fought and won a terrific struggle a few days before at San Guan, and now advanced through Porto Rico County. The Angellina Arathia Signal Station operators reported to the signal station in Calvernia, that he had requested the operator at Mord to get all information possible.

Considerable damage damage had been wrought to the Christian army defending San Guan, during a conflict of general battle proportions, and the enemy army had attacked and struck the army late last week according to signal station reports. The battle had continued for three days. One division of Christian troops there was put out of commission. The dispatch was sent from an emergency station near San Guan. The dispatch had said:

"Apparently considerable damage done to General Andrews army at San Guan. Army slowly retreating."

A warning of a Glandelinian army of considerable proportions was given of its advance, by the very weather bureau last night. It said:

"Report came in by telegraph that advisory S.P.H. Glandelinian army under General Line 100,000,000 strong has moved inland over and across Calvernia Honduran State short distance from Little Birdknoll, north of Glandelinian army is moving a short distance northwest of St. Jean, Virgin Marie county apparently moving west-northeastward with increasing numbers added by new bodies. St. Jean witnessed an action. Big Birdknoll in danger."

Hendro Dargar reported that one of the chief Camboian generals was dead, in Tebo River a victim of shellfire, when he fell mortally wounded during the recent battle at Anmolina Amphle, according to telegraphic messages received here to day. The first details of the havoc wrought to the Christian army under general Houdavay by the Camboian assault which they say destroyed at least one million lives on both sides combined, were received by the International Red Cross service to day, in dispatches from Hombi City.

The message received, revealed that more than seven hundred thousand Glandelinians, lost their lives, when the christian fire at six o'clock in the morning demolished a number of Glandelinian divisions raising the total death rate of 1,100,000. Houses of the villages were hurled high into the air by explosions of mines and human bodies and the debris beside that of horses and the slain in the houses were scattered far and wide. The round bodies of dead soldiers lodged in the branches of high trees or lying torn and battered and gapped with horrible wounds far from the opposing battle lines and trenches.

During the assault the enemy during his successful time followed up the course of Tola river completely destroying all regiments opposing the advance, and capturing prisoners and forcing divisions of troops to retreat before their wild march throughout the fertile valley for ten miles. The river was filled with the corpses of human victims of the battle and the carcasses of animals ruining the water supply over a wide area.

The scores of hundreds of thousands of christian soldiers injured in the disaster were reported to be suffering horribly owing to the horrid nature of the wounds and to the smallest means of medical aid, lac of doctors and nurseries. Most were forced to depend upon the most primitive methods of healing. 2 The army to day what is left of it continued its efforts of aiding battle wounded reassured by reports that a second Hunadlinian army now advancing northward would pass far to the west.

Heavy loss of life was also feared to day in the case of many other big battles that raged over a wide area, throughout July August and September up to now. The full fury of many of the battles however was hardly less violent than that at Angelina Agathie, but the premises have been demolished, our side won several victories especially at Jylian Wickie. News of other disasters followed. Dispatches stating that a Glandelinian army was advancing on toward Maroonville again, had captre captured La Paz causing heavy damage. A check up of these casualties of these battles are not obtainable but believed to be immeasurable.

The battle at Ban Guan was also unusually severe, and the army commanders after the roll call counted two to three hundred thousand dead, and 10,000 officers injured or dead, and 10,000,000 wounded and considerable property damage to many towns in the vicinity of the battle from shell fire as a result of the enemy letting loose a cannonade that broke all records. To try to frustrate the enemy there the christians were tried to let loose a flood from the main inundation, and although buildings and fields were flooded, and everything else paralyzed, the enemy couldn't be stopped, though fortunately this army of christians escaped a major disaster such as occurred some time ago in June at Phelanantburg when a battle there caused $300,000,000 damage and a defeat of various armies opposing crazy Hsinlay. The army of the christians was crushed and another was crushed

A n officer was electrocuted by a fallen wire, and another was crushed under a roof dropped on him when hurled high into the air by the burst of a high explosive shell. The battle was limited along an extent of thirty or forty miles. During a lull in the battle one of our generals while scouting to see what the next move of the enemy would be fell from a tree limb and was seriously injured. It is estimated that at the first blow one hundred regiments had been wiped out. Many divisions were smashed like window glass, by the violence of the Ghandian assaults and a good part of the main line was driven from the field. All communication lines were cut. General Happonch was also hurled from his position during the height of the battle at San Gaudille left a grand division also parted from the right but the central line held and annihilated the assault hurled against it, until the battle stopped. The line of christians under general Opone was driven three hundred yards, the Ghandian line wave then smashed through another division, but here got no farther."

of Calaverita within the last fifteen months, and caused the deaths of more than twenty million inhabitants from starvation, exposure, floods, managere and all other known horrors including plagues. This war has accumulated in two years more ruins than all starvations in the world combined. very calamity and besides poor holy Calaverita, the horrors of war famine, pestilence caused by disasters, these floods, not a province north or south has been spared."

"You and the dreadful horror in which immense Calaverita finds itself added Peirce, has caused the attraction which this country had brought to all good foreigners who had visited it. It has been a paradise better probably than that Adam and Eve had been driven from. But its stores of undeniable grandeur have been laid waste, and its territory and its population which has exceeded by far all other provinces in the world except Abiennia and her southern States are devastated and refugees, the richness of its soil and subsoil in faced with black ruin, the variety of its products, its sites of unbelievable beauty, enchanting is sadly ruined and spoiled, its great rivers, are rhode and sear, and filled with foul waters, its lakes, its mountains, its plains, the fertility of its countless fields its innumerable and enormous forests, all which go to make a country first in our world is facing a veritable hell of destruction. Hundreds of forested mountains appear as if they were eruptions. Its coal deposits which form the reserve of the future, its mines of gold silver, mercury, copper tin and iron in unmined quantities, its big valuable peat bogs, and its oil fields down south are all in the possession of the vandalsians.

In all Guverlinia which has all the products of the temperate, semi tropical, and true tropical regions are possessed by the forest. The cultivated wheat, rye, corn, sorghum, sugar cane, bananas, camphor trees, pine trees, ebony trees, orange trees, and dates, but there is no more in southern and northern Guverlinia. I do not speak of the destruction of those which is the principal article of sale for it too much more in the forests used to have the animals birds of glaucous color as they're gone driven by forest fires. In all eastern China would have met this fate it could not have extended far enough. The territory of Guverlinia devastated would embrace a land as extensive as the whole of North America and parts of China together. We have sixteen cities as large as London, Chicago and New York put together now a tale only of its former exulting place.

Tourists who have come in spite of great perils to Calvernia are amazed at the extent of the destruction. All tourists who had been amazed at the gradual fall of fair Albiann would be amazed to see it no more, and the I do not know what of the extend of floods and forest fires and other horror extreme which has never been found or occurred in any other large countries."

"I remember" said Starratt that Abbeville was once connected with the rest of the world by an incomparable network of steamship lines, and railroad lines and other means of communications. It too had been an immense river port which had behind it a quarter of the population of the christian and other parts of the world, which was by train only two days from Calveria's, twelve days from Angelinia Agathia, two days from Francis Atlanta, and a month from other places. Its possibilities had been great and its rail road tonnage was as great as that of New York and Chicago. This city served as an incomparable river basin, that of the Ermine Run. The largest boats of the commerce of the world had come to anchor here and the great cargo boats were no smaller on this immense artery which traversed the richest and holiest provinces of Calverinia to the sea and flowed past a hundred now flooded cities whose populations the last was a hundred thousand to two and threesee millions. Abbeville had indeed been an unusually beautiful city. All tourists had been amazed at the beauty of the site, the grand wide avenues and streets, the once imperial palace now used as a residence by the inhabitants and all beautiful beauties never found in any other city. Now where is all that? None? The beautiful Ermine Run river which divides Calverinia into two equal parts is befouled by flooded waters, waters though the river stood well and did not run over its levees. Many regions of our beloved Calverinia has become the "fief" of gaudiolian thieves and vandals and incendiaries, and they have and are still a destroying property wherever they go and this land is designated as "Vandal" land. I have heard the most moderate calculations place at twenty millions the number of very christian soldiers dead during the last fifteen months of this dreadful war, the end of which is not yet seen, and how it'll end only God can foresee, and I have found out that in the midsts of all this hellish horror the dearest Churches The One True Church has remained firm, with Calverinia's stand, even when all other things have failed. Despite Her being the only religion she had come forth unharmed, indeed she has received a great and growing number of the enemy but she is a large living, though the heads of her poor priests have been mangled and more than hundred have undergone grave cruelties, even the Sisters brave the dangers. The future of this Country of Calvernia still has surprise in store for us."

the three months and one half had passed, since the great Abbeville disaster had occurred, the news of the progress elsewhere made by the enemy was surprising and shocking, though the successes were more in the west than elsewhere, for Hanley and his armies did not avail much though they did seem to have fought some of the fiercest of the battles. This rapid growth of the enemy success was the result mostly of officers of christian armies who could not be really relied on, they either did not understand how to manage armies, or the enemy too might have overwhelmed an overwhelmed them and cut the off from all support. The enemy too was aided by the results of the disasters, the horrors of massacres and by the floods, by the late abundant supply of troops, and the heat created by fires which made the christian armies too fatigued to do much.

However all this did not discourage Gertrude's great band of child scouts. They had been given plenty to do, and they treated that when the floods went which it showed evidence would be soon Abbeville could sent down such immense armies that Calvernia would be free. This could be done by the united strength of the States up north.

The girl and boy scouts decided upon a bold scheme and that was to get some army of christians to come up and force him by some scheme out of his position. What gave Gertrude Angelina and her followers great comfort and hope despite all the bad news heard, and of the great number of Glandelinian victors in the west was that the Glandelinian generals, and Glandelinian were making up unusual progress of their own, but what could be discouraging to others was that not only the enemy was going on with progress, but the progress made by the forest fires, and other disasters was beyond measure, the former especially, was now progressing over many hundreds of miles of forests. This rapid growth of the forest fire was the result of the extreme dryness of the forests, the dry weather, the continued low humidity, and the many more frequently set by the Glandelinian fire bugs. The forest fires too had given the country all it could do.

The fires were being fought by the united strength of all fire rangers, and men and older boys drafted from various towns and cities for the purpose the fighters arriving desperately day and night every hour by shifts to combat the flames but to no avail. The braver of the older girls thousands and thousands of them were also sent assisting, but not being allowed to go too near the danger zone especially where the heat was too great for them to face and the smoke too suffocating.

Even women were brave enough to aid in the fight against the "Red Plague" but they had light work, and consequently there were hundreds and hundreds of thousands fighting and even refugees aided, and standing armies of soldiers had pitched in, but it might as well have been the whole world of people, righteous or bad trying to put out the flames of hell.

Despite all this combat, and all the schemes and tricks of the rangers, and general experienced forest fire fighters the conflagrations had grown so fast, that many people declared they could see its progress a hundred miles away, and that the whole country was getting darker and darker day by day, and sometimes a hundred or more miles of country would be so fogged in smoke that to avoid suffocation people had to abandon their towns and villages.

The forest fires forced the main scheme of disaster in this war. It was now becoming more dreaded than the floods, though it was equally as dangerous and more common throughout southeastern Calvernia, and other States.

Scarcely less it was raging in Angeline near the northeastern border and near Angeline Vine State. It was first growing in intensity to an alarming extent in central northern Angeline State burning on through a part of the Province of Polenta but the onrush of the flood there cut the forest fire and prevented its progress in that direction.

That late afternoon when Gertrude Angelina, with Penrod, Violet, and her sisters, and some of the others including Angeline's niece were strolling down to scouting around, then they saw that in the far distance to south and east the sky was unusually low, as if one of those terrific Terriclan Typhoons was coming, and Jane Mallfort said:

"Isn't those forest fires, Gertrude, threatening all the forests throughout Eastern Calvernia, and plunging the whole world nearest us in continued profound gloom? Why the sun doesn't even shine no more at all!"

"There is sure danger of our forests going to nothing nothing," said Gertrude. "We are positive sure from proofs the enemy does that, but if we could only tell of the others."

"Well if that is so, I cannot understand how the Government of this Calvernia Province can stand all this destruction, without doing some thing desperate to stem the "Red Tide". The fire burn wildly before every little puff of wind and what do gales do. It doesn't seem possible that our forests throughout Calvernia is doomed to be a thing of the past before that dreadful & dreadful plague. I don't see why the hundreds of thousands of fighters cannot stem it."

"How could or can they, because the enemy has provided a very extraordinary provision against this. The fighters too are attacked by them."

All forest fires which I have seen too have advanced in such a fashion that fire fighters can't stand before them. You understand Jane how a forest fire runs depends on the forest, and its material. If the forests are dense the fire are hotter, if they are sparse, they're smoky."

"How do rangers breach a forest to stop a fire?" demanded Joy. "They cut down all trees in the path of the fire as much as possible. The breach is generally a mile in breadth and as long as the wave of advancing fire, or rather longer. It takes lots of men to do that a fast enough. But if the conflagration is hurled forward by a gale, breaching is of no avail. When the breach is finished, and there's no wind, the rangers wait and in a very short time after the fire driven you'd see--indeed you'd be surprised to see how desperately they fight to prevent it from crossing the gap, and when the fire tries to run along the lower plains of the ground, and the seeds, and and so forth, they beat this out with wet clothes and roben or any heavy object they carry. But sometimes the fire is attended by fierce gales and in a little time the blaze would burst forth on the other side of the breach, and the trees there too would soon be so enveloped in the flames, that nothing could be done to stop it. It would then grow larger and larger, and the rangers would be defeated, but if there's no wind, and they fight successfully, the fire would soon die down at the breach. They can then successfully fight it on the flames while guarding the gap, by hurling dirt, mud, or by beating with wet blankets and so forth. However out of all ways, a good size gap or breach is the only hope. Counter firing has been tried but it usually is of no avail, for if the wind suddenly changes direction there's another fire on their hands to combat."

"What a strange way to fight forest fires" said Gladys. "Quite long for, the time when we will see a good fight against forest fires. What would we have to do if a forest fire would come very close here. This forest is very extensive too, and our own refuge would be threatened. What would we do?"

"I mean to direct a fight too" said Gertrude emphatically. "We can do it, and I have sent for news to find out what our condition is. If one comes I'd not try to overcome it here" she added "with a sneer but believe me I'd do my best to force it to head for Tumerlines army and route him out of the neighborhood. The Glandelinians made these fires for them at it."

"But those who fight forest fires face a great deal of danger don't they Gertrude?" asked Mildred.

"It is as dangerous as fighting in battles. The thing to do is to be watchful. Of course we cannot go into the flames to fight them, if that's what you believe, for that's suicide. The calculation in fire fighting zones is that the fighters can deploy against the "Red Plague" as the army does against the other in battle, the assault on the flames is the same, front line battle, storming the rear, and attacking both flanks. It seems strange but that in the fights nowadays the rangers and men drafted are even assisted by women and children, and that they do the easier and safer part as forming the trenches, breaches and so forth, so that just manual labor needs to be required, and in the beating out of smudge fires, and hoeing and ditching and so forth all can help. Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts of other spots have done it."

"Is not machinery required to aid in the fighting of flames?" Charley Jones asked.

"How absurd" laughed Gertrude. "Machinery. How are we to combat a advancing conflagration with machinery, and what machinery could you use. Fire department apparatus would be of no use as it would be so far to obtain water, and then how could they do so when a conflagration goes raging on in so large a scale. I suppose Charley you believe some factory should send out mill machinery to fight a forest fire. The way forest rangers try to fight fire is by many varieties, by cutting down trees to make clearing, ditching, trenching, and so forth. I should teach you all how it is done as I often have seen the fighting. It will be good sport for us to do it somewhere where the enemy is not too close for we'd need to try and form a small blaze in brush so you'd fight it under my direction. Of course the weather is terribly hot for so late in the season it'll soon be October, and yet it's as warm as the jungles of south America. Of course if you learn well, it will pay us well in case of grave danger. I intend to learn you breaching, trenching, fire beating, how to throw wet rubbish over a smoulder and how to combat a crown fire, and how to outwit a combination fire. We'd have to do it rather far apart, so as to have ample room to fight in so as to save ourselves from falling trees and other perils of forest fire fighting. We should learn as we'll some day be so sorry for any ignorance on our part."

"How extensive is a breach made?" "It depends the extent of the fire. If a fire is ten miles long, the breach must be double that, and a mile or so wide."

"How much do the rangers get for fighting fires?" "Five hundred dollars a year."

"But how could we boys and girls cut and saw down big trees with such heavy implements such as ~~saws~~ saws, axes and so forth."

"Couldn't we start a little fire in these woods and fight it,?" demanded Polores.

Besides we should be driven crazy by the ever deepening doom or gloom. I shall not try any experiment in such a heavy wood. It's all right if we could depend on the calm continuing but it never does. At some other spot where trees are not so close together we will give a trail, all strange sorts of forests flourish here, and the extraordinary pine trees which at a distance appears as a heavy forest of giant parsley and carrot leaves are the most dangerous if they get a start for fire. In such a forest nothing not even rain can stop the blaze but increases the smoke. I do not believe that any of the plans for forest fire fighting would give any amount of success in the condition things are now, and how can all these rangers and the drafted help do it, when the armies can't. True the floods are receding now as it is stated and receding good, but that does not help in the forest fire situations. Still it would be interesting, and would cause a little carefree and amusement and thrill in our work, which for our early life would be an important point and so much there would be generally some hope of success, though occasionally we may come through with a total failure, for nothing is so difficult to fight than a forest blaze."

those that could faded along for a considerable

Some of my girls went out constantly before night came to see if any of the enemy were coming, as of course no one could tell how long they were to delay their plot. They had come back with the report that no enemy was in sight, though once far away they saw two scouting parties of Apollinians one larger than the other, but had no idea they were really Conscientians. In the course of a few minutes, six of the Glandelinian scout agents were discovered approaching to nose in on our position, and understanding if we frustrated their scouting, they'd get the noise that we were wise to them, and our own scheme too would be a failure.

find in camp. Upon the boys reaching camp with their find, it was believed the enemy had changed their plans about trying to set a fire trap around us, and were preparing to blow us up. Nevertheless whatever the plan, that night, the camp was aroused by strange sounds around it. Believe me after that we had a bad list of dead among ourselves, but we sure must have wiped out many of the enemy for our gunfire, and the discharge of the machine machine guns was murderous. The noise of firing had been so severe however that it brought a large party of Christians to the spot, and the enemy when about to overwhelm us, were dispersed. "

Seeing that they might have to remain here for several days, until the northern tervar was removed, they saw the next urgent business was of fortifying their clearing in case of being attacked, as they were quite some distance from the christian army they had left, though they had sent a notice to general Evans that they were close to "amerlians army. The land around the clearing was hooped up in a sort of high breaster. They made a sort of attic for the front in an experiment. For safety the two streams supplied an abundance of the coolest water they had found for drinking. As they had found the house close to one of these streams the water was frequently brought in buckets. They had from their bagons all sorts of vegetables, peas, beans, tomatoes, onions, and many others some of which were natives of warm climates and keep sweet potatoes and corn. They had an

It must be supposed that the forces of child and layabouts, and their Abnindilian escorts during the whole of this short time, were to have a easy life, upon the contrary they were soon going to have some of the most thrilling scenes of their lives. The Chandelians made no move just not to do anything, but without their knowledge of Gortulde, the Abnindilian army knew of the existence of the child escort force near them as much as the officer deer, and General Samelise knowing the kind of child escort they were very apprehensive. It is true he had an army of a hundred million, but the sections of the army were scattered far apart, within a range of ten miles there were no less than four big sections under general Percy Henrice. A file of twenty miles on horseback would bring you dear reader to another section. The army radiatedly to the rear of Gortulde's position was under general Jacques. The tract of land upon the east of this encampment was in possession of three other enormous bodies of soldiers under general Hordede, Cooper, some Federal, and John Angus. Each of these sections of the armies were hundred and ten in size. One of the vast encampment of the soldier of child escort lay to the river exactly opposite the main force of the encampment. From the forest to the east, their camp was situated about four miles from Gortulde's position. To the west of general Jacques, there was the Abnindilian cavalry under two great generals. Elsewhere in the rear of the cavalry were the divisions of William Denders and Stanislaw. They were both ten miles from Gortulde's position. These divisions of the about officers..... and were therefore disposed to look upon their adventures no matter how thrilling they were as fun, and therefore Violet taking a hand had to repeat to them all quite seriously to be sure that Gertrude's orders were strictly attended to, saying: at the end;

"And remember if you think this is only fun, and get too rash, and anything happens you're responsible not we. We do not ask any one to go where we dare not thread ourselves, but just the same all the spots where I and my sisters ever go to is more serious than you ever went before, and which you're going this time for sure. Therefore listen carefully to all instructions given, and during this movement Gertrude planned, if there's any monkey business we wash our hands clean of the results as it'll be your own hard luck, and you'll be punished too for the same disobedience if you survive the disasters of your own account."

Then Gertrude informed them of the mysterious box which she intended have opened, and therefore she intended to open it on the outside. She and Violet, and her sisters entered the house. The box which it takes two men to carry had been placed in a secret panel room, and four of the girls carried it out. They then that is four of the Vivian Girls used screw drivers and hammers to force it open. The latter tools however were not necessary, as the case had been very carefully screwed up, and when the top was forced up it was removed by two of them, and they found what made it so heavy was that there was an inside case covered up with lead and bolted covered. As Violet herself was cutting through this, her sisters expressed their opinion that from the extreme care taken by the former owner, whether it had been the Glandelinians or it had been stolen by them, the contents must be very valuable, or secreted. Still they could give no clue until they got the inner case opened which they found a more difficult job, and when the case was finally opened the astonishment and even surprise of all was unbounded to find that it contained four dozen large explosive bomb rockets heavy and granular, clockwork bombs, a dozen or so of big blue lights, ten red, and a dozen of ordinary signal rockets all being covered with straw. Which had been necessary for these explosives would have detonated if they had hit one another in the box when it was handled. "all the Good heavens" all the Vivian Girls exclaimed in intense alarm. "what a miracle they didn't go off when we carried the box."

"What good will they do us," demanded Jane. Realizing their narrow escape for had these exploded in the house at night many of them sleeping there would not have been there that morning. "We could make good use of them," suddenly said Dolores.

"How?" requested Violet.

"I will tell you my dear Princesses. Of course the Glandelinians are experienced with rockets of all sorts but I see by the name written on the box that the Glandelinians never had these, and who ever had them must have had them made specially by some pyrotechnist in America. I'll bet the enemy had never seen any such rockets as these explosive ones, really they're not rockets but rocket grenades for I have seen them before, and they explode with greater effect than do our bang bang shells. One dozen you see here appear as if they were the ordinary kind though you see they're of unusual size, but they contain not the materials used in Celebrating rockets but great colored balls, which will give out star shells which throw curtain lig to over a large territory and reveal everything in the darkest night. One of them alone thrown into the air even where we believe any Glandelinian may be will light up the plain, forest and hilly country and give us as good a view of them as if it was day time. The other three dozen smaller ones here are loaded with something appearing as if fire crackers, but when they explode they let go a shower of gamma and canister and do fearful havoc. You see it is a good thing and many of these rockets have a strong case of lead placed on them and one of them striking a man without even exploding, will certainly throw him off his horse and even kill him. These things you see, and should understand are used in war in other countries and the idea came to me that as they had never seen these, they would be horribly scared at night by them, and even if the riders are not frightened, nor the soldiers on foot, it is quite certain that the horses would be horribly alarmed by one of these rushing fiery things charging into their midst. The loud roar, the explosions, the rush, the train of fire, and the volley of crashing death and destruction in their midst would be enough to rout the bravest Glandelinian cavalry force and frighten their horses altogether. I believe that do you think of my idea of using them on the Glandelinians, being some scientists we know, and have these manufactured throughout the country to be used with our mutineers in the armies."

"What do you think of the idea Violet,!!!!!!" asked Gertrude.. 979 (X)

"Capital. Capital," everyone cried..

"But how?" Dolores asked. "Will any one of us be able to make these strange rockets go straight at the Glandelinians. All the rockets I ever saw even the exploding kind always went straight up into the air..."

"Ten Jane, because they were pointed up. put I see, you can see it too if you examine them. I mean that these ain't. YOU understand a rocket goes the way it is pointed. We all have seen that rockets in war are mostly fired through a sort of tube or from troughs. We too use the tubes, some of these will come in handy through our defense, so some of you boys and even girls set to work at once and make a couple of tubes or troughs about four feet long, without ends. They can be used in our long wagons, and they must stand on legs high enough to raise it above the level of the works we may use it against. Let there be two legs on the front end, and one leg behind, and this leg behind should have a hinge, so that when it stands upright it will be six or eighteen inches higher than at the front in case we want to fire at anything close at hand. Then too when we want to elevate it or the head of the weapon and explosive to fire at anything in the distance, we can then pull the hind leg back so that, that end is lower than the front."

Penrod who was present however thought for a moment or two and then said; "I believe Dolores, it would be much firmer on the wagon floor, and more easily for us to manage it if two legs were put on behind with another one sliding up and down between them and with holes in it so that it can be pegged up and down as we desire."

"That would certainly be better, Penrod, but I doubt if it'll be all right on a wagon, but we can try it nevertheless so put your idea down on a piece of paper and let me see exactly what you mean before you begin."

Penrod did so very carefully, and Gertrude pronounced it to be the perfect thing, and by evening the troughs about four of them were finished and placed in position at the rear of four of the longest wagons. Too Gertrude in the course of the evening, explained to them all that it might be possible that the Glandelinians might venture to make a dash to attack and carry off or destroy some of their number, and that therefore she ordered everybody to be on the lookout, and to adopt every precaution upon the time of the whole force moving out.

To every one he made an addition to her former instructions, namely too that not only should everybody be on their guard before their advance was started, but that when they all started off, some one or other should climb a tree every quarter of an hour to see that everything was still clear, that the enemy was still at a respectable distance, and that even the girls should do the same, for who among girl and boy scouts were there who couldn't climb a tree? The boy Penrod required no orders on this score and neither did the little Irish foreigner boy. They were well acquainted with the Glandelinians, and had a perfect horror and hatred of them. They had mistreated the wagonets be used as sorts of traveling forts, and heavy iron plates had been fastened on three sides of the wagon, and large holes had been sawed through them to fire through, with their armoured wagons, their soldier escort and the way they were armed the whole regiment felt that they could defy all hell itself. Orders were given to Joy St. Claire and Gladys too and also Sally and Sarah that in case while the march was on, and the dogs gave an alarm, every one was to be behind trees and stones and so forth at once preparatory to open fire, to which Gladys replied characteristically.

"Sure Miss Aronburg, I suppose we could form a good ambush for them." "Right you are Gladys, when the dogs give the alarm we are to go behind all objects of hiding at once. Then we shall be able to decide according to the number of the enemy, as to whether we shall rush forward and storm them with one of our wild and audacious assaults which has always terrified them or stand upon the defensive and open a terrific fire."

And no every one having received their instructions in case of emergency, things for the rest of the evening went on much much as before, for they heard the enemy was going to march by night, and halt by day, and so they would do the same...

The evening passed without the slightest incident or alarm. The rules of the camp which Gertrude had laid down were strictly observed. All the sheep and cattle they had of their own were carefully secured in the wagons not needed for provisions, a dog was fastened up in each of these wagons, and as of the one of the mutineers was kept in front while the other was in the rear, the retrievers as usual being outside. A flag signal. Flag signal staff was erected on the rear of the wagon. The boys and girls assigned for that duty fulfilled the duties of lookouts, even before the advance started they went up every half hour and they answered to the calls that the foe army: "Bill! Bill!" Before the advance was started for Gertrude rode over to the left of her column to confer with the Abner Allan co. commander about their own duties. While she was gone Penrod who was playing with Jane and Mildred some sort of a game were startled by the sound of a rifle shot. Looking up they saw a girl on a tree top, she had just fired the rifle, and another was signaling.

"...and the Glandelinians have come at last." The Irish boy scout exclaimed, and they all three started at a quick run. The girl scout and the boy scout immediately at seeing them run, and waved her hand to them and then she and others landed over the distant plain beyond the first bunch of the immense forest. At this moment they were joined by many others. "It's all right June" June was on an untemperament that was not excited, despite her so called rashness at times. The Glandelinians who made the mid, was a very long way off, or the girls on the signal tree would be waving to us the signal to come on hastily. We must all take it easy, for we shall want to keep our hands steady."

So they stopped their hasty speed of running and turned into a plain trot, which in five minutes brought them to the tree. They themselves climbed up and descended;

"What is the trouble Maud?"

"Oh dear oh dear," Minnie said. "A big calvacade of Glandelinian cavalry have passed, and they've got all our animals and a number of our comrades prisoners besides."

"And I fear they have slain a good many of our comrades too," Maud added. "They made a desperate assault upon our southern camp. I saw it all from here."

It was evidently too true. At a distance of six miles or more the girls and boys who had climbed the trees could see a gray mass mingled with a red hue rapidly moving and retreating, and numerous single specks could be seen hovering round them. Two miles from the camp a single horseman was galloping wildly. They had already made him out as Joe Green. Those on the trees were speechless with dismay. The little Irish boy scout who could only speak English and very little Abbeannian yet was the first to find his tongue.

"Och the devilish hounds!" he exclaimed in English. "The batten devilish vandals, and to think that not one of us was there to give them a bating."

"What will Gertrude say?" Maud ejaculated. "Somebody's at fault for this, and I'll bet my soul it's Joe Green."

Penrod said nothing, but looked frowningly, with tightly closed lips, after the distant masses, while his hands closed upon his rifle.

"How as it Minnie?" she demanded at last.

"I was down on the grass below," Minnie said. "When Jennie yivian herself was over on that tree top, signalled down to me. 'Come up Minnie' quickly. 'I thin there is something wrong over there.' I climbed up the nearest tree, and I saw our animals a long way off, nearly four miles with a number of red figures, and I saw a gray mass of something on horses a going a long fast toward them from the right. They were rather nearer to us than our animals were, and were on one of the rises of the ground so that they would not have been seen by any one in the outside of the camp, then as they got quite near the camp, I saw a sudden volley of puff clouds from our camp and heard a sound of firing, but the fight was won at that section by the raiders, the beasts began to gallop away—and three of the furthest red figures—whom I suppose were the Glandelinians in disguise—separated themselves from them and went off sideways, lashing with long cowhides. The small red figures moved off in retreat and one of them seemed to get a start of the others. These were cut off by the gray mass, and I did not see anything more of them except a few that were carried away. Joe Green I'll bet got away and though some of the Glandelinians rode after him for about a mile they could not catch him. Directly I saw what it was, and drew my pistol and fired, and some one signalled. That's all I saw."

Maud and others confirmed Minnie's account merely adding that seeing the fugitives in the distance she suspected also a massacre. The animals and prisoners and foes were now quite out of sight, and the whole party went down to meet Joe Green who was just riding up to the inclosure of the camp. He was very pale, and his horse was covered with foam.

"Are any of our number slain?" was Jane Melfort's first question.

"I do not know Miss Melfort, but I should thin so. The Glandelinians caught them, I heard shooting and the boy ex-shouted. 'Santa Virgine' and he crossed himself piously—"what an escape. I will burn twenty pounds of candles upon your alters."

"How was it that your part of the camp was surprised Joe?" Mildred demanded a little severely. "You were so particularly ordered by me to keep a good lookout while on duty there. If you blundered I'll—"

"Well Miss Maxwell I did retain a very good lookout, and it was good for the whole camp that I did. Of course I'll confess I was further off from camp than I ought to have been—I understand that, but necessary of seeing things suspicious compelled me to do so, but then Gertrude told me not to go far—but I knew that the rise of ground that I could scout from was the direct direction and that I could see for many miles distance in the Glandelinian territory. Don't mistake the red specks you see for prisoners, the enemy had no prisoners, those are Glandelinians in disguise with the other. I saw the Glandelinians was up to something so I went out there, and my comrades Mildred Pedro, and Evanos Somgotze came with me. They saw nothing and thought I was only having an optical illusion, and while they laid down to try and see better in that posture I stood by my horse watching everything. My horse seemed uneasy, and I thought there must be the enemy somewhere near about. So I got on my horse, and just as I did so I heard a noise, and glancing behind where I had never dreamed of them I saw a lot of Glandelinians with those College Student or professor hats coming up at full gallop from the hollow. They were Glandelinians, I could tell by their horizontal banner. An assault was made on the camp elsewhere for I heard the firing, and saw the cattle and horses and other animals going off at the same instant, and I gave a shout to my two companions and stuck my spurs into my horses flank. It was a near touch of it, and they gave me a hard chase for the first mile, always demanding of me to surrender, and calling me a guttersnipe, a dog and all other names and cursing at me fiercely. My horse was fresher than theirs, and they gave it up. My two companions also escaped, shooting down ten of the Glandelinians."

"How many Glandelinians were there?" Penrod demanded.

"I don't know Master Penrod. It was only those in front that I caught a view of, and I never glanced round after I started except to fire once in a while. All of them had long rane carbines for twenty of them I believe fired after me as I went off, and lances whizzed past me, one with a flag or banner attached to it. I shot six of them."

"What do you think Jennie about the number?"

Violet, and her sisters were silent, and then Jennie finally said after scratching her head to think a better;

"They were all on big rroupe Penrod and not in lines as usually they are. I could not see them separately."

"The group seemed to be the size that our cattle and horses do when they are close together at the same distance. Don't you believe so Violet?" Joice said.

"Yes," Maud thought they were too."

"Then there must have been over a thousand or more of them," Penrod said. "I wonder what Gertrude will do. One of us had better ride off at once and fetch her."

"I will go," Angeline said moving away to saddle her horse.

"Stop Angeline," said her sisters Daisy. "I believe you had better use Joe Green's horse. I do not now what Gertrude may make up her mind to do—she's a rattlesnake to the enemy you now, and it's best for us to have our horses quite fresh. She'll attack. I'm sure of it."

Angeline agreed at once, and was mounting, when Angeline "Eheeeeee" Rheeese said;

"Wait a moment Princess, and I will climb up to the top of the tree. I may Gertrude, it's nearly time for her to return. She said she would be back and it's ten minutes of the time."

Angeline reluctantly paused, while Angeline Rheeese mounted the tree, and a minute appeared at the top. She remained there for a moment glancing across the empty space of ground, and then held up her hand.

"I can see her," she called down. "She's a long way off, but she is coming. I'll give her one of my signals as she appears to be glancing this way no doubt she sees me up here and wonders what is wrong as she is slowing down her horse, and has one hand to her eyes."

Angeline Vivian was about to alight again, when Jennie her sister said it, "You had better take an escort and ride to meet Gertrude Angeline. No doubt she may be much alarmed to see the girl up on the tree top, and it will be a great satisfaction to her to understand that we ourselves are at least all safe."

Angeline ordered ten boys to follow and the whole party at once galloped off. While Angeline Rheeese remained up there continuing to signal to Gertrude. He was about only one half mile distant, and had been riding quietly. Then for a little while she had lost sight of her. Then as she came up on a rise, she saw her stop her horse suddenly. She guessed that she had seen the signal for she was gazing at the tree top now with a field glass. Then she was sure that she made out the signal for she came on at a most furious gallop and as she came nearer she could see that she had removed her rifle from her back and was carrying it across her arm in readiness for instant action. In a few minutes Angeline Vivian, and her boy escort met her, and after a short pause, the whole party rode fast toward the camp. Gertrude rode up to Joe Green heard the details from him, and then rode up to the camp.

"This is a bad affair Princess," she said regretfully, "but as long as our whole force is safe anyhow we can thank God and His Blessed Mother that it is no worse. I'm going to get all those animals into my possession again or get them from the Glandelinian camp at Glandelinians own expense. Maud ride down to my Abbeannian commander, and tell him to get his whole army of cavalry at the immediate readiness, and you Jean Andrews have the remaining animals animals driven into their inclosure and faster the gate after them."

Angeline to Angeline, "I have," get all our force at the readiness. This is a good time to repay for our loss of life on the raft. I'm going not only to regain those animals but I'll give not one of those rascals a quarter."

Gertrude then retired with Violet, and her sisters—who had been looking on most anxiously while these orders had been given. Dolores over the nose was pale, but composed, and they could see that she had been crying.

"Angeline Vivian and I and her sisters have been holding a short meeting on this, and we are determined to get all our animals back, and I'm going to get some of the enemy's property too. I'll give them something that'll cause them to be afraid to come near us in the future. Violet, and her sisters are going to be with us, and Angeline will lead the expedition. It's unfortunate that so many of our troop have ridden over early this morning to general Viviane, and will not be on the return until late to night—had they been here I now we could break through a part of the enemy's territory and get a rich haul. I thought at first of sending a swift courier, but we cannot lose time. I have sent Lopez over to another spot with a note. We shall not be back at this spot again. Not of us will need to return after our fight. Every one of us will come. Let us start as soon as possible. Lucky we had our supper recently. Charles Brownie fetch down three blue lights, two signal rockets and two of the explosive ones. We'll start off in one minute so all be mounted at that time. When the bugle sounds off we start."

In a very few minutes they were already mounted, and they started off through the woods for the plains at a long steady gallop, the troop of mounted soldiers following.

"I believe they have only got an hour's start on us," said Gertrude. "Jennie said that it was half an hour from the first alarm to my arrival, and I was in the house a minute under that time. It is about half past seven now, and it's getting dark, but the forest fire glow will give us plenty of light to see the foe."

"It's a very fortunate indeed Gertrude, that all of our troop had their horses all safe."

"Yes indeed Penrod. If we were without horses we would be in a serious situation, and our chances of doing anything would be past. As it is we shall be up with them in two or three hours. The sheep and other animals they might have stolen cannot really go more than twelve or thirteen miles, especially with their heavy fleeces on. We might catch up with them easily enough."

Half an hour riding and they were up to the scene of the assault. As they neared it they saw about forty Glandelinians lying upon the grass. There was no occasion to go very near nor to stop, the stiff and distorted attitudes were also sufficient to show that they were dead. Gertrude also decided not to ride too close to them understanding that the shocking sight of so many Glandelinians who have met with a violent death, and probably were now in hell was apt enough to take the nerve of any one not accustomed to such a sight, however brave they may be.

"The darn rash fools are evidently dead," said Penrod. "It's no use of our stopping to look them over."

Yet he glanced at the bodies with a fierce frown upon his face, and muttered to himself:

"We'll pay the rest of you for this you vandals."

The others did not even glance toward them. The girls and scouts held their heads high in a haughty manner when they passed the dead bodies. Some of the never girl and boyscouts felt a strange feeling of illness come over them even at a momentary glance they had of the rigid figures.

"I suppose you do not intend to assault them until to-morrow morning Gertrude?" Jane McFert who was riding with her, asked.

"Well comrades, I have been planning it all, have been thinking the matter over, and during the meeting Violet, and her sisters had proposed that it will be better to do so directly we catch up with them. Then we'll crash upon some part of the camp, perilous as it is and give them a big hot surprise. We can get away in the night."

"And do you think Gertrude that our force of child scouts, and the Abyssinian squadron will be able to thrash the lot of them without any loss? They're dangerous fighters you know, being the Mangaboo, and they're as courageous as we are."

"No Penrod, I do not say we'll ever be able to thrash the lot of them, not if they get reinforced, and they are more numerous than you say, for I know them more than you do, but with our weapons we shall be able to wipe out the ones who stole our animals. If we wait till morning to make the attack, they'll find out how few in numbers we are and having no dread of our weapons, or of our own savage fierceness, may even have a long fight, and over power us in spite of them. We shall be going to have a long range fight, and I know our weapons will outrange theirs. Another thing Penrod is I want to give them a lesson by driving a file of fierce rangers of an assault upon some part of their camp where their wagon train is. They so must be made to see that they shan't come and raid us with impunity."

Scarcely another word was exchanged for the next hour, but they rode on in a way to cut off the raiders from their main camp. They went along at a steady gallop. Indeed despite the gloom there was no difficulty in following the pathways, for the long grass was trampled in wide swaths.

Quite often too, exclamation of rage burst from them as they came across a dead sheep or cow, evidently shot by the Glandelinian vandals because these animals could not continue on or keep up with the rest. After passing twenty of them Gertrude gave the signalled order for the halt, while she then leaped off her horse by the side of one of the sheep, and put her hand upon its body, and into its mouth.

"It's quite dead—surely isn't it Gertrude?" one of the girls said.

"It is, I never even expected it to be alive."

And crumpling something to herself, she leaped upon her horse, again.

"Why did you stop for?" asked Violet.

"Because I wanted to find out how warm the sheep's body was. If we try again after riding ahead for about another half hour or so, we shall be able to judge, by the increased heat of the others we find dead as to how much we have gained on the enemy and whether they're far ahead. You see Penrod, when I was in North American countries, I was once in the State of Texas and learned much about Indian Methods, who are however a much gentler enemy than these Glandelinians are. One had to keep their eyes open then, but not so much as here, for the Glandelinians are every bit as brave as we are. Don't push on so fast Princesses. Sure your horses, you will want all they've got in them before we are through. I believe we are gaining on them fast now. You see the dead sheep and other animals lie every hundred yards or so instead of every quarter of a mile. The Mangaboo Glandelinians understand well enough that it would cost them far longer than a whole day for any one too far away from the Christian lines to collect a large troop for pursuit, and would have no idea of our strength of numbers, and so I'll expect that they will now have slackened their pace a little, to give the captured animals breathing time."

After riding on for another ten or fifteen minutes without a stop, Gertrude again alighted, and found a very great increase of the warmth of the bodies of the animals and sheep.

"I do not believe they have been dead much more than fifteen minutes or so, keep a sharp lookout you boys in the waggon, we may see them at the top of the next small hill."

Not a single word was exchanged for the next few minutes and they were riding along a little faster. They crossed four slight swells covered thickly with trees, and saw no signs of the enemy, but upon breasting a rather higher rise than before and which was completely clear of trees, but covered with very high grass, they saw a column of cavally far ahead, and a mass of moving animals in the distance. These had only about two more hours ride to reach general Tamerlane's army safely.

"Gertrude again signalled the order to halt, and as all the whole force at another signal swung into a long thin line, she signalled to them to dismount, and that only their heads should show against the top. Then she said to her orderlies:

"Here hold my horse, loosen the saddle girths of yours too George, and let it breathe freely. Take the riddle out of its mouth. It seemed to me by the fling of our enemies, that they were just stopping. I'm going on on foot to make sure of it."

So saying Gertrude again strode forward a short distance, but going on hands and knees as she came to the crest of the rise in order that her head might not show above the long grass and weeds. When she reached it she observed at once that her first suspicion had been correct. At a distance of over half a mile a large mass of animal animals were collected, and round them were scattered a large number of horses, while figures of men were moving among them, while a little further in advance in square formation was a large body of Mangaboo Glandelinian cavally. They were fifteen thousand in number.

"It is as I thought Penrod," she said when she rejoined her comrades. "They have stopped for a while not to rest but because they're suspicious of being followed. The animals however must have been done completely up, they cannot have come less than five miles, and will require a long rest at the least before they're fit to travel again. These smaller red objects that appear to be some of our own comrades as their prisoners, are enemy child scouts in disguise, and they seem to be the directors of the enemy column. One half hour will do for our horses. Ince their mouths out with water, give the whole force these orders, and then let them gaze if they are disposed, and so'll give them all they want."

As the whole column soon had attended to their horses, which they hobbled to prevent their running off too far, and all set down to have a slight meal. Some of them however felt very hungry, for the excitement of the approaching combat having driven away the sharp appetites that they would have gained help for the fury of the attacks of the chimacout regiments. She now with a shout of him. Seeing the repulse of the Glanuelians Gertrude rose with a shout of glee now ran to her horse which was trembling in every limb, and struggling wildly to escape, soothed it by patting it, loosed its bonds, sprang into the saddle, and calling to her followers went off at a full gallop in the direction by which she had come. She had not ridden very far before she finally heard in the still night air, the repeated sounds of heavily heavy feet, and knew that the mere remainder of her force were either upon the trail of the animamims and fighting the retreating Glanuelians. Gertrude had not the slightest fear of the enemy pursuing them now, she felt positively sure that the awful slaughter of the night by the now and mysterious remnant and by the repeated assaults of her hands together with the effects of the grenade rockets would have terrified the Glanuelians far enough and crowded them so much that they could thin nothing anywhere else but of fleeing for their lives. She however was somewhat alarmed when after a do. The nearer they come the darker is their color."

"We must be the eye of the storm," said Gertrude. "If they're Christian, we'll not answer. If not, we'll go on forward with hostile intentions."

The signal was given. The women and little child were supposed to have been persons. The signal was given. The women and little child were supposed to have been persons. The signal was given. The women and little child were supposed to have been persons.

"Halloo, halloo-o-o-o," cried Gertrude, forming a circle with her hands. "Halloo, whom cavally to be over, under, and the answer."

"Christian cavally of Abyssinians, with Princesses of Abileanna Violet, and her sisters, and Gertrude Angeline leading." And cried out.

There was a sudden flare of lights from the foremost of the horsemen and one suddenly revealing a white flag rode forward followed by six more. In another minute they were all shaking hands heavily with General Jack, Evans, General Harrison, and others, and with Ludliffe, and some others.

"We got your message and came on in a hurry," said General Vivian. "As soon as your man Lopez brought news of what you were going to do here, we at once started the army forward as we were. Much sooner than you could have thought. We had started the army the moment we got the message. By nine o'clock my whole army was on the move, and we had agreed that the enemy would be satisfied with their booty they had stolen from you would never believe, and we had encountered on the way a strange darkness approaching, and we were prepared for an encounter, but it had turned out to be the animals, the horses galloping northward at a steady pace. There seemed to be many horses among them. Arranged by this time some encounter or other had been made between you and the vandals, we had moved on our force with much anxiety, and we are greatly relieved at finding you all safe."

Gertrude and her troop became an addition to the army cavally and now Gertrude decided of her own free will to bring her whole cavally force to her clearing camp which they reached in four hours riding. As they came in along with the cavally and general Jack. Then Violet separated herself from the cavally and rode forward with her five guards and to the right, then returning to the others. This she repeated at intervals four times, greatly to Gertrude's surprise.

"What are you doing Violet dear?" she asked. "I'm trying to see if the enemy is near by. As for their my intent to storm's here, I and my sisters agreed upon this signal before we started."

"Is all clear?" "So far yes."

In a short time three thousand could be seen upon the field in the distance. These were known to be none of General Vivian's soldiers. When they approached one of the companies rode forward to meet them, and they rode on. Camerline was on the move, advancing northward.

Then, when the army had halted, and daylight began to appear, the east five girls rode up.

"Are you hurt much Miss Armstrong?" she exclaimed anxiously. "Nothing to speak of—only a scratch on my arm. Poor Gladys's has not the force of it, and as I had Perrod thought they can still remain their seats."

"Poor Perrod, poor Gladys!" Violet and her companions again hearing this and the two wounded children had some difficulty in persuading the girls that they could wait on a fairly well till they reached home without being hindered or otherwise touched.

"And how did you two happen to get so ended?" Jean the other girl demanded.

"I will tell you about it when we have had been fast. I have told some of the generals about it, but for the time being, and as I am not doing for it, I suppose the animals have got back. Now many are missing."

"Missing?" "George Zimmerman has counted them. He says there is no cattle missing, and only one sheep is missing, and as I am not doing for it, I suppose the animals have got back. Now many are missing."

The servant brought it. The general opened the envelope, and glanced at the dispatch. He uttered an exclamation, which was half a groan, half a cry...

"Good heavens, what is the matter general?" asked Gertrude.

"The Glandelinian armies who won the great victory at Angelinia Agathis have been reinforced, and have massacred all their prisoners, and captured many of the refugees from the city, and have murdered them all, every man woman and child they could find, are firing upon flood and other disaster refugees and are setting new forest blazes, and starting new floods, and are burning towns and villages to the ground. Mylotte is retreating with the purpose to join them, and Viviania is in danger and retreating hastily toward Maximilian. Tamberline is reinforced by Tomas Peddernal, and another Glandelinian general called Bicknellian is coming on to join him, and the foe army at Angelinia Agathis, or who won the battle there is marching on to rejoin general John Hanson, army who is heading for Little Girkhool thirty miles or so away, and not an arm there to oppose them. Now after your divisions brother Hanson. We might be needed. We'll have to crush Tamberline and march for Big Girkhool I'm afraid. Where's Vivianah and Herb. They should be there somewhere."

A low cry came from general Hanson. This was indeed awful news, and for a few moments the two generals sat half stunned at the calamity, and Gertrude strode away to hide her tears, while from somewhere the sound of sad music came like a mockery on their ears.

"Let us go into the garden lot," said general Vivian to his brother "where no one can hear us."

"Yes, this is dreadful," said Hanson.

For half an hour they strode up and down the once fashionable garden, and indeed there could be no doubts about the truth of the awful news, for it was an official telegram from some spot near Angelinia Agathis, and as to the extent of the misfortune, it was frightful beyond comparison, beyond description.

"Outside of general Viviania's, there is not a single strong christian army near, Maximilian," exclaimed general Hanson "and if Viviania is the enemy he's good for they're five to his one. If he is worried in case he gets into a fight, those Glandelinian armies will have it all their own way, and at that town there are many thousands of families in danger, and there are scores which are foreign born, or who came from foreign countries. Maximilian once in the hands of these powerful Glandelinian armies will soon be a center, and the foe victorious, and the dreadful horrors committed by these Glandelinians will then spread like wildfire over Galverinia, and further. What was general Vivianah about and where in the world is he, and Reppo John Evans? What is the matter with their armies. It is as inexplicable as it is terrible. Is there anything to be done brother dear, do you think?"

But general Vivian could think of nothing. All the rest at present did not hear anything yet of the news, but the tidings would reach them soon, for now in Galverinia outside the disaster zones spreads from village and from city to city with lightning speed, and even general Vivian's army was only about less than seventy miles from Abbebaum.

"Had we better tell them inside?" the general asked.

"No," answered general Hanson "it is best to let them be ignorant of it for a while while, we'll let them find it out themselves. If you can tell my staff officers to come round to the messroom, I will meet them there, and we can hold a council over the matter, but let all the child scouts be ignorant of the situation for they'll need all their strength and fortitude for what is to come. I must go to Viviania's aid if possible."

And so clearing their brows, they slowly went into the house it being now nearly nine o'clock, and listened to the sad distant music, and joined in the conversation for ten minutes or so. But general Vivian was unconscious of the fact that all of the scouts did know the news of the disastrous advance of the enemy from Angelinia Agathis, of the concentration of an overwhelming force at Maximilian, they had learned of it two or three days before by the newspaper one of them had found and had received letters that gave details of these terrible events, and there was not a boy or girl in the whole regiment who did not know the full extent of the awful calamity, nay they knew far more about it than general Vivian did or we will ever know.

Overhearing general Vivian's decision not to say anything about it to the child scouts right away Gertrude said:

"You needn't keep it from us general, we know about it before you ever received the news. Our armies were defeated at Angelinia Agathis, and we have heard much since then. I am sure some one blundered in that locality, for otherwise the enemy couldn't have won, and would not be moving forward to menace Little and Big Girkhool now. If you go to Viviania's help sir, it wouldn't do much good, you haven't enough men to cope with Richardine Tamberline and the other foe armies, and your purpose would only aggravate the disaster. The best thing we must do is to wait until we receive a telegram from Violet, or any of her sisters. They'll advise us, or you, or Hanson, or any one of the others what to do. But take my advice and don't move from here until you hear from them. We mustn't do anything that we'll be sorry for. And we too must wait for help from some quarter before you move against Tamberline. He's got 100,000,000 men. You haven't forty. So be wise general. I'm telling you for your own good."

She then handed to him a long letter which she had received from a friend who had escaped from Angelinia Agathis and the general read it as follows:

"SEPTEMBER 9TH

Dear Gertrude;

I have bad news for you. After the battle was over at Angelinia Agathis, the whole town was set ablaze by the victors and forest fires added to the scene. I observed the flames breaking out at seven o'clock in the morning the day after the awful battle. I saw the whole battle. The Glandelinians on that fearful morning had first struck the Third Galverinian cavalry, and then got through the whole main line. The defensive lines along the left of the battle field consisted of the Third Artillery, the Tenth and Twentieth Divisions, there were also in position the Sixtieth Grenadiers, the Sixth Dragoon divisions, and ten batteries of artillery, a force that should have been amply sufficient if properly handled, to have crushed a superior Glandelinian army and to have ripped the foe victory in the bud. Unfortunately however the enemy let loose such a barrage of artillery to cover their assault, that they could not stand ground without meeting annihilation. The positions assailed were of great extent being nearly fifteen miles in length by two thirds of a mile in width; the positions of the enemy were situated at some distance from those of the foe, and the violence of the Glandelinian assault, the fury of the artillery fire paralyzed the christian line, they couldn't do a thing, though they had tried with all their energy, and the enemy carried all before him. The enemy rushed through the town while the christian troops were retreating before the pressure of their wild assault, murdered all the women and children they could seize who had not escaped in other places, and after setting the city in a new blaze pressed on, the resistance of the nationals being of no avail.

The battle was lost after nearly fifteen hours of terrible fighting, and even in the afternoon during the height of the conflict an orderly had been sent off with dispatches to the general commanding at Del Heidi informing him of what was happening, and requesting him to come to the aid of the sorely beaten army, and had he been able to do so he would have been able to save the lives of hundreds of refugees, even if it were too late to save Del Heidi, but nothing whatever could be done, the christian troops tried their best, but the foe captured even Del Heidi and drove all before him. Every one attempted to take the place of an officer who had fallen only to be killed. It was evident Gertrude that the refugees fleeing from Del Heidi were left to their fate.

The Glandelinians had pressed on victorious along a thirty mile front, pressing on all day, and the left wing of the foe had reached Del Heidi nearly at two o'clock in the afternoon. The assault was so fierce here that singularly enough Gertrude, this beautiful town of Angelinia Agathis which the aspiration of Galverinians and foreigners centered all, and where Emperor Vivian once resided, was entirely in possession of the foe, not a single christian regiment was there, not a battery for the enemy had carried all before him. It was at Del Heidi where the great horror of the battle occurred. As the centre of the province a large portion of the christian army was stationed there for a last desperate stand, some taking positions behind the great cantonments of the town, and had it not been for this part of the defense not one portion of the christian army would have escaped the disaster which had threatened it as soon as the Glandelinian army had started the squabble. The christian cavalry very strong it is reported rode out to meet them, and collided with them at once but the Glandelinian Phalanx cavalry drove them out of the field entirely with a cyclonic assault that was irresistible. The battle renewed here commenced a scene of slaughter, and frightful combat which happily is without parallel in history, suffice to say that with the exception of some half dozen of the christian regiments which were driven from the field, the whole of the Glandelinian wave met a fire from christian guns and rifles, that caused a whole sale loss, and this advantage h the reason for their recent and most revolting cruelty. The shock of the assault was most horrible and revolting however. Had the news of the combination of these Glandelinian assaults been sent by a swift mounted messenger, the whole of the christian line might have been started being slaughtered so terribly. The christian troops in the cantonment barracks, and so forth, fared somewhat better. Their loss too was considerable but the enemy couldn't get through their losses was too great. The refugees seizing advantage of this made their escape, and although many were murdered on their way, by Glandelinian pursuit cavalry, the majority reached a strongly guarded haven. The city of Delheldi was not so easily captured. Inside the fortifications, was an immense munition storehouse or magazine containing vast stores of dangerous high explosives, vast stores of powder, cartridge shells, and arms. If the enemy captured this all would be lost to a disaster beyond compare. Therefore Gertrude was it was most important that this should not fall into the hands of the argentine foe. This portion of the position Gertrude was in general Mantons charge, and was guarded by two batteries, of big guns, and one of machine, and a strong line of infantry.

The gates of the munition sheds were closed and barricaded, and every possible arrangement that could be made was at once commenced. The batteries were in position at once, these being under all available artillery officers, there being five hundred guns in all. Their orders were that if the enemy were arrayed against this position, the whole line was to open at once, and if hard pressed they were to fall back to that part of the munition dumps where the remainder of the battle line was posted. The principal positions of the vast magazines were similarly defended, and for the further defense of this position there were two centimeter gun batteries so placed as to command it and a small munition shed close by.

Within sixty rods of one of the gates, and commanding two crossroads, both railroads, were two batteries of howitzers which could be so managed as to act upon any part of the assaulted position in that neighborhood. All these guns had been placed in position three days before the "Storm," and too during the battle a train was laid ready to be fired at a certain given signal. On the enemy approaching the position, the battle here they say raged the most savagely. The enemy pressed over the positions but the christian fired broadside after broadside, sweeping away the enemy in platoons. The gunners stood nobly by all their cannons, the noise trembling the ground as if there was a terrible earths convulsion. The gunners however were suffering fearful loss, and the enemy finally gained one position and pressed the assault with redoubled vigor. Finding that no more could be done, and the christian losses being terrible too, the general gave the order, and several of the soldiers fired the several trains, set sheds and the wooden cantonments ablaze and retreated from the post position hastily.

Twenty minutes later all went up in a terrible eruption of explosions. Gertrude, the blasts devastated the city by the concussions, and covered the whole territory with a cloud of smoke and debris. It was calculated that one hundred to two hundred thousand Glandelinian soldiers were killed by the falling walls in the town or crushed under the masses of masonry, or slain by the explosions. The christian troops survived the explosions and effected their retreat in the awful confusion, through a wood. The enemy was so enraged over the misfortune that they massacred all the prisoners they had secured. The battle was a terrible one, and now the foe being strongly reinforced is moving on toward Big Girl hood.

I have wrote to you to let you understand how the situation is. So Gertrude take good care of yourself. I know too you are close to a dangerous Glandelinian war y under Tamerlins, and he has concentrated there with many purposes.

Your Friend.

Girlscout at general
Wienations army."

General Vivian and his brother read this with pale faces, and the officers under his command also had pale faces, as the general on his return from the outside, where the news had been discussed, told them the sad story.

In the meantime a number of the boy and girlscouts had entered the enemy's lines to learn something and found themselves in peril indeed, almost trapped. They were Fenrod, Radcliffe, Dolores, and Jane Melfort.

"We are as good as caught," said Dolores. "There is nothing to be done, I suppose Fenrod."

"No Dolores not just now, we must remain in hiding, we are in the hands of God, and can only invoke Him for protection. We will have to wait now for what may come. At present the Glandelinians do not see us, though we are being hunted as if we were rabbits. The child slaves profess their fidelity to us some believe them, and so do some of the others I with us,--I do not, it may be that they do mean what they say at present, but when they come to have the secret tortured out of them they'll confess for our presence is an incentive to the enemy. It is no use blinding the truth Dolores, we are as if we were standing on some loaded mine which may at any moment explode. I have been thinking indeed for the last week, indeed I have done nothing but think what is best to be done should we at any time enter the enemy's camp. And now here we are, if we try to get away by night it'll be too long to wait, yet if we do we shall then make for some other section of the camp where we will not be seen. It is too the strongest spot for ourselves to defend,--for there would be of no course of our getting away to the messhous,--and then we shall sell our lives as dearly as we may, if it happens we're caught in the open defense would be absolutely useless. There are only six of us here, and two of us girls. Probably but few of us could gain the Moon Hall in time, and if all did, our number would be too small to defend it. There remains nothing for us but flight for we have secured what we were after, and its very important too. The enemy is mostly on drill now. We could have our traps at the nearest door and at the sound of the first shot, we could jump in and drive out."

"But you Fenrod?" Dolores demanded.

My dear Dolores said Fenrod "We have so far escaped from the enemy's lines and are hiding in this old house once belonging to a farmer. I shall be on special duty to watch out that the foe does not follow us here, and if the whole Glandelinian regiment approaches and storms us, those of us who do not fall at the first volley will be justified in trying to save their lives or escape to the christian lines. I now the information by heart, so we need not carry any papers but destroy them. We have good horses, and we also have good provisions and plenty of ammunition. If the Glandelinian cavalry come here, either hunting for us, or on parade, the child slaves may make for them, and we who are mounted will as far as possible cover their retreat. So it is therefore arranged."

"But will the road toward general Vivian's lines be open Fenrod?" Jane asked after a pause for the danger now seemed or was so strange and terrible that they felt stunned by it, and regretted they had gone out at all.

"No my dear Jane, none of the roads I'm afraid will be open. There are three Glandelinian armies between us, and they also will probably be up. The only thing is to keep to a pathway for the first ten or twelve miles, and then if necessary we'll go through the woods and go our way on foot. I hate to even suggest it, but if it is our only way of escape, we'll note the winds direction, and if it is toward our pursuers, we'll send them a terrible forest fire. I have planned with one of the boys too. We can trust child slaves too I have secured disguises for us all, for us boys and girls and for those of the child slaves who were game enough to accompany us for their freedom. We must retain the bundles so they'll be close at hand, and in case of an alarm that the enemy is closing on us we must be sure and bring them with us. Remember my instructions are absolute. If we got to continue to journey by day, we must go on foot and secure horses elsewhere. However if you here those of the enemy who are hunting for us are too close, hide till nightfall in the thick clump of brush in the corner of the house yard, then run for that copse of big Parsley Parsley trees and try and find your way toward the christian lines. I trust I may be with you, or that I may join you on the path. But in any case it will relieve my anxiety greatly indeed to know that you have succeeded in following at my out my instructions. If I had to return here to search for you, I should bring my Glandelinian pursuers after me, and mine and your chances of escape would be gone--for I rely upon you all to follow my instructions to the letter. Many Glandelinians may be fools to escape from, easy to spy on too, but Tamerlins soldiers are dangerous. Remember my instructions."

"Yes indeed Fenrod" was the simultaneous and unanimous answer of every one every one present, who were deeply affected at the solemn manner in which Fenrod spoke of the awful situation they were in, for they were being hounded on all sides, by the Glandelinians and with bloodhounds, and the pursuers many of them carry horses.

"I have brought a fine pair of braces of revolvers upstairs which I secured from the manhall of a Glandelinian officer," he said, and will give one to all of you boys and girls to use with your own. Carry them always as you do your smaller guns, but put them on under your coats so that they will not be noticed, and if you do not well know how to use those bigger ones it would be as well for you to practice on yourselves in their use, but if you do not need to do so all right."

"Can you give us some pistols too?" one of the child slaves said quietly. "I haven't enough to go around, but I'll try and secure some more weapons but for the present you'll have to go without them. Why not make yourselves some lances. They're easy to use."

During the wait or hiding, and while Penrod had been planning with Dolores and the others, the escaped child slaves had spent their time watchout out for the approach of Glandelinians, and though in these days of tremendous anxiety and immeasurable peril, they nevertheless all were secretly in siding with their hoped for liberators. Very earnestly all these child slaves hoped, about their of them that when the dread moment came and they couldn't escape the Glandelinians, the danger might come when they were altogether, so that if they had to perish they might go through the same fate, whatever it might be.

The small bugles also to be used in the get away were standing in the rear gardens with hidden child slaves squatting near, or in conversation with some of their liberators, while the horses of the others stood ready saddled in the stables. However much the party hoped to be altogether when the crisis of their situation came, they feared it would not be so, for there was no telling where the persecutors might come, for at the first symptoms of assault it would be the duty of the more stronger child slaves to open fire with their secured rifles, even at the chances of certain death.

Even all the child slaves in all Glandelinian armies had heard of the sad tidings at Angelina Agatha's, and therefore all pretense of confidence which they always had had, seemed to have come to an end among many, and even had there been implicit confidence in the outcome of the other battles to surely rage the news of such frightful events, and of the spread and increase of the awful disasters, many other most frightful slaughters of children, had caused an on fire stoppage of any resort of amusements and gatherings which even all child scouts had previously indulged. As is usual in extreme cases of frightful and unseen dangers, the various temperaments of the child slaves rescued by Penrod's gang came strongly into relief at these times. One little child slave who was a bobbed haired girl of ten years of age was nearly wild with alarm for every little sound she would hear. Not daring to remain outside she had passed the early morning in going from one friend to another and she obtained advice and example from these, but poor comfort. Some of the other child slaves girls or boys were as brave as any Abbeinnian or Angelinian soldier, they had hardly shared the opinion of others, that the enemy could be able to recapture them all, but they were calm, self possessed, and ready in the worse and prepared to seal sell their lives dearly.

"It's no use crying my little dear," one of them said to the more frightened child slave. "Our liberators too have enough to worry them without being shaken by our tears. Death after all can come only once, and it's better to die by fighting our slavers than by being slaughtered when defenseless."

But there were no tears being shed among those of the child scouts. They were used to peril, defied any foe and feared nothing. The girlscoots were always quiet in perilous situations, but fiercest when assaulted. They however clasped hands with a pressure which meant much, but among them lips did not quiver, and tears did not drop, may even Penrod ate a small lunch for they had for so many days borne the terrible strain of the horrible experiences of the immeasurable war with such heroic fortitude, that they were now as used to it as if they were merely going to a garden party, and many times they even laughed among each other, and played a small game.

"I am glad we can depend on the child slaves who are armed with the rifles," said Radcliffe. "But it seems at present as if as if the enemy has made up his mind not to search for us, and we may be able to get to the christian lines with a lighter sort of travel and no adventure after all, so if nothing happens soon I'm going to see if we can find something before I go to renew my scouting. But nevertheless remember my instructions. And don't let the rascals secure one child slave."

In the meantime Jane Melfort was faithfully carried out her commission as to the sorting of the uniforms. They all understand that Jane had all the information about the enemy she could carry in her little brain. Finally it came the time for Penrod to part from them.

"Good-bye you all and watch over and protect you all until we meet again," such was the solemn leave taking, with which he and his followers parted, if only for an hour or two—since they were out here so close to the foe lines. For only ten minutes after he had gone the others recalling most of the slaves into the house searched the house over for further weapons.

There was however suddenly a strange sound in the air, and every one looked at each other.

"What does it mean?" quavered Jane.

"Something is going to happen!" said Dolores.

"Girls," said Radcliffe, "put your brown shawls around you. It may be nothing but it's better to be prepared. Get the bottles out. James Greene put a small bottle of brandy in your pocket, and let us fill our pockets with what we can find here to eat."

Silently and quietly the others did as he told them.

"There is that big box full of biscuits," one of them said when they had filled their pockets. "Let us empty it into the cloth, and tie it up. Now if you girls will put your shawls on I will glance in at the stables."

In a couple of minutes he returned.

"The horses are all ready but there's not a soul to be seen," he said. "Ah is that you Jane. Do you know what is the matter. Everything is so unusually quiet."

Jane shook her head. "I'm afraid we're spotted," she answered.

"Now Jane, get ready to start," said Mildred. "You others come with me, we will put one of the horses into the wagon."

They were leaving the room when they heard the sound of a rifle. As if it were a signal in a moment the air rang with rifle shots, shouts and yells, and blasphemies. The boys and girls leaped back into the room.

"Quick for your lives you little children!" to the slaves, some of them are not fifty yards off. To the bushes. Be scouts will cover your escape and follow you afterwards."

"The slaves with the rifles will stay here and fight too," said they, and waited. The Glandelinians came with a rush, and all opened fire as if they were practicing pistol and rifle shooting. And any one seeing them would have wondered at the faces of these young child scouts and braver child slaves, engaged apparently as it would seem in the amusement of pistol and rifle practice, but it was not so for the Glandelinians. There was no smile on their little faces no merry laugh when the ball picked off a foe no triumphant shout even at a successful shot. Their faces were set, earnest, and had a distorted fury in them. Scarcely a word was said. Each loaded in silence, always put themselves at a new firing point, and aimed steadily and seriously, the boys with an angry eye and frowning brow, as they fired at the deadly foe, the girls as earnestly, and without any of the nervousness and timid timidity which would usually be natural in girls handling firearms.

Even the child slaves who were armed, all of them could hit, and so terrible was the losses of the Glandelinians, while they couldn't get at their foes, that they gave way in fright and terror from that streaming rifle and pistol fire. It was but twenty yards to the bushes Penrod had marked as the place of concealment, and as taking advantage of the lull they entered and crouched down there, with their slaves, there came the sound of hurrying feet as now seeing no fire from the house the enemy gained courage, and a large band of immerminians led by one of the Scoddlie officers, rushed up to the veranda from the back.

"Now the Scoddlie leader shouted "Search the house. Those Christian dog spies went in there with a score of child slaves. Do not waste your time trying to capture the little tigers it's impossible. Don't take them alive. But look out they won't ambush you in the house. I know them little devils."

The Glandelinians made only a two or a three minutes search, in which furniture was upset, walls broken through to see that there were no secret rooms, curtains pulled down, and chests ransacked, and then a shout of rage gave evidence to their leader that no one was in the house, and he blasphemed.

The Glandelinian officer then shouted to his men:

"Hurry you wasted more time than you should have. Search the gardens, and gardens,--those christian dogs cannot be far off so soon, some of you ride out to the open space near the woods, no not the plain you darn dumbbells--they couldn't have gotten a hundred feet away, besides our patrols out there, will catch them."

One of the Glandelinians just then got out of the house. Just as some more of the Glandelinians were rushing up on the search.

"It's no use searching for those christian devils," he said. "I'll bet they have been gone hours. They're putting something over."

"Gone hours" shouted the enraged Scoddlie. "Who told them of our coming."

"Well we Glandelinians certainly didn't sneered the man. What do you think?"

There was a yell of rage on the part of the other Glandelinians, and seeing as one of the child slaves who had not succeeded in escaping from the Veranda but who had been hiding, they rushed on her, and a half a dozen bayonets darted into the child's body, and without a word she fell dead on the veranda a victim for her foolish presumption that her enemies would not find her.

"Now the Scoddlie said "Strip the darnplace, carry everything off, and then we will have a blaze to light up the country for though its day t its as dark as night and we cannot see hardly a thing."

"Shall we burn the barns too sir?" said one of the lieutenants.

"Burn everything you need not or cannot carry away. I'll show these christian fools something."

Five minutes passed in which all the valuable articles of the old farm house was carried off, furniture also, everything movable being carried away and the house and barns were lit in dozens of places with torches at once. The fire quickly set all else ablaze and in less than twenty minutes the whole house, and the barns were high sheets of flame.

The young boy and girls with their child slaves hurrying on soon gained the heavy bush toward which they were directing their steps. Two Glandelinians rose in their path, but Radcliffe, proved his well-earned nickname by quickly as a flash driving his long knife into their breasts, and downing a third with a pistol butt in the head. Another Glandelinian rushed at him and had him by the throat chokingly, but Radcliffe buried his dagger deep in the man's own throat and he fell without a cry. Then as all was clear and while Radcliffe was having his struggle, the child slaves cowered down in the shelter of the bush, the girls piling their shawls over their heads, and with their hands to their ears to keep out the noise of the awful din round them, and the child slaves awaited in shutt shuddering horror the result of Radcliffe's struggle. Radcliffe was through however, no more came, and the other boy and girls crouched sat, revolvers in hand, determined to seal their lives dearly. They could hear the commands of the Scodder colonel and at his order to search the gardens, they felt that all was over, and with a grasp of each other's hand, prepared to rally forth and die. Then came that poor little child slave noble yet rash sacrifice, and the boy and girls had the greatest difficulty in restraining themselves from rushing out and avenging her death. They were seen by the Glandelinians, and the boys and girls and the armed child slaves opened fire, and the night was hideous with terrible noises, musket and pistol shots, the cries of Glandelinians who were hit, the sharp noise of spitting revolvers, shouts and cries, and at times the long or shrill yells of the enemy who however couldn't forge ahead because the fire of the scouts was too accurate and deadly. It was too much to be borne, the Glandelinian Scodder leader was down dead, and the scouts feeling that for the presence of the child slaves not had saved the boys and girls replacing their weapons in the lull pressed their hands to their heads to keep out the din. Then they started away, though almost stunned by the awful calamity, too horror stricken at what had passed, and of the probable fate of poor poor Penrod, to find relief in tears.

By the time they had reached the edge of the "Harden" the fire had burned itself out leaving only smouldering debris and few upright posts still flickering with tongues of fire which marked the spot where the house and barns had stood.

Radcliffe was the first to move from his hiding place, and he touched James Greene's arm.

"I believe it's getting quiet here now, but they may soon come here once more and search for us. We had better retreat for the forests, and by remaining close to that berry hedge we shall be in deep shadow all the way."

The girls and slaves were now roused from their stupor of grief.

"Now girls we must all remain as brave as we had always been," said Radcliffe, "and carry out the orders Penrod has given us. Our Blessed Lord has given us protection thus far, let us pray that he will continue to do so, and invoke His Blessed Mother to cover us with her protecting mantle."

In another minute, the little party stole cautiously out from their shelter. Another Glandelinian suddenly rose in the path of Dolores, but she ran him through. They then moved close to the wall of a side door of the high garden wall, through which they issued forth in the open. But here ten Glandelinians too had been in hiding and they made for the fugitives. However they aimed good with their revolvers. Shot down all but one, made him prisoner and tied him up to a tree, relieved him of his weapons, gagged him and blindfolded him and left him. Ten steps brought them to the berry hedge, and crouching low under its shelter, they moved on until they safely reached a large clump of trees. Then for some minutes they crouched among the heavy bushes, the silence broken only by the sobs of the little girls. Radcliffe and James said nothing, but the tears surely fell fast down their own cheeks. The noise of flames of the burning of many of the bungalows near the woods could be distinctly heard, and outside the shallow of the trees it was growing very light, and it was evident the enemy was setting these fires for the purpose of lighting up the country to enable them to see fugitives. They only dared to sit there for half a minute, time and peril was so pressing, they being crushed with the immensity of the danger. Then Radcliffe aroused himself and took the lead...

"Now listen dears, everyone, the conflagrations have or are already burning down, and as the Glandelinians will soon shell all sports soon to try and get us that way we must be moving, for we should be trying to reach our own lines by the following morning. No doubts others of the fugitives who had accompanied us have hidden in the woods round this place, and those graycoated fiends will fire these woods to drive them out if their search is unavailing. Remember what our own orders are," and he paused for a moment to overcome and drive down the noise which or which would come when he thought of who had given the order or issued instructions, and how it was given. "We are to make for the Christ Christian lines but I'll doubt if we'll reach it as soon as we desire. Be strong and brave little girls and slaves, and all the rest of you as Penrod would desire you to be. I have gone over the course on the district map I have here, and I believe I can go on pretty straight, though I'd give anything if we had Miss Phoenix with us, as she knows the country to her own name... We need not change our clothes now for disguise, at least we wouldn't have the time, we can do that when it gets daylight if it ever will, though I cannot account for this gloom though it helps us in a way. We must walk all through the dark. I suppose as to be as far away as possible for the search begins, which may with the aid of the enemy's powerful beacon lights. We are acquainted with some of this country for miles around, which ought to make it easier. Come girls please take heart, it is possible that Penrod and his party may have cut their way out, and Penrod may be among them. Who can say?"

"I knew he had talked over with Nellie Hanson and George Manners the very best of the courses they would take whenever they might be pursued," Jane said in a more cheerful tone. "So they must have been sure to remain together, and if any one among them has gotten away they would put how are we to find out our way. It's too gloomy to see anything."

Neither of the girls nor Radcliffe had at heart the least hope, but they conversed as cheerfully as it was possible to give courage and strength to one another. The words of Radcliffe had the effect finally. Jane finally rose, and taking Mildred's arm said:

"Come Mildred dear, Radcliffe is right. There must be some hope yet, and so let us cling to it as long as we can. Now let us be moving, but before we do continue on our way let us all show our gratitude to God and His blessed Mother for having enabled us to escape from the enemy positions so far, and let us pray for His protection and help upon the rest of our flight."

Silently the little group knelt in prayer, and when they rose Mildred followed Jane—who had naturally assumed the position of leader—out into the open country beyond the groves without a word being said. The glare of the distant forest conflagrations was a somewhat dim, a favorable state for the fugitives as it afforded light enough to see where they were going without giving so bright a reflection as to betray them to any of the Glandelinians who may be patrolling at a distance.

The glow may increase in a couple of hours," Radcliffe said, "but let us hope we shall have succeeded in getting beyond where any sentries or guards are to have been placed on all roads, we must avoid patrols, as we cannot trust our selves on a single road and when it gets daylight if it ever does our peril will be redoubled. It's best for us to retain our way through and across the clearings of the woods till we are past general Tamerline's right wing, which is fifteen miles down this road, then probably we can go the road. There too is a sort of waterway a few yards on, and it is best to go through and stay in that for a distance it does not go quite the way we would have it to but I it will be safer to follow it till in case daylight comes we will be well out of sight of any Glandelinian patrols, searching parties, or others of the foe who may be watching."

"They scrambled down into the waterway. Just as they did so the whole ground two hundred feet away seemed to heave, there was a deafening crash and the scene was as if the very surface of the landscape near the waterway was bursting into eruption and emitting a mu cauliflower like smoke plume so dense mingled with black and white that it looked as if sculptured in high relief against the background of the dark sky. The ear splitting crash almost stunned them.

"Down low," shouted Radcliffe, and all obeyed instantly, and therefore escaped the fragments and debris that was hurled in all directions though they didn't escape the "cloudburst" of mud, dirt, trees, fragments of trees and like ground and forest debris that came down after being hurled up so high.

"When after the confusion subsided Dolores said:

"Well on as fast as you can Mildred, we can keep up with you, and if we hurry on we shall be able to keep our wits about us. We're under fire. That was a bang—bang—bang."

"I'll right," Mildred said, "I will go fast for a bit but you must not do yourselves up, we have a long journey before us, and we have to watch out for those shells, we can hear their scream you know, that one one before erupting the earth shrieked frightfully."

However they found it impossible to walk fast in the depths of this narrow ditch, and besides it was pitch dark between its steep banks, and borders and stones were lying in the shallow water for some distance, having been dropped there after falling from the blast. After going through for half an hour Radcliffe glanced at his watch and saw it was exactly half past seven. He then scrambled up and he said base ... looked back.

"I believe it's safe now, though it's more gloomy than before and the air smells of smoke," he said. "Let us go as straight as we can for the main wood."

None of them had never been hardly able to explain of their incidents of that only one hour following journey. Mechanically as if in a dream, they followed Radcliffe's guidance, stumbling across little watercourses, six times had to hide out of sight of patrols, had to tramp through hot coaling grounds, left by some passage of a forest fire branch no doubt, climbing at of and into narrow steep channels once no doubt country and forest ditches, now pausing behind brush as parties of Glandelinians rode past, with searchlights in their hands, now going their way through a heavy clump of trees, fighting their way through high weeds, and that one hour tramp seemed ages, with perils at every hand. This horror since the first beginning of that morning, and now closely pressed by other pursuers they obtained refuge in another heavy grove a quarter of a mile from the high way, with searching parties beating the ground and hunting everywhere around them, and flashing their searchlights this way and that. Then as the pursuers were gone, before throwing themselves down to a well needed rest, the girlscoouts and the little slaves at Radcliffe's request, tried to eat a piece of biscuit, but tried in vain, they however each slipped a little wine from the bottles, and then utterly worn out and exhausted soon tried to lay down and sleep but the heat wouldn't permit the well needed rest, and they could hear by sounds the searchers coming back. Once a flashlight glared toward them, and startled them but the Glandelinian who had it saw nothing and did not come. The glare in the distance too was on the point of going down because of such heavy smoke rising from the far distant blaze. However despite the enemy being so near the hour had passed very quietly. None of the searchers had approached their hiding place, but a party of fourty Scoddlers cavally no doubt a patrol, and not among the searchers, had passed by twice mounted on horses, and a larger party of Omarians had come along a few minutes later, but as some of these were using their flashlights it was evident these were searchers for they even used them on the bush and clump of trees.

From this the fugitives guessed correctly that the whole territory was being combed for them.

"Now girls," said Radcliffe a little sternly. "The first thing is to eat. We cannot be strong enough to continue on the way if we do not try to eat something. We have only biscuits and we will have to be sparing of it of course but we cannot starve ourselves. I and Jane has eaten quite a few biscuits and have had some water from a well or stream at a little distance in the wood. We can drink some cool water if you like, but you must each take a small glass of brandy to keep you up your courage and strength. We will have to stay in the wood for elsewhere heavy explosions are heard. But we all must retain and keep up our strength. So far its dark and now there is no one in sight and so if you desire you all can go to the stream and wash. Don't be longer than a minute, it would mean ruin to be seen before we have put on our disguises. While you are away cleaning up a little, I and those remaining behind will put on our disguises, and when you come back you can do the same. We can do it good."

The girlscoouts and the little slaves desired to have their wash first, and their breakfast afterwards, and therefore they did so in, and felt quite refreshed afterwards. Then they dressed in the disguises Perrod had provided for them, and could have at any other time indeed indeed he have laughed at each other for they appeared so comical. The hard awlward shoes were the only part of the strange custom to which they somewhat objected, but the sight of Christian boy and girlscoout shoes below the disguise would have betrayed them instantly, however they were determined to adopt them for going through dangerous zones at day or when crossing the fields, and to put the others on to be worn at night.

The boyscoouts presently joined them, Radcliffe in the dress of a beggar girl, and one of the girls as his accomplice.

"I should not have known you in the least," Mildred said, "... And as far as all appearances go I hope we are all safe now."

When everything was quite still quite still, they again started, regained the clearing, and seeing foam gathered near by still searching, they kept steadily along the edge, but out of sight. It did not seem to be quite so dark now, and therefore they had to be careful after only ten minutes they approached a group of horses no doubt left by the enemy, and after some consultation, the boyscout Richard whose disguise was darkest in color and not so easy to be noticed decided to steal forward and reconnoitre. If no one was in sight they would push boldly through the glen, if not they would try to go round. In two minutes he returned as the distance was not far.

"Radcliffe those are Mamboo Trooper horses standing there. I suppose they belong to some of the men of the Glandelinian cavally who are searching for us. If we could but secure them, we could so easily get away."

"Splendid Richard, why should we not try it. I can get two, you the rest, and one of the girls and we can sit on each, what do you can girls. Can you freed child slaves ride horses?"

"Yes sir."

"All right. Good. With our strange way of dress it would seem natural for us to be on horseback in this territory, and therefore we must start for any or stop I mean for any one who might try to demand questions of us. We even now are not at all safe, but whether they come up or not when we seize the horses we will chance it anyhow, and if there are only half a dozen Glandelinians two of us alone are more than a match for the foolish Glandelinians...."

"It is a dreadful risk to chance nevertheless, Richard, but I do think it would be the best plan. What do you say girls?" Asked Radcliffe.

"Trying is better than nothing, Radcliffe."

"But let us settle everything before he start as it'll be quite perilous," said Radcliffe. "Some of you child slaves who are youngest whether you may be able to ride horses or not may not understand how to get on, so we must that is us scours will have to mount first, that we may be able to help you more easily, and you would have less danger falling off if you hold tight to the saddle and reins. We can do it better however when we have gone about half a mile. Will you stand close to Richard when he mounts one of you girls, the others keep close beside the girlscoouts. The moment we are fairly in the saddle, and have got the reins in our hands, you little boy get your foot in mine and grab hold of my hand, and through that I can help you climb up in the saddle in front of me as you're too small to ride a horse by yourself. Then put your arms round my breast and hold me tight, because we shall want one hand to the reins, the other for a pistol."

Very gently, cautiously and with bated breath, they moved toward the group of horses. The horses were still standing and partly grazing. Very quietly the two boys grasped the reins, but the horses moved somewhat uneasily, and seemed to object to children mounting them, for horses you understand which are accustomed to men dismounted to be mounted by children. However the boys had just managed to climb into their saddles, (of two horses each) when a voice said from a distance:

"Why are the horses moving one direction?"

Then some other Glandelinians came running forward.

"The christian dog spies are stealing the horses." One of them yelled, and cursing fired a shot but missed, and Radcliffe brought him down with a shot from his own pistol.

"Quick, girlscoouts, and you child slaves, up with you all in a instant!" Richard said, and the girlscoouts as light as feathers sprang up, and help the slaves too. Get along.

"Get along!" the boys cried, and the horses at once leaped forward, but the one ridden by Mildred backed. Radcliffe gave a stick to her, and seized a pistol which was ready for use. As he did so four of the nearest pursuers ran up and mounted some other horses still left and gave chase. One of them gained on Mildred Maxwell, and raised his lance to run her through, but as he did so, the blow was only a glancing one though it swept away her hat, and she then she raised her pistol and fired, and the Glandelinian pitched from his horse, and fell to the ground lying face downward.

Startled by the shot the others hesitated to follow, and Mildred's horse darted off after the others also frightened by the shot. For a few minutes they went forward at the gallop, every one holding on as well as they could, but expecting every moment to be thrown off or shot down for the Glandelinians were pursuing for all the speed their horses could go, and both parties were were rushing down the road with the ener energy of a derby race. Shouts and cries were heard from the pursuers who however were speedily gaining, but Radcliffe fired on the nearest pursuers and brought man after man down for every shot, and one Glandelinian who gained so speedily that he soon rode alongside of the child scout, got run through by Radcliffe's own lance, soon all was quiet again, and not a pos pursuer in sight.

"That was awful Radcliffe," Richard himself said. "I would rather sit on a hot stove lid than ride so fast again or to go any further at the pace we were going."

The girlscoouts however had not said a single word since they started, and they especially the child slaves now slipped to the ground. It was not an easy thing for them to get up behind, for though they knew how to ride horses, they were too small to know how to mount properly, and several slips were made before their attempts were successful. The elder child slaves got up fairly well. Once seated properly they felt more comfortable, and they again went on this time at an easy canter. During this moment they had come to what appeared to be a worn out plant crossroad, and they turned alongside one of these now going only at a slow trot. It was a well marked path running in a parallel direction to the main road, and thin they followed for some time in the gloom though not at all sure where they were going. Then suspecting by the flagging trot of their horses, that the animals were tired from their furious gallop they urged them deep into the heavy part of the wood, dismounted and allowed them to rest. Chancing at the watch again Radcliffe was surprised. It was only seven fifteen. Did all this happen so soon or did I miss something? No, it was going all right. They found attached to the saddle of each horse was a bag with some forage. These were put on, the horses fastened to trees, and the little party reconnoitred a little to see if they could observe any of their pursuers, for it was getting somewhat lighter again. Before starting again when the horses were rested, the first care of the boys and girls was to remove the embroidery of the horse coats, and as much of the metal work on the bridles as could be got rid of in order to conceal the fact that the horses had belonged to a Glandelinian cavalry regiment, then they mounted, with the smaller child slaves behind them, and rode quietly forward, being very careful not to travel by the main road, as the news of the carrying off of the horses would have been generally known there.

They passed by several strong Glandelinian scout parties and Panfashu patrols without being observed, or if they had been seen it was evident they had not attracted much attention, for there was now nothing unusual in the appearance of beggar children in disguise partly Glandelinian. With all this excitement they had not yet been able to cover half a mile, so often had they been forced to hide. However after another one half mile of riding, and as they were passing through a clearing a number of soldiers in purple coats but gray trousers suddenly appeared in the road from two sides, and calling them Christian dogs shouted and commanded them to stop. Everyone was armed with rifles with long bayonets. Glancing behind at hearing a certain noise they saw another body of troops, and these on horses too suddenly fill up the road behind them at some distance, not only cutting off their escape, but come charging toward them at a breakneck gallop.

"Look Radcliffe, at that old leader with a sabre, that's the officer we got the important papers from."

"We must charge those on foot, Richard; there's nothing else to do. Hold tight if slave girls. Now everybody ready. Forward...."

They dug their heels into their horses' sides, and the whole squadron of child scouts, with the unarmed prison of child slaves in their center rode at the slim line of Mangabou soldiers. There was a volley from their rifles and the Glandelinians then fired bayonets, and during the secondary firing Richard felt as if a horrid iron had been drawn suddenly across his forehead, then they were in the midst of the Glandelinians, emptying their own revolvers with deadly effect among them, six fell, and two of the armed child slaves fell, and the horses of the fugitives still dashed onward, followed by the curses, of the Mangabou as some tried to run their bayonets into poles, only to be shot. A minute later a line of guns were again discharged, the rear party on horses having rode through the other who opened up their line to let them pass, and being able therefore to fire their carbines.

Their losses were considerable, six of the poor child slaves, was killed. Two private girls were mortally wounded, and Radcliffe heard a little startled cry from Dolores.

"Did you get hit, Dolores?" cried Radcliffe in a hurry.
"I was but nothing to worry off Radcliffe. Let's ride on till we outdistance them and then we'll attend to our wounds."

After going about a quarter of a mile, they finally drew rein, and Radcliffe found that a ball had passed through the upper part of Dolores's shoulder and had also hit Richard, for he was bleeding badly from a wound across the cheek. Fortunately it had gone through the flesh only, without touching the bone.

"Just a little closer," Richard said, "and the ball would have fairly went through my mouth. It's well for me it's no worse."

Mildred bandaged Dolores's arm, and Richard's face too was dressed. Radcliffe proposed for Dolores to stay there should make a halt for a while, but Dolores would not hear of it.

"On the contrary Radcliffe it is safer for us to press forward as fast and hard as we can. For it is very possible that we had been recognized despite our disguises, for Glandelinians are very shrewd, and they may have already dispatched some swift horsemen to the main road, and paths, as well as further on to stop us here, and now bodies of pursuers may come at any moment from any direction. Evidently they are as desperate in their efforts to catch us as we are as desperate to escape, and might have sent word to every patrol to search for children on horses."

"I'm positively afraid you are right," Dolores said, "and if we could turn off this road I would not fear so much, but the river cannot be far to our right and the main road is to our left. I'm sure there is nothing for it but to continue on our way. Fortunately the Glandelinian army is far off, the country is not heavily populated with patrols, and the forests are thick enough to shield us. And if the worst comes to the worst, we must leave our horses and go on foot again. I fear that is more tiresome for you who is wounded, but we can hide ourselves a good deal better...."

Just as Radcliffe said the last word, Mildred cried.

"They're coming! Rad, there is a huge squadron of cavalry behind and my heavens they're those dangerous Mangabou...."

"QA"

1013
Radcliffe glanced around, and far behind along the straight road, coming just around from a heavy wood of Parnley appearing trees he had seen a huge body of horsemen and by the flag they carried beside their National Colors he saw they were Mangabou Mangabou, and there were thousands of them.

"They may not be Mangabou, but if they see us a party will go off from them," said Radcliffe. However they are a long distance in the rear. Now for a race before any of them see us."

They urged their horses forward at a full gallop.

"Are we pursued?" he demanded of Mildred.

She looked back, and said:

"A large party is coming from the main column and they're coming so fast they're raising a cloud of dust."

"How much are they gaining Mildred?" he asked, after twenty minutes hard riding.

"They are nearer, Rad, a good deal nearer, but they have more than half their distance to come. We have to watch out too Rad, they're crackmen."

"We'll continue on," said Rad, "I'm hoping their horses must be somewhat jagged, and I believe they are, for I can see by their front designs of their uniforms they're Mangabou" for if they were not done up they would easily gain on us, and as our horses are getting terribly blown, but let's head again for the wood. If we can get in there five minutes before they get here, we'll be safe. It's a waste to fight with them."

By dint of fiercely urging on their horses, they finally entered the forest by a side path while their pursuers were half a mile behind.

"Another two hundred feet," Radcliffe said, "and then we'll halt. Now off we go. If they see us, and start after us we'll send them a fire. The wind is blowing their way."

Immediately they jumped off, and gave a couple of sharp blows with their hands to their horses, who dashed off at a swift gallop down the road. It was much darker in the woods than outside, and the fugitives hurried into the heaviest part. In less than five minutes they heard the pursuers come thundering past.

"We will have to push on at all costs," Radcliffe said. "Fortunately we have not done much riding and we can hoof it through. They'll come up with the horses before long, and will therefore discover we are in the wood, and will either search it through and through, or fire the forest to route us out."

They continued on for a quarter of a mile and the wood grew thicker. It was filled with an undergrowth of dry jungle.

"If you will stop here Rad, I'll push on, and see how far the forest extends," said Richard. "I'm afraid we can never get through this. I believe we are in the main forest, though it seems to be lighter ahead."

In a few minutes he came back.

Rad was close to some big river, or a portion of the flood, it is not fifty yards from here. On the other side is a dense jungle of forests. And some big fire is coming this way. I'm afraid I saw the flames."

This indeed was very serious news.

"What a pity we did not go to the right or west instead of this direction, when we left the horses. We now are facing two great perils, fire and the enemy. Even enemy. However I'm hoping they won't suspect which way we have gone, and may sent troops to scour or fire the woods here. We must push forward at all costs, and by staying as close as we can to the river, shall most likely pass the foe, or use the waters to escape the heat of the fire, besides the enemy will be quite some time before they'll decide to fire the wood to rout us out, as the fire would come their way instead of toward us, and as there is too much wood they'll not penetrate too far for fear of the main blaze. There, for heavens sake do you hear them. They're coming back, and from the sound they are crashing through the woods. We are followed. No let us go on again. Richard get matches ready in case we are hard pressed...."

In ten minutes they reached the edge of the woods by the stream. But they could see nothing of their pursuers and it was getting foggy. Keeping among the trees but close to the heavy jungle which was high enough to hide their movement movements, they went onward for upward an hour until it was about nine in the morning. Then they came upon a new road, and a bridge crossing the river. The river too had made a bend, and the road was connected with the bridge on the other side.

"Shall we cross the bridge, keep in the woods, or follow along the river girls and others?" asked Radcliffe.

"It might expose us to the enemy to cross the bridge," said Mildred.

"Better to follow the stream as long as we can continue on wading," Dolores said. "It is in the right direction toward the Christian lines, and we can go on much faster than in the woods. If we hear them coming along we can get into the high weeds on the shore."

"Listen all of you," Jane said a minute afterwards. "They are still following. I can hear them crashing through the brush, and voices."

"I expect," said Radcliffe, "they find the wood is not too much for them to follow, and maybe some had gone to the main lines to get help, while the others continue on after us. Trot on every one, the high weeds and brush is so thick."

here, we can hardly squeeze ourselves in. We have plenty of time, they won't be here for five minutes yet, and if they endanger us we'll set fire to our part of woods, and the blaze will race toward our enemies and they'll beat it, believe me."

They now ran as fast as it was possible for them, but the sound of the galloping of horses grew, louder, and nearer, and they wondered how their pursuers could go their way through the woods on their horses. . . .

"There must be a very narrow path leading somewhere to another bend of the river," Radcliffe said, as he glanced behind him. "Let us chance the peril and go in that direction, and if we are hard pressed we can hide in the jungle of the woods on the shore."

They breathlessly raced for the river again.

"Or may here is a boat, let's jump in!" and in another minute, minute, they started to push off from the shore, just as they heard a body of cavalry—for that they were the Glandelinian cavalry they could tell by the jingle of their accouterments (Those of the Christians don't jingle) pass at a full gallop.

The stream was strong and fast and they found that with the rule alone ears they could not make the slightest headway. To bring the situation more critical the boat was seen by gunners of some distant Glandelinian batteries, and the only reason why the shells did not hit the boat was because the boat was not within the range. Anyhow the firing wound bring the cavalry back.

"We'll have to land again or get hit, and go further down the river," said Radcliffe. "We will push the boat off so it'll float down stream and our pursuers will then believe we have gone off in it, and will chase the empty boat."

They hastily did this, and having regained the road, they crossed it, and made their way hastily over a large clearing in the woods. The distant forest, forests fires, which had been hitherto hidden by rolling clouds, was soon out in its fullest glare, and for some time they were compelled to hide behind the heaviest growth for fear of being seen, carefully avoiding all openings. The patches of high weed and other thrash appeared more frequently in the forest. Even though they were in the forests, it seemed Glandelinian batteries must have been trained on some portion for suddenly a solid shot crashed through the trees, and something hit Mildred and almost knocked her unconscious. When Mildred was lifted to her feet, she declared she was too badly hurt to go further.

"Mildred is badly wounded," said Jane. Her wound is bleeding bad, and it's a awful one too, her face is flushed, and her hands as hot as fire."

"As they were looking sadly at her, she suddenly opened her eyes. "Am I hit badly?" she asked feebly, trying to arise. "Oh my foot it hurts terribly and my arm too. Is the enemy still pressing us hard?"

Then she closed her eyes again and started to talk incoherently to her sister. "She will have fever as a result of her wounds," Jane said regretfully. "and we must get her under shelter at whatever the danger to ourselves."

"Just a moment ago I heard a dog of some sort," baying," Radcliffe said. "I'll go and scout. Richard and the rest of you stay here until I come back." Richard nodded, and Radcliffe then moved cautiously to the edge of a huge clearing. There he was surprised to see a large log cabin and outhouse and a Christian class. Three woodmen were just starting off to their duty, and getting a good observation of them he discovered they were Forest Rangers. One of them who was dressed in the uniform of a Forest patrol, was standing at the door, giving orders. Then he surprised Radcliffe by making the sign of the Cross. Cross and went in, and after a few minutes reappeared from the other side of the house, mounted on a gray horse (a horse). He did not speak, however, follow the direction the Forest Rangers had gone but went toward another portion of the wood.

"Those are Christian Forest Rangers," said Radcliffe to himself. "I can try and if they happen to be enemies only in disguise though he is a man, at any rate, at the worst, I am more than a match for him."

So saying he stepped out into the huge clearing. The Patrol started with surprise at seeing a young boy in uniform of gray appear before him.

"What are you and what are you doing here?" he demanded frowning fiercely. "believe boy you are my prisoner and—"

"I am Radcliffe, a Christian Christian boy scout in disguise," Radcliffe said at once, showing his proof papers. "I believe you are a Christian ranger, and tell you the plain truth, I have fellow fugitives in the woods, we are hard pressed, there are Glandelinian hunters searching for us in every location, you too are in danger, if seen, and three of us are wounded, and two are girls. One is badly wounded and can't get to her feet. We can go no further. We spied and secured valuable information. Will you give the wounded girls shelter?"

The Patrol Ranger stood for half a minute in thought.

"Glandelinian hunting through the woods for you? Christian spies? Well, through those stumps we are all kept busy fighting these darn fires, the whole country is red with little children's blood, and I too am in peril if they see me. I'll have a strong force here boy don't you worry. They're hundreds strong. You come to the right place. Where are the wounded girls?"

Radcliffe led the way to the spot, after the patrol called to about five of his men to come with him. The ranger glanced at her flushed face, examined Mildred's wound, and that of Dolores's and said:

"You sure have suffered much at the hands of your pursuers, and they were bound to get you. I will shelter them. My wife and two little daughters will nurse the wounded. They will be in my wife's chamber, and my servant's servants will not now there are strangers there. They would be faithful, but one who knows nothing can tell no news. On the other side of the clearing is my barn for my horses. It is empty now, and none go near it. You boys and the others with you better stay there for the present. When your two wounded girls' companions recover they can go on again."

"Couldn't you help us reach the Christian lines with them?"

"No boy, too far, it wouldn't be good for her," pointing to Mildred. Jane however caught the man's hand and kissed it in her gratitude.

He patted her head and said:

"You are good, brave children."

The ranger with him, that is two of them, carried the wounded girl to the log cabin, where the wife and daughters of their host (good Samaritan) prepared by him for what was coming relieved then not only with many expressions of pity, but were apprehensive to the fear of the pursuers coming there. Mildred was at once carried into the inner room. The Ranger then placed before the other child necessities of food and drink, and gave them some food with them. The child counts two bowls of milk, and some fresh bread and gave them food for the day. They showed their gratitude to him as before, and one of the rangers little daughters, the size and age of Jane came out to tell them that Mildred and Dolores would be well cared for and her wounds were already dressed, and the others then started in the direction of the horsebarn which the man pointed out to them. It was a large building of logs, and the floor was two feet deep in feed and forest grasses. Above was a sort of country lot loft in which grain had been stored. The two boys, boys and the rest at once made an agreement, that to avoid suspicion it was safer to occupy the loft, and they soon transferred enough of the hay from below to form comfortable beds. Then believing themselves secure from discovery, even if by chance some Glandelinians may be passing by, and some of them should happen to glance in the shed, they prepared to get a little sleep which they had missed the night before.

A little later when the Patrol Ranger came to see them he was followed by Jane Melfort. She appeared pale and wan.

"How are Mildred and Dolores?" were their first questions.

"Poor Mildred is as bad as she can be, her wound is a most dangerous one, she is getting delirious, and I did not feel as if I could even leave her for a single moment. But this good Ranger wanted me to go with him, as I'm sure he has something very important to say to you and us."

"Have you any news," Radcliffe asked him.

"One of my Forest Rangers tells me that the Glandelinian cavalry and infantry are searching the whole country outside the Christian lines. There is an unusual reward offered for all of you dead or alive, and any one whether he be a Glandelinian or any one else found hiding any of you fugitives will be punished with death. The younger girl scout you call Mildred is very badly wounded, and the doctor whom I hired said that she is in the hands of God, it's hard to tell whether she'll get better, she may die. The other wounded girl is in a serious condition and her arm is badly swollen. And if either one of them do get better it will be weeks before they can return through to the Christian lines. I'll have to send them both to the Christian lines in a covered wagon under a strong escort. I believe however that you and your other followers should should try to return to the Christian lines alone, and I'll guard the two girls. I will have told my servants that two girls scouts have been shot by the enemy, and they believe that puts us all in peril to have them here, and you yourselves can do no good here. If the searchers come here, you all may be found, if you are found they'll search everywhere closely, and may find the girls, and then I'll get it hard too. The orders are I hear, that if you are captured you are to be carried to Tanager's camp and will be tried as spies. I will hide the two girls scouts here safely until I can start on the way. If I am assaulted and overwhelmed by the enemy in case they spot me, I will myself journey to the Christian lines and bring you the report. You will please give me your names, and I will find you, or the name of your leader will be just as good, then she or he'll bring on their whole regiment and rescue them on the way."

However Radcliffe said he was very unwilling to leave the two girls scouts. Jane however at once expressed her warm approval of the plan.

"I'm afraid it will be worse, comrades, before poor Mildred can even get on her feet again, and I shall have an anxious time with even poor Polares. It also would add greatly to my own anxiety if I saw you were so near, and the Glandelinians would come and capture you. If dear Penrod has escaped to the Christian lines he will be in a terrible state of anxiety about us, and you could relieve him if you could get to the Christ Christian lines, and tell him where we are and how the rangers care for us. Together boys it would be much better for you and your other friends to go, for if the Glandelinians do come, you could not defend us, against more than two or three of them, and they are sure to come by hundreds."

In spite of their disinclination to leave the girls without such probable protection as they could give them the two boyscots finally saw that the course advised was the best to be pursued, and finally told the Forest Patrol that they agreed to follow his counsel, thanking him in the warmest terms for his kindness. He also advised them to leave their strange disguises behind, and to retain the uniforms they already had on, as disguises would do them but a bit of good, though he would supply them with extra good weapons. Too they would not attract so much attention in the gloom in their own purple uniforms, and could then by the aid of the continued darkness pass across fields, without being hardly seen.

"In the clothes you now wear," he said, "you could not do that and besides you show too much leg, too much arm, too much width of shoulders, and you are in greater peril than soldiers. I'll bring you some purple uniforms that'll fit you well, but uniforms that in case you have to disguise by day you just need to turn them inside out and they'll be Glandelinian gray. In a short time I will return with the things."

Indeed too it was a sad parting between Jane and her followers, for all felt that they might never meet again. Still the course decided upon was the best that they had to adopt for they must go and bring aid. In ten minutes or less even the Forest Patrol officer returned. The child scouts took off their clothes, and with some colored juice from some berries which the Ranger gave them, stained themselves a deep brown. The Ranger then produced a razor and a bowl of hot water, and some soap, and said that the boy Richard must shave his hair up to a level with the tops of the ears, so as to leave only that which could be concealed by the urban he was to wear. This with some grinning—the first time they had smiled since they went on the spy expedition, Radcliffe proceeded to do to Richard, and the skin thus exposed he did the same color as the rest of the body. Then they put on the uniforms given them. The Ranger surveyed them gravely when their attire was completed, and expressed his believe belief they could pass anywhere during the night, without being seen. Then bidding a grateful farewell to their friendly helper, the boys started alone on their journey leaving also the child slaves and the scouts with the Ranger. The shoes they found so difficult because being so light to retain on that they finally removed them and carried them... except when they were passing over stony ground.

They remained now on small by paths, and avoided all clearings as the Ranger had told them beforehand. Occasionally they had to go in hiding and suddenly to avoid a party of graycoats coming on horses, and once they did meet instantly with a party without getting a chance to hide, but in the gloom they passed it without speech or being seen, which proved that their purple uniforms suited the purpose in the darkness. For over an hour they went on. As it was toward noon and no daylight came they sometimes had some fear of missing their way, but they decided to remain by the road, for the road on one hand and the river on the other both ran toward the Christian lines, and although these were sometimes five miles apart, they nevertheless served as a fair index as to the line they should take. The biscuits added with such berries as they could find in the woods during resting times, should have lasted for two days, but if they would be out later than that they would have to obtain more food somewhere else.

"I don't know what to ask for Richard, and so we'll have to go hungry till we reach General Vivians camp. Otherwise we must try some sort of raid." They now could see by the glare or reflection from the glare of the fires, three or four scattered log cabins. They waited and watched for nearly fifteen minutes until one of the log cabins was to all appearances deserted, all its inmates who ever they were gone out to toll somewhere in the forests. They entered it boldly as they could see it belonged to an enemy sentry post. On entering about they found some loaves of bread (Yre Yeonly!) which had been apparently made there, a store of biscuits, and two bottles of coffee. They therefore foraged for all they could carry and took a little copper cooking also. They then went on their way rejoicing, and when it was midday, seeing that by glancing at their watches, they sat down lit a fire, with some dried branches, and put some of the rice which they had with them in to boil. As Radcliffe was stooping to lift up a piece of board he was startled by a simultaneous cry of "Look out!" from Richard, and a sharp blasphemous curse, and glancing up he saw three or four feet ahead of him, a Glandelinian soldier rushing at him with fixed bayonet. Just as he came close enough Richards pistol butt came down with a sharp tap on the mans face and brought him down never to rise again.

"That was a close shave had the boy scout would with a serious face." "If I hadn't hit him on the head he would have ran you through. I'd rather have met at close quarters a cobra than that Glandelinian with that deadly looking bayonet." "He was examining the bayonet for it appeared to be strangely colored on the point." "Why he continued." "The bayonet is tipped with poison poison poison, that would have been the best thing if he had only succeeded in slightly wounding you."

"It would have been best to suck the wound on the very instant, and then to take out a knife and cut deeply in, and then as we have no vasulians, I should break up half a dozen cartridges, put the powder into and onto the wound, and set it alight. I believe that is was they what they do in the army in the case of wounds from poison poison bullets, and this if no time is lost after the bullet had hit you is almost always effectual in keeping off the deadly effects of the poison."

"Well lad, I am very grateful to God that we did not need to try that sort of treat."

"Would you wish to have the soldiers cartridge belt, Richard. It has plenty of good bullets, and they're rifle bullets they'll fit our pistols. I believe we need plenty of ammunition."

"Thank you Rad. I'll take them on trust. Now we have plenty of bullets, and his pistols too, and they will do very well for both of us. I see he's got a smaller pistol in his waist band, and a box full of smaller cartridges. If we could have got nothing else we'd have to rely on our own small supply, but as it is he came along, and 'supplied us'. I hope by to night or to morrow we'll reach General Vivians lines, though I'm almost puzzled as to where it is now. The Ranger said it was more than twenty miles and therefore we ought to get there by to morrow."

"Yes I believe we could do that all right, providing if we go on and do not sleep at night Richard. But we have been traveling since six this morning, and often by fire light, and though we didn't seem to go very fast, we ought to get over a lot of ground, and now it has grown a great deal lighter. Listen there's the sound of a party of horsemen somewhere. Both deal their breath. 'Yes there is the regular roll of galloping horses and it sounds as if thousands and thousands were coming. They seem to be on the high road I should say nearly abreast of us, and now day coming on again we without our having changed our uniforms. Let's change them inside out."

And they did.

"Now how can we see who is coming?"

"If we go to that rise over there, we might obtain a view of them easily enough, and too there will not be the least danger, as they must be fully a mile away."

Upon gaining the rise in question, they saw a big regiment in ash gray uniforms, winding along the road, but on the full gallop. They were wheelers. The Klan Klan of the Glandelinians.

"Are they just a big patrol, or the main cavalry?"

"It's more than any one could say," answered Radcliffe. "But I see there are mounted officers riding at the head of the regiment, and they got tri flags, one their National, one of their State, and a Band flag or banner, and there is perfect order being observed in its galloping, and there is nothing that in any way differs from its ordinary aspect. They're dangerous and we got to be sure they do not see us. If they do we'll not escape."

"But we go back and get our provisions and quota, Richard. We surely cannot afford to lose any of that, and if we go out a trot for a couple of miles we can get round into some heavy brush near the road, where we can get a good glimpse of their faces. If the mounted men were Christians all right if not they're Glandelinians. You understand we cannot take every one we see in gray as foes, for our own cavalry when out scouting usually wears gray too."

Half an hour's trot brought them to a good point of vantage, and just as they had desired. They then crouched in some hedge or bushes at the edge of the denser portion of the forest, not ten yards from the road, and then awaited the passage of the regiment. They had only been in their hiding places for two minutes when the head of the column appeared.

"They sure do talk gallop in very good order, Rad, do you believe they're really 'wheelers' or Cavalry or 'hangaboos'?"

"I cannot tell yet Richard, but those Glandelinians will want all our their discipline when they come to meet all our troops. For anything we know, in this territory we may be the two last Christian children left in this country outside of our own regiment, but when the news gets to Abbeville, there will be such a cry throughout the land that if it needed many hundreds of millions of men to win back Calve-inia I believe they could be found and sent out. There are six mounted officers. I can't see the color of their flags as it is not light enough, but I'm sure they are the Glandelinian Guards."

"No Rad, I'm sure they're not. 'Wheel down' after all, they're Glandelinians nevertheless. Look, look. Don't you see they have got six prisoners. There they are marching in the middle of that column, they are soldiers however and officers, and oh Rad I do believe that the middle one of a boy scout, and my brother. And the excited boy with tears of fear running down his face would have risen and dashed out had not Radcliffe forcibly detained him.

"Hush Richard and do remain quiet. Yes it is your brother, and some of the soldiers who are also prisoners are officers. Thank Heaven we have seen them," he said in deep gratitude.

"Well let's go to them, Rad, we may as well be altogether."

"I told you to be quiet Richard," the boy scout leader said, holding him down again. "If you be so rash you'll destroy their chances of escaping, and cause ourselves to be captured. But we will rescue them if we can."

"How Rad, how?"

"I cannot say yet Richard, but we must wait and see, anyhow we will try and petition God to help us. There goes the bugle for a halt. I believe they have gone far from their main camp and intent to rest for dinner. Come Richard, we must get out of this, for if they do see us we'll lose our only chance. When they have once pitched their tents, they will scatter about, to eat, and some may come into this wood. Therefore let us get further to the rear, as so to be able to see them pitch their tents, and start their meals, and watch if we can, where they put the prisoners. Then we'll plan somehow to rescue them. We must save them."

The Glandelinian regiment had dismounted and had piled arms but they had no tents with them. Yet the ground being marked off the men were told to what quarters they could go without tents. Near a high brush but closest to the hiding boys the prisoners were thrust, and tied to trees, and two sentries one in front, the other behind the trees were placed.

"Now Richard, we have seen all, let us go further away, and plan how we are to accomplish the rescue."

To attempt this would be very dangerous however for to rescue them was of the most extreme difficulty, and the boys had no time either to arrange their plans as the column after their noon day meal would soon be on the way again. And had their been only a single sentry, the rescue attempt would have been very easy, but with two sentries, and with the strong quarter guard close at hand and the pickets near by also it seemed at first as if it was impossible for no possible scheme could be hit upon. The sentry at the rear must be the one to be disposed of, and too this must be done without the slightest noise, so as not to alarm the Glandelinian sentinel in front.

And each was marching backwards and forwards some eighteen paces to the right and left at the same time, they were in sight of each other except during the time of passing before and behind a very big stout tree, when they walked alternately, and the fat tree hid them altogether from each other.

"I suppose we could not have the slightest chances of blinding and gagging any one of those Glandelinian guards," Rad. It's horrid for me to even have the slightest idea of slaying a man in cold blood."

"Radcliffe giggled at this idea.

"Think you so," he finally said. "Well there is no help for it, but I could worry if the scoundrels all fell dead on the spot right now for all I care, for what they do, if he were alone we might bind and gag him, but as it is we must put him out of the way somehow. These Glandelinian scoundrels are all murderers and assassins. You know what Glandelinians have done. It is called a war, but it's more a merciless no quarter war on innocent children than any one else.

This regiment no doubt as the others may have been committing many of the most horrible massacres of women and children. Yet horrible as they are, I don't believe I would slay any Glandelinian soldier unless it could be helped but the lives of those prisoners depends on it, and to save even a little child slave from the enemy, I would if there were no other way either cut the throats throats of the whole regiment while it was asleep or attack it with a hurricane of liquid fire. This is no ordinary war, Richard, and you surely have been a boy scout long enough to see that now, it's a struggle for children's existence, a struggle of liberty of Church and State, and that I'm sure you hate the thought of it, I myself should not hesitate for an instant, for surely if they caught us, they'd show us as much mercy as a man does for a mad dog."

"On that case I would not hesitate at all," said Richard "but sometimes it sets a bad example for us Christians not to give the enemy quarter when there's no fighting on, and if the fellow had a chance to fight for it, it would be different. However as he would kill us all if he had the chance, he mustn't even think of grumbling if I do the same for him. Now Rad you give me full directions as what I am to do, and you may rely on my aiding it."

The scheme was then discussed and arranged, and then taking advantage of the coming on of darkness again, and a fog of smoke the boys lit a small fire in a small ravine, to boil some coffee, and finished their dinner with lighter hearts, than they had done since they escaped with their companions, from the Glandelinian camp, for the knowledge that a number of friends were close by had lifted a heavy burden from their hearts.

There was exceedingly great danger for the carrying out of their plans, but this the boys thought nothing of it, as they're usually very reckless. They could see the camp fires of the enemy, which they had made for purpose of their own roasting of dinner, but as the minutes went on these gradually became dimmed in the pall of smoke fog, and there was not the slightest sound, coming from the Glandelinians for Glandelinian soldiers also always maintain the strictest strictest silence when eating. As patiently as they might be, they waited until they guessed it was twelve thirty. The day too for so late in the year had come turned out to be (delightfully warm), and Radcliffe who had now a really wet piece of cloth in his hand from frequently wiping the sweat from his forehead, wondered to himself "Am I in Purgatory". The glare of the distant "red flag" was pretty bright, and gave a sort of ruddy light with which the two boy scouts could well have desired to do without just now.

"Now Richard old boy scout of our Blessed Lord, let's get going. My Our Blessed Lord, help us to success in this desperate and dangerous work."

They had to detour a considerable distance to approach the enemy in the rear (to avoid the main lumber) where they rightly judged the Mangaboos having no fear whatever of any hostile body being near, would have placed no sentries.

"Listen" said Richard as they were pausing to reconnoitre "There seems to be very heavy firing in the far distance. I wonder what's wrong."

There was however not the slightest doubts of it, faintly but quite distinct across the air came the sound of heavy cannon being fired in a manner as not to merely go "boom, boom" but to roll like continued and unabated thunder. "Those cannons must be fired in some artillery duel far away," said Radcliffe. "I wonder if it's at Maximilian. I've heard we're only fifty miles away from there."

"No it couldn't be we couldn't hear it so far," said Richard. "I'll bet on it it is not more than twenty miles off, and we could hear cannons at that distance any if the winds from that way. We had better wait a few minutes to see if it arouses these Glandelinians here."

But there was no movement among the Glandelinians who were only still eating, and eating as if they were gluttons too. Then the two stole quietly toward where they could see the six trees containing or to which the six prisoners were tied.

The Glandelinians had no tent with them, though their tents are large and circus like in form, gray and white in color, with as many poles as circus tents need, and one tent could hold two hundred men each. They are made of heavy and thick cotton canvass lined with yellow and red silk. In the day time these tents open right along one side. The wall of the tents being propped outward, with two slight supports, so as to form a sort of veranda and shade the inside of the tent while admitting the air. At nighttime, in the cool and cold as a seasons in Glandelinia, this flap is let down and the tent closed. The men when going in the tents retain their rifles. The tents of the christian armies are of the same form, but are stripped of the colors of their banners.

Being very hard and taking much work to put up this regiment had not thought it necessary to bring tents especially for the short distance they were going with their prisoners. Near one of these trees Richard or crawled, Radcliffe keeping a strict and eagle watch on the other side. When Richard approached the tree it grew so dark, that for a time he could not see anything, and to make it worse the fire glow so bright and distanced penetrated very dimly the forest trees and it was as if erebus had come upon him.

Therefore for a time it was hard for him to discover objects around, but he felt sure nevertheless that the Glandelinians would not go forth yet either. The ground was all occupied by Glandelinians still deeper gorging themselves, some were getting nearly on a spree from brandy they were pouring into themselves.

The uniform coats of some of the enemy was folded, and placed on the ground to serve for their plates. Six of these or more, with the same number of hats, (maybe they were College Professors from the shape of the hats) and sixteen cartridge belts, and one big uniform cloak, and all these Richard managed to use as a fine collection of, and by his signal managed to reach Radcliffe with.

"What was that sound," said one of the soldiers.

"Oh that was a bird, didn't you ever hear a bird before?"

"But in this fire threatened forest, do on your're dreaming. I'll guarantee it was a signal," said a Glandelinian child scout hounds are near us, I was one of their signals."

"Have shut up. Your getting afraid of the dark, like all kids are."

"Say Mr Scoundler, I can tell a child scout signal a mile away."

"Well toll it again. Go ahead and eat. Your getting the Film Flane."

"All right Scoundler. If we are attacked you'll remember I told you."

None of the other Glandelinians stirred though they too who were nearest had heard the signal, and Radcliffe crept quietly out, with the first part of his efforts accomplished. These uniforms were to be used by those whom they rescued. The sentries near the prisoners trees, were by this time changed and the boys gathering the things together, made all speed on their return to a large clump of trees on third of a mile in the rear of the Glandelinian horse. Here Radcliffe put on one of the pistols, and then started back again for the enemy followed by Richard.

"Don't give no signals" he warned Richard. The enemy are wise o to them."

A few minutes later the Glandelinian sentry in front of the six trees apparently observed one of his comrades, though somewhat smaller come up close to the end of his beat. He was in a great gray coat belonging once to a Glandelinian boy scout, and his face was tied up with a cloth to apparently being wounded, moaning violently, he squatted himself in front of the tree near where one of the prisoners was tied, and pretended to lay down with his hands to his face uttering occasional groans, and muttering in whispers.

"What of costs to encounter christian dogs in battle. This was all so natural for many Glandelinians suffer from bad wounds---that the sentry though he glanced at him thought nothing else of the matter. He therefore continued to pace his beat, turning back each time when within a few feet or two of the scufferer and looking at him closely.

The third time he halted and closer, the figure suddenly dropped off the gray coat, and with a sudden spring as if he was a phantom panther, threw himself on the sentry's shoulders, at the same moment another figure darted out from behind a tree. All this surprised the prisoners who were able to see what went on in their front. One hand of the second assailant---in which was a wet cloth was pressed heavily and tightly over the mouth and nostrils of the sentry, the other grasped the lock of his rifle so that it could not be discharged. The sentry was immediately thrown backwards off his balance, and utterly off his guard, and he was not able to even show fight, and in an instant the second antagonist plunged a dagger twice into his body, and he fell a lifeless mass on the ground. And it was only the war of an instant for the two boys to drag the body a yard or two behind the lines, and before the other sentry appeared from the rear of the trees, apparently the man was still on his beat in front, and the one in the rear then marched calmly on his own beat. The whole affair had lasted only half a minute, and had passed without the slightest sound being made.

The next time the sentry in the rear was hidden from the view, the apparent guard in front, stole up to one of the trees. Cautiously and quietly he cut the first ones bound bonds, and then whispering something to him, again resumed his beat. Then he repeated the performance and knelt down by one of them to cut the ropes that held his hands.

"DON'T be alarmed it is a friend. hush don't speak," whispered the boy. Then as the bewildered soldier, gradually understood what was said, and what was going on, the soldier fell on the boys' neck and kissed him with passionate delight.

When the first rapturous joy of the recognition was venting down, was over, the soldier demanded:

"The girls are at present safe?" Richard said. "Radcliffe is elsewhere with the rear. Front I mean. He is acting as one of the sentry. Now please sir, listen the others, and then let us sneak off.... Remove your shoes and boots if you have them, the clearing where there are no soldiers is only ten yards or so behind, once there with us you are safe. I will let Radcliffe know when you are ready as he will then occupy the other sentry. We can't allance him, and to attack him would be suicide because he is within sight and hearing of the sentries of the guard quarter guard who would come in too big numbers for us to win."

He and the other one who had been released freed the others of their companions, and in a few whispered words told them what had happened. In silence they swung round Richards hand, and then removing their shoes, stole one by one from the trees. As Radcliffe passed he warned them to be watchful. The next time the sentry in the rear was passing behind the trees a heavy stone hurled by Radcliffe crashed against a tree upon the other side of the trees. The sentry halted instantly with gun advanced tried to see what was happening, and then listened for further sounds, but he could hear nothing more, as Radcliffe was at that instant seized with a fit of pain and started moan moaning. The sentry stood in a listening attitude for fully a minute then he asked of one of his comrades who was sitting near him:

"I didn't you hear that too?"

"Yes, but I believe the noise must have been caused by some large bird in flight or which might have been suddenly disturbed in the foliage."

For another ten minutes Radcliffe passed back and forth, and forward, his only fear being that the sentry might go and examine the six prisoners and find them missing. In a quarter of an hour he felt sure the fugitives would have gained the heavy forest, and would have time to put on the too uniform before he himself reached them, and also by the aid of a couple of sharp steel filan g have got rid of their handcuffs. He might therefore go off and join them. He waited therefore till the sentry was at the other end of this beat, and then darted off among the trees. He believed he should have had at least a few minutes to start before they would discover his absence, and another minute or so before the sentry could be absolutely sure of it to hail the quarter guard, and report the circumstance. Then of course would follow the evident discovery of the escape of the prisoners, but by that time he would be too far in the interior of the forest, and would not be seen because of the deep gloom, and even if seen he and his followers out to be able to outrun any of the enemy.

His thoughts however turned out to be correct, for he was quite a long distance away when he heard the call of the sentry to the quarter guard, followed instantly by another shout and louder cries, that told that others had discovered the escape of the prisoners, then came the sound of rifle shots, a drum beat the alarm, and a babel of sounds rung on the still air.

But by this time Radcliffe was half way to the big clump of trees and three or four minutes more he was in the arms of one of his brother boy scouts. There was no time to even speak then, another coat was hurried to him, and cartridge belt placed around him, and then every one of the eight went off at a most steady trot when after one quarter of an hour broke into a slow walk---for in such darkness there was no fear of the Glandelinians pursuing them, and they headed for the direction they felt sure the christian lines lay.

"How far is it to general Vivians lines. We heard a lot of cannonading going on, and they're still thundering there."

"Not thirty miles. But the cannons are not at general Vivians. The sound of firing is mysterious and is some other direction."

"Have you heard Lieutenant how things are going on throughout Calvernia?" Radcliffe asked.

"According to vague telegraph reports, fresh regiments and armies are said to be pouring in from all quarters and they boast that they are going to drive the christians all out of Calvernia and right away too. General Winstons army is concentrating near Jennie Wrent town, what christian army really is at Maximilian no one can say for sure, but it too in is in the direct peril, for the enemy overwhelms it three to one. But they say general Viviana is advancing to reinforce the christian army there, and Nero too is coming with Nemo and plain Night Linger. Our own army of general Vivians is still in the same position, and another force is gathering three miles away to join but general Vivians is a mere handful to Tamerlins if the latter gathers his whole army. But we might be able to get him, before his other sections can be joined together. They are scattered far apart you know. So the danger may be exaggerated. At least I hope it is nevertheless."

"Do you believe there is any chance of help coming to general Vivians? If not, then for the present. The news by telegraph says that everything has gone down before the Glandelinian advances and raids and forages and other vandalism except Maximilian, Evangeline St Claire, Jennie Wrent town, and elsewhere. The beleaged are holding good at Vivian Wickey, and these are soon to go too. However it is believed something good may soon come. The whole of Northern Calvernia has risen."

"Are all the refugees in dire want and privations everywhere?"

"I'm afraid they are, thousands have been slain everywhere by the enemy sniping upon them, and by Glandelinian vandals, but there, we must hope that the refugees will even take up arms and make a stand. It will be the longest time indeed before even the whole country will get any real news, because the disasters have cut off so much communications. It's been only since June that all this horror came on, and not so long ago that Angelina Agathis was captured by the enemy."

"It seems but yesterday" Radcliffe said. "You don't mean to try to get to the christian lines this afternoon, I hope we could walk that far in that time if it is absolutely necessary, but we two boys have done a long days walk already, and for all we now we may be going the wrong direction. I never thought it would be so dark."

"No, no, Radcliffe. I only want to get well away from the Glandelinian regiment you rescued us from. They're ver-urmerannians and the meanest sort... To-morrow we may be within camp, if not, we could in case daylight comes to-morrow hide all day, and cross the open glens after nightfall. All is forest here, which is a good shield for us all, and as long as the fires don't start here we'll be safe enough now, and the enemy may be too anxious about what that cannonading is about to spend much time now searching for us. Now first off all we will need a small camp fire."

"The only place we had small camp fires" said Radcliffe, "was in small narrow dried up waterways, for to start one here, I'm afraid, as not only may we be seen as fires are scouring the woods for us, but we might accidentally start a forest fire ourselves, and its awful windy to day. The trees at times roars as if it was thundering in the air. 2nd

"I do not believe the enemy could observe it in the forests, especially when the trees and the brush are so intertwined together. We are at least four from the Glandelinian regiment, and we need some supper or we'll not be able to continue our journey till night fall. Now for pieces of wood."

The whole party soon collected a lot of good branches and smaller pieces of places of forest debris, and one of the soldiers was about to scatter some powder among the dead leaves, and use a means as boyscouts do of starting a fire, by rubbing rubbing wood together, when Radcliffe said

"We have matches sir"

"Oh that is all right Radcliffe. There we are fairly alight. Yes we have chosen a good safe place, there are bushes all around, and we'll guard the blaze so it would be scattered among the trees. If it did start one and it'd race toward the enemy believe me instead of stopping it I'd encourage it along, but I'm afraid it'll head for our own lines instead so we'll have to watch it carefully. Now he counted continued, when the camp fire had burned up brightly "but we hear the full story of what had passed, you gave us only a very short account when we first got free. Now let us hear all about it."

Radcliffe and Richard told the story, sometimes one taking it up, sometimes the other. There were many questions from those whom they had rescued and expressions of the warmest approval of their brave conduct, and one of the soldiers who had been rescued and who was a captain threatened under his breath that if ever he had the chance he would massacre as many Glandelinians as possible to repay back for the wounding of Dolores and Mildred.

He and Lieutenant Jenders proposed to each other that they should go back and give what protection they could to the child slaves who were rescued and the two wounded girls. But Radcliffe at once gave a negative to this idea.

"If they could be brought straight to the christian lines with us, I should be willing to say yes," he said, "for with us eight we might hope to get them through the danger zone safely, but even that would be terribly dangerous, for the larger the party is the more its aim to attract the attention of the Glandelinians who are combing the country for us, and the whole country is alive with these dreadful angelinian rebels pulverizing Calvernia. But as Mildred cannot be fit to travel for weeks, and Dolores too is wounded having as the man told me a shattered shoulder, we have no choice in the matter. They must remain where they are and we can only hope and pray for their safety. Our duty lies clearly to reach the christian lines first and then follow the trail and come to their help. Now let us be off on the way, we should sleep but who can sleep in this heat. The fire has burned low and in another hour or two it'll be late afternoon or three o'clock, however for us there'll be no retreat nor revel reveille, but just the same we cannot sleep. We've tried and the heat won't let us."

"And said Richard almost laughing, "what figures all of us so show in our strange uniforms. We cannot scarcely move in them and they won't be by nine or ten inches. I do not seem to me that we are wearing christian uniforms at all. Any one can see in a moment that they were not made for any of us."

"They're terribly uncomfortable, and the heat causes them to feel worse," Richard, the captain said "and as you say you can see they were not made for any of us. But we will have to use them, and as we continue along, any one who may observe us in the gloom may believe we are a straggling party of Glandelinians going toward the Glandelinian positions, while the bright of our Abbeannian uniforms would have told its tale miles off in the day time and even shown in the night. I shall be glad to get rid of it as soon as we can and put our own on. I feel as if I had gotten into a boys' vest by mistake. I have no big shoulders to speak of, as far as my height goes I am well enough, but I feel as if I'm in tight. I had to remove my jacket already and am carrying it over my shoulders, for I might as well try to continue marching with my chest surrounded in a vise. There Captain do you hear music. I'll bet those rascals are on their march again."

The strains of music of a Glandelinian march came very faintly to the ears indeed for they were nearly two miles away from the road.

"That sounds all right to me," the captain said, "now that they have gone away we can be moving ourselves. We must have given them an hour's start."

"Now sir, we have not heard of your own adventures yet, would it be too much to ask you to tell us. // 1110. 12"

"Well boys we soldiers have not so much variety as you, but we surely have through through enough to tell about. We were out scouting at the time course ourselves, and were caught empty handed in a old red schoolhouse in the country by Glandelinians roaming through the region. We then conversed over the best course to use in case they would storm us, and what to come, come when the assault might."

We had arranged what each one of us should do in case of the Glandelinians making an attack upon us, or of them surprising the schoolhouse in the rear, and as we had even considered the probability of being set upon if we were to be hind hiding in the yard, and therefore we had all agreed that if we were surprised by the enemy, resistance would mean certain death, for if we fought when surprised they would give no quarter and would shoot us down through the schoolhouse doors and windows, and that we would be as rats in a fire trap. Therefore we made the agreement, that in case the Glandelinians would storm the red schoolhouse, we should make a simultaneous attempt to burst ourselves through and out, and we even settled upon the window or the door by which we should go. My companions about twenty other men with us were of course to go off in different directions when once outside, except where as in my case, I had made other arrangements, and the rest to various points agreed upon, where horses were in readiness. The lieutenant, corporal and myself had agreed to go for the dense woods, as it was the nearest, and our horses were to be ready for that time.

There were not many of us who believed the peril had been so great this morning or we wouldn't have ventured out side the christian lines. A Glandelinian patrol only that morning had sworn to capture us, and as we found out the character of Glandelinian soldiery, we were surprised for it was very hard to believe that they could be capable of such fury. Swords and pistols of course were put on ourselves. I was sitting between Lieutenant Hanson Manners and myself here, and my Colonel Jean Monica and we were at it happened at the corner nearest the big window fixed upon for the bolt. Things went on all right till just our morning mealtime. There was suspicious glances from my boy companion here which I did not like, but nothing to take hold of. I pointed it out to Manners and we agreed that the plans arranged as was the best possible, and that as resistance would be of no use whatever, as the Turmerannians were too brave and fierce and if at each of the four windows and three doors a stream of rifle fire were poured in, we would chance a rush straight for the window. Presently my Colonel rose and gave the proposed signal. We all rose, and as if— as if I had no doubt it was—the toast we drank was the signal there was a sudden tramping in the schoolyard outside, and at every window appeared a crowd of the Turmerannians with their rifles in their hands.

The leader was in the doorway and cried:

"Surrender christian dogs. The Jigg is up."

Put I shouted to him first "go to Hell" and then to my friends "To the window for your lives, and with drawn sword I dashed at the Glandelinians who were at the window in front of me followed by my six others. And before the Glandelinians had time to get their guns to their shoulders we were upon them. You can see by the gleam of the camp fire we are all big men and our weight, and the impetuosity of our jump, and the surprise, and the wild manner in which I plied my sword, and the others following me fired off their pistols with good effect, were too much for them, brave as they are and we burst and cut and shot our way through them standing as they did eight or ten deep as if they had been reeds. They gave a yell of rage and astonishment as they went down as if they were ninetails, but we scarcely saw it, for as we saw our way through them, the rifle fire burst out round the rear of the schoolhouse. Whether any of the others tried to follow I cannot tell. I believe most of them forgot their arrangement with me for we heard a storm of pistol shots from the house between the rifle shots. We made straight across a mounted Glandelinian cavalry patrol before it had time to start the horses forward to ride us down, and with rifle balls flying in all directions as soon as the Glandelinians we had cut and shot out our way through recovered from their first astonishment, but though good shots at the best, nevertheless a man running at top speed in such gloom is not an easy mark in the pitch darkness. We heard yells, and rifle shots all around, and knew that while the cavalry was trying to follow us, parties were surrounding the schoolhouse. By the time we had succeeded in going over the few hundred yards, the whistling of bullets around us had pretty well ceased for the enemy had either all emptied their rifles or we were out of range, or they gave it up because of the darkness.

None of them who had surrounded the schoolhouse were near us for they evidently had not followed, and we seemed pretty safe, but we still heard the galloping horses of the cavalry following us, and just as we entered the gate of a woodman's house one of the pursuing cavalry soldiers hurled a grenade, in our direction, and in the explosion something from it hit me on the head, and down I went as if dead.

Happily my friends were near me, and there was the man with the horse. He had not dared bring it out until the first shot had been fired, I felt other Glandelinians would see and put him out of the way, but I was lying, instant it began he came round. They ran the horse up to where I was lying, I left lifted me on the saddle, and he jumped on in behind and drove out the gate as three score of the Glandelinian cavalry came rushing toward the house shouting to us to stop "In the name of the law" is as their way. We had fifty yards start, but they opened a roaring storm of pistolry and rifles at us, a ball passing through my horse's leg as he urged on the horse, and two of my twenty followers were killed, and six overtaken, and the others in the confusion got lost or separated from us. What were left of us returned the fire, and hit their leader fortunately which caused confusion and delayed the pursuit a moment. The horses went along at the full gallop, but we were not yet safe, for parties of the Glandolinians, were setting fire to the brush in the clearings to make light to reveal where we were and to which direction we were going. Two of my followers were maddened by the peril, and as the Glandolinians caught up with them, they died fighting. Two Glandolinians caught up with Hanson Manners, but he cut one down with his sabre, and shot another. A third rode up alongside his horse, and they went onward a certain distance at a racers pace both fighting a desperate, desperate sabre duel, but Manners won out. More of the gray coated devils rode after us and fired, but we continued on at a full gallop till we were out of the place.

The Glandolinian cavally who turned out to be "Wheeler" had good horses however, and three more overtook us, and assaulted Manners, but the lieutenant came to his aid and in the fierce fight the three Glandolinians were hurled off their horses. The Glandolinians pursued us for three miles, and half a mile further after another fight with the Glandolinians in which Manners though victorious was slightly wounded, a shot hit his horse, and though it was not seriously injured it began to slacken its speed and to go very leisurely.

We all had to halt, just as the other section of the cavally came up but we all opened fire and brought down ten of them down at one volley. Manners who had jumped from the horse on which I was lying examined to see what was the matter with the horse, and found as he had thought, that the horse had been hit. He had one slight bullet wound in the hind leg, and another a mere scratch on the head. It was evident that it could not go much further and they lifted me off and carried me to a patch of bushes thirty yards from the road sending the other horses away on the gallop to tell our fool our persistent pursuers.

"But why didn't you retain the good horses, they would have been very useful," Richard asked.

"You see I wanted to make the Glandolinian cavally believe we were still racing away and they'd follow," the captain said. "We did not now yet but serve severely wounded the colonel was indeed we all feared he was dead, and we felt sure too if the Glandolinians found the horses close to us later on they would be certain to make a search in this neighborhood and would have found the colonel had been close by laid up with a grenade wound."

"Happily I now began to come to," the colonel went on, continuing his story. The fragment was nothing and had only given me a mere scratch, it was the shock that had knocked me down, though it had given me a nasty fall, the wound nevertheless, and had stunned me, but I now began to come round. Instantly I was able to understand, where I was or what had happened, of our own losses, the captain and lieutenant who were half wild with excitement and grief made me promise to lie quiet, while they went to scout to see if help was near. Of course I consented.

They were away three hours but they brought me surprising news. They had first been to the meadow giving view of the schoolhouse and found it utterly destroyed as they expected. That told them nothing and they were to return when coming to a portion of the woods, they found a pocket army bander chief belonging to some little girl, and following a trail made by some feet which they could discern by their flashlight found by depressions upon the soil, that sixteen children of some sort had gone through the woods at the same time we were pursued. With hearts immensely lightened with hopes they were the "Terrible christian child scouts" as the enemy call you, and hopeful by the discovery we had made, they hurried to me with the news. I was past understanding it when they arrived for the intense pain in my head and my terrible anxiety as to our future had made me hardly doubt their words. It would have been certain death to stay so near the road, with the Glandolinians close by, so they dipped their cloths in water, and tied them round my head, and then supporting me one on each side they carried me to a clearing, about a mile away. During this time no one came near me. The cooling waters soothed the pain in my head and revived me more. It was then only a few minutes the clearing was surrounded by the same cavally who had been able to trail us. We saw at once that resistance would have been absolutely useless, and we were relieved of our arms. As it was we were forced to get on spare horses they had with them, and we were forced to go along with the regiment until you saw us. We had planned every conceivable means of escape, and determined that we would try to night which would be the last half before they reached the lines. It was very doubtful whether we would have succeeded but it was better to be shot down than brought to the enemy lines where we being spies would have shared the same fate as spies do. Indeed I am convinced we saw no chance of escaping, and that you have saved our lives, and now let us be on the march."

They had gone only a few hundred yards further when the conditions of the weather heat was somewhat increased, it was now still and close, not a breath, or air stirring, and three of the rescued ones found it was absolutely absolutely impossible absolutely impossible to continue further in their heavy disguise coats. They therefore were forced because of their excessive discomfort in the heat to remove them, and slung them from their rifles. Richard and Richard were perfectly fitted. Hearing suspicious noises among the trees they halted for a short time. Hearing nothing, they continued on, but cautiously and then found themselves standing on the shore of the same river, but five or six miles further up (further from the christian lines than they even suspected).

At this spot the river was quite broad, half a mile at least, and it was moving in such a way as if some of the flood was entering it as it was not only above its level but swamping the woods in some places. After crossing the river by swimming, they could realize they had more than eighteen miles yet to continue the travel before they even came within hailing distance of the christian lines, and it was probable that the whole intervening country was in the possession of the Glandolinian army under general Phelanina Tamerline.

"Had it not been best for us to have remained on the other side of the river for a bit had?" Richard asked.

"No friend Richard, it was best for us to cross before night comes so we'd be on the christian side of it for if we are attacked the sound of shooting would bring us help right away. We could make a straight for the christian lines from here. If we can't find a boat we would have to continue on. It was very easy going across for most parts we had only to wade and walk. The river is wider than its deep."

"Well boys," said the Major, as the weather was getting so awfully hot "We get to hiding in those big clump of trees as I hear the galloping of many horses. It won't do to continue on too recklessly until the coast is clear. These horsemen may be our friends, and may be our foes."

The majors proposition was carried into effect, but it was questionable whether any of the other party heard anything, for they had been excited by the thought that within a few hours, they would be with friends, once more soldiers and scouts instead of flight fugitives, with power to fight in defense of their country's cause and of the helpless women children, priests religious and other non-combatants exposed to the fury of the Glandolinian Glandolinian soldiery. With these thoughts however mingled the anxiety which was wearing them all, although no one conversed about it, as to the safety of the two wounded girls scouts whose lives were dependent upon the fidelity of the Ranger and his followers. Over and over again all of them heartily regretted that they had not gone back to bring them with them or watch over them, but the fact that it might be weeks before Mildred would be able to stand, and that as their protector had said the presence of so many near them might be observed and cause suspicion, and would be a source of dreadful danger convinced them that they had taken the better course.

They all understand too that in acting as they had done they were performing their duty, though sacrificing a good deal, and at this dreadful time when the fate of Christian Calvernia and Angelina State, and her their neighbors trembled in the balance, the place of every soldier and scout was by the side of all their christian soldier comrades who still maintained the old "Sacred Heart" flag flying in the face of the increasing numbers of the foolish and wicked and rebellious Abbeinnians known as Glandolinians. Still although they understood they were doing their duty, and more over were taking the wisest course, yet it would be very wrong to the cause to leave them too long and the thoughts of the two girls alone in the midst of the danger, with two of them down with one wound, and the third nursing them, tried them terribly, and they had the fierce desire for the excitement of work and danger of bringing a dashing expedition to strive and save them for who could tell whether the rangers could resist should the enemy attack them, and rangers were soldiers too."

"Here let's have a little lunch, and then we'll set to work, and try some means to cross that stretch of flood we found. It's dangerous but we'll have to do it. It seems a fire is coming this way and it's our only chance. I'll bet our pursuers set it. See how it flames! It's fearful."

In their excitement they didn't eat very much, and then as the glare came closer they set frantically to work, cutting down, breaking off and tearing up large reeds, and heavy weeds, with which to form floats. The boyscouts had long sabres which they used, but the others had been stripped of every thing at the time of their capture. In about an hour however, five big bundles were made. The rifles and ammunition belts were fastened on these and soon as the fire came dangerously close, they entered the water just in time as the heat was becoming unbearable and the flames were leaping four hundred feet.

"There are no Glandolinians, . . . in launches on the water I hope," Richard whispered to Richard. "I'd rather meet crocodiles than them in the water." "Nothing to fear in the floods except debris, and the chances of meeting anything as thin as this very small, and its not wide here."

"All right," Richard said... "Of course we have got to chance it at whatever the cost. But the Glandelinians on the water are as bad as the crocodiles or sharks, and sharks and crocodiles are fierce and dangerous too. Well here goes, and—"

"Halt who crosses here!"

"Quick, never mind the chain challenge" was the Major's order, and the bundles were placed in the water and lashed side by side with long trailing creepers which grew abundantly among the rushes, and they were thus secured from the danger of turning over from the weights on the top. Upon the rafts thus formed their clothing was placed, and then side by side, pushing it before them the party shoved off from shore.

"After them Christian dogs" cried a voice. "They're getting across the flood. Get into your launch boys."

However in twenty minutes the fugitives touched ground on the other side, and the Colonel, threw a huge stone just as the launch came to them smashing it in half by the force of the blow, and down it went with the persecutors struggling and cursing in the water. The fugitives dressed, examined their rifles to see if they were still in good order, and then started in the direction in which they felt sure the Christian lines was. Several times they paused and listened, for they occasionally heard the sound of horses, the sound of those still following them, and it was evident that the enemy was still close on their heels.

They were indeed relentless persecutors. They continued on for several minutes, until they thought they could not be far from their destination and had begun to congratulate themselves upon being near their friends when the forest they had left behind appeared in a terrific blaze lighting up the country for miles as bright as day and throwing a terrific heat, and at this moment the sound of a strong body of men was heard sweeping along the level opening across the flood stretch across which they were now passing.

"There is a small wooden shed ahead," Radcliffe said "if they're enemies they'll see us in that glare. Let's run for that, they're coming across here."

However by the help of the reflection of the terrible fire they were seen for a shout of "Who goes there?" was heard.

"Give me your rifle John" the captain said to the lieutenant, for the officer with the wive weight of his rifle and ammunition belts could hardly keep up with the others. They had just reached the shed in time, and rushed in, and closed the door as the cavarly swept up, and they were Glandelinian Mangaboos, with some Scoldier officers. It was a good sized shed about thirty foot long, and two stories high a big building of log format ion, massive and strong, with one little window about two feet square, and on the same side a strong door.

"Place everything you find against the door" Radcliffe cried. "John fire at once at them. Our only chance now is of holding out with the hope that the firing may be heard, and that a troop of soldiers may come from the Christian lines to the rescue."

"Surrender you fools in there" shouted the Scoldier leader.

"Come and get us," shouted the major.

"I certainly will" was the Scoldier's answer. "You think we Glandelinians are afraid of a mere handful of Christian fools like you. Forward men, capture them all. They're the spies we are after, and two of those boy scouts we hunted for all day are with them."

The captain however fired just as the troopers dashed up to the door, and a man fell from his horse.

Something was said about Christians by the enemy which is not to be written here.

"Now Manners, steady get your man as fast as you can," the Major said. "aided by the boys he jammed a piece of wood between the door and the wall at such an angle, that except by smashing it to pieces, the door could not be forced."

"Now he" he said "It is my turn," and he fired into the enraged enemy, but a ball came through the window and to the horror of within laid the major low. He was dead.

"Now Rad steady," said Richard. "We can't expose ourselves. Oosh there goes the lieutenant dead. Those Glandelinians are crackshots. Are you loaded again captain?"

"Yes Richard, just ready. But I'm hanging low. Or I'll be hit next."

"All right Richard. You follow, and be sure to take good aim."

The Glandelinian cavarly answered their fire, every shot of which from the survivors within was being very effectual and the shots from the enemy being directed at the door and window was not of no effect.

"Draw off" the scoldier leader shouted "hear any man hold the horses, front rank men dismount, and break in the door. Grenadiers come forward and hurl bombs through the window."

The order was obeyed, and the troopers rushed forward on foot, some preparing to throw the grenades, but the grenadiers especially were met by a steady and murderous fire which brought them all down. Vainly the others of the foe hacked at the door with their sabres, and battering rams and struck it with their rifle butts. A hand grenade was even thrown against the door three times and over with out effect. One landed inside the shed but did not injure anyone. Injure any one though it threw fragments of debris in all directions from the floor.

"Throw yourselves against it all at once" cried their leader, and a dozen men rushed pell mell against the door, it creaked and strained, but the big beam remained in its place.

"You keep on firing at them through the window" said the Colonel "to the second lieutenant. The three boys and I will fire through the door."

Yells, curses, blasphemies, and shouts of defiance and groans of pain followed each shot through the door, and after two or three minutes the Glandelinian troopers drew off.

"Any one else hit?" the colonel demanded.

"I have a bullet in my shoulder" said the second lieutenant.

"I've a scratch on my head," said Richard.

But these were the only replies... There was a defiant shout outside, and Second lieutenant Manners exclaimed:

"Confound the Mangaboo dogs, they have a big fallen tree that will soon splinter the door as they're coming with a rush and fourteen men are carrying it on each side."

"We must halt their purpose as long as we can" said the colonel, as he fired among the men who were advancing with the branchless tree. Ten of the Glandelinians fell but others were in their places in a jiffy and they pressed on as fast as the weight of the log would permit and at the very first crash given by the battering ram driven by the men, the ram came clear through pulling the men in with it, the door being shattered to splinters.

Being dangerously exposed, the Glandelinians who had been brought inside by the momentum of the battering ram, hastily beat it, that is those that could, but the others were shot before they could escape.

"Fix bayonets now" the colonel said. "Now Manners, you and I will hold the others at bay. Not more than two can easily come in at once, and their bayonet is no use against ours in so narrow a space. Boys you stand in reserve and go on loading and firing as you did before. If they get in of course use your own rifle bayonets, there comes the next assault."

A shout of triumph burst from the Glandelinians as the enemy came forward. "Come on" cried an officer on whose breast hung a dozen medals "Follow me, death to the Christian dogs."

He rushed forward followed by twenty of his men. But as he passed over the threshold he and the trooper next to him fell beneath the bayonet thrusts of the colonel and his companion. The next two pushed forward by their comrades shared the same fate, while as they fell the rifles of the three boys sent their contents into the mass. The colonel was fatally stabbed by one Glandelinian who got in running his bayonet through him, and the lieutenant was also slain, but the three boys with their backs against the wall opened such a steady fire with their pistols that man after man fell as fast as they came into the door way. Three tried to get in through the window and remained there dead, it was a frightful scene indeed, and at last the rest recoiled from the fatal doorway with yells of derision. It was drowned in a sudden crash of rifle fire, mingled with a cry of surprise and despair from the Glandelinians as a large body of Abyssinian cavarly led by Angeline Jennings rode in from the clearing of the wood, and followed their volley by an impetuous charge. The Glandelinian cavarly however were nearly forty thousand strong in all, only fifty having assaulted the charge and seeing their comrades in peril they advanced, one squadron after another, the vast wooded plain trembling beneath the syncopated stamp or gallop of many thousands of horses. The spectacle was both magnificent and terrifying. The shock of the assault was almost unbearable. It was sheer tactics on the part of the Glandelinians, but the charge came to an abrupt close, as an immense squadron, a portion of the main Christian cavarly came upon the rear of the assailants. There was a charnel hell for half an hour, more squadrons came pounding forward, a third and a fourth, and the enemy appalled by their losses and assaulted by overwhelming numbers of the fierce Winkies turned and fled at a gallop, and in five minutes but for the many gray and scarlet clothed figures lying on the ground, not an enemy was in sight.

"Well you three good boy scouts have made a stout brave defense" the officer in command of the first squadron said, as he returned to the shed, outside which the three boys had so bravely gathered. It seems if we didn't come sooner you'd have been slain. I see four officers dead inside of our army."

Then Angeline Jennings came riding up and released her flashlight on the three boys...

"Who are you boys my I am," she said. And where have you sprung from. It's hard to tell in this gloom and glare of the fires, and this flashlight is almost spent."

"Why Angeline Jennings is it you? You have't forgotten So Radcliffe so soon. And here are two of my new found friends Richard Mandors and another boy scout whom I rescued and he's badly wounded."

"Hurrah than God," shouted the girl superior scout. Then Our Blessed Lord boys you at least are saved, we fancied something was wrong. I am glad you escaped from the foe lines. I am glad indeed and she shook hands most enthusiastically with her friends, who while two of the officers who were colonels coming up, joined in the hearting greeting.

"Do those three boys belong to your Regiment of Child Scouts?" one of the colonels asked. "If so they're wonders for I don't now a case as yet where three boys held so stoutly against so many Glandolinians when their soldiers companion companions were all killed."

"I do not recognize the other two, but I'm sorry they don't," said Angeline Jennings. "This boy Radcliffe I know well, but his secret I cannot reveal, even who he is, what he is and so forth, but in particular he wanders from army to army in his duties and expeditions and belongs to no child scout command whatever though he has a whole lot to say over them just the same. But I can tell it though that he is a sort of near relation to general Conant."

Concentinian Aronburg and Angeline Aronburg.

"What," he claimed the other laughing, believing his superior girl scout friend and leader was joking.

"Indeed it is a fact, as you will see when they are in the lines and all cleaned up," she replied and Radcliffe, added, "And my two friends here are two as fine young boy scouts as ever lived, and now are we far from the main christian lines."

"No," answered the officer. "We heard the firing, and that brought us. The fire lighted our way to this spot and its burning fiercely yet."

"In the next place," said Richard, "I've got a bullet in my left shoulder, and one in my right arm, and shall enjoy coming supper all the more after they have been removed. Our stories are long and will keep. Let's see fur."

"Has there been any future news about the situation of Calvernia?" asked Radcliffe.

"The news is as cheerless as before, however that will retain too, now let us be off," said the girl leader. "Have we any losses among our troops?"

Colonel! "she asked of one of the officers, who came up for orders."

"One Miss Jennings."

"What is the enemy's loss?"

"There are fifteen hundred here dead, which can be fairly counted to us, sir, and nineteen thousand dead and wounded elsewhere further off."

"That's a terrible loss but I should worry for such fools," said Angeline Jennings. "Fall in you three good brave lads, and all of you too," she said in addition to the men who had gathered round, "and let us get to the return route. Gertrude will be glad to hear that these three boys escaped from the enemy."

There was a hearty cheer of great satisfaction from the whole troop for Angolinian troops were bound very closely together in these terrible months of immeasurable and most violent of wars. Then falling in, the two corps of cavalry marched toward the christian lines going by the same route they had come and the going was good as the fire lighted their way to the whole distance. On arriving at last at the christian lines which were stretched across the country near Pithelreda, the three boys were seen surrounded by troops, who had been called under arms at the sound of the distant firing, but had been dismissed again on the arrival of a message to the effect that the enemy had fled when repulsed in their assault upon a party of christian fugitives. The news too had spread rapidly upon a party of christian fugitives had escaped from the foe lines, and all officers that had the chance and the time pressed forward to press their hands or shake their hands, and the men uttered words of kindly congratulation and welcome. And the greeting swelled into a wild and loud cheer as the detachment of cavalry who had rescued the three lads fell out and scattered and scattering scattering among their comrades told of the desperate and scattering scattering inflicted upon the enemy by the four men who were slain however, and of by the boys too who fortunately survived as if by a miracle. The fugitives were of course first brought into the mess-room, Richard however being carried off by the surgeons, to have his wounds examined and attended to. It seemed almost like a dream as they sat down again at a table laid with all the brightness and comfort seen in a christian line or army, and felt that they were indeed safe among friends. Mary were the serious questions asked them by officers, who had friends and acquaintances among all of the christian military, and the fugitives learned that they were so far as known the only survivors since they first left the enemy's lines, and they began to worry about Richard because no one had seen him come back. The story of their escape, their being "wounded" all day, and the hoped for safety of the three girls, was told as briefly as possible, and everyone listened to them with eager and absorbing interest and also anxiety, and very deep and hearty were the congratulations, which the boys received for their share in their duty to their country and its cause. In return they learned what had occurred since the last or past ten days according to the fury of the war. The story too was not reassuring, and tidings of great evil indeed were coming from all parts. Yet where christian victories may have occurred, and where the Calverinians were rising against the enemy was comparatively small, but and too the situation throughout Calvernia was terrible and critical. In Angelinia Agatha, the foe had won, at Maximilian, Jennie Wren Town and Abrahamara, the situation was more than doubtful and the population of these places were fleeing.

At Poyjo Landin, and near Hendriea every precaution was being taken, but the approach of overpowering armies of the foe was regarded as inevitable. In fact everywhere, save in northeastern Calvernia, trouble had either come or was coming. General Anson was collecting with all haste a force at McCormick junction, which was intended to advance to relieve the pressure of danger at Maximilian—where a christian army was seriously menaced by Glandolinians under general Manlet—but his force would necessarily be an extremely small one to reinforce Viviana with, and no help could possibly arrive up country for many weeks. Therefore there was only from Abbiennia to expect overwhelming aid. Happily as the Vivian girls had stated in a telegram as they had shortly reached Wianstians army that his army was larger than any one would have thought, and that they were only waiting for word from their father to whether they should have Wianstian move to the aid of the armies threatened at Maximilian or remain at Jennie Wren Town."

"I suppose general Vivian's army is very strong here, as well as others?" said Radcliffe.

"Oh yes, his army is so big its crowded. We all sleep under canvas. General Vivian predicted he believed he had a force of 130,000,000 strong despite what others say. He's willing to move against Phelinia Tamerline any time."

"I intend to go leave to get up a troop of boy and girl scouts and a strong force of Volunteers," Richard said. "In the first place to go out and bring in the three girl scouts and child slaves and afterwards do any other scouting that may be required."

"That is hardly so now," said Radcliffe. "There had been a rumor of general Vivian forming the army into many sections of lines with the purpose of handicapping Tamerline, so I do not believe especially in your condition that you or any of us will get leave, because it will be a hazardous business to make our way thirty miles through such dangerous country, especially if the forests are still full of these Glandolinians probably still searching for us. But it'll do no good to ask the generals, you'll have to either get the permission from Miss Aronburg, Angeline Jennings, or Angeline Pichea, and they I'm sure wouldn't let you go because of your wounds. But you may try it."

They had just finished their night evening coffee and Radcliffe had glanced at his wrist watch and announced it was only five thirty, and were preparing to get ready, when just as they were mounting their horses, one of the soldiers suddenly drew their attention to a man coming at the fullest speed a horse can ever gallop toward the christian lines from the direction of which the fugitives had just come.

"What in the world can be the matter?" Radcliffe asked looking anxious. "What a strange thing indeed, that a messenger should come so fast on horseback. I wonder is he perused or does he think he is perused."

"Let us ride and meet him," James Greene said, and putting spurs to their horses, they galloped toward the approaching fugitive as he seemed to be. As they came close to him, his horse stumbled and fell, and the man was thrown and lay almost stunned on the ground, being for the moment unable to rise. The two boy scouts sprang from their horses, with a feeling of vague uneasiness for blood streamed from the man's head and shoulder, and part of his left hand was gone.

"What is the matter?" they asked as they quickly did what they could for the man's wounds.

The man suffered at the moment too much pain, and was too much exhausted to reply for a moment or two while they bathed his head in cool water, then he gasped out:

"The Mangaboos. The Mangaboos."

"The two boys gave a simultaneous cry of dread and suspicion."

"The two boys gave a simultaneous cry of dread and suspicion. Tell us what has happened? Tell us right away sir, put with it man. Tell us what has happened? Tell us right away sir, are they coming in great force to surprise and assault general Vivian's army from the rear?"

"No boy. The Mangaboos forest home is burned all forest is on fire a perfect perfect hell. Glandolinians attacked. All Mangaboos killed. I'm one of them. I escaped. Carry away three little girls and child slaves. He managed to gasp out."

The news was too sudden and terrible for the two boyscouts to speak. They stood white, and motionless with horror.

"All the Rangers Killed, the forest on fire. Oh, Dolores, Jane and Mildred. Oh God! It cannot be," Radcliffe groaned.

James burst into tears though he placed his hand violently rudely on his pistol holster.

"What will Angeline Jennings her sister do. Now we must persuade them with a strong force."

"Come James," Radcliffe said dashing away from the tears from his eyes, and starting to bite his finger nails violently in his passion. "Do not let us waste a moment. All hope may not be over. The Glandelinians may not have slain them girls yet and may have carried them away, and they may be alive yet. If they are we will rescue them if we go right across Calverlin to do so. Come help the wounded man onto my horse. We'll bring him to be cared for though I'm afraid he'll not live two days."

The two boys lifted the wounded man onto the horse ridden by Radcliffe and in five minutes they reached the Christian lines. Here they dismounted, and called Jane Lee one of the girlscouts.

"Let us go up to general Vivians headquarters, James so as not to excite suspicion. We must call the general or Gertrude out and tell her first so she may break the news to Dolores sister. If she learns it suddenly it may prostrate her."

Gertrude Angeline had just dismissed her own orderly and was finishing a glass of tea, and was standing at the open door glancing with a frowning frowning face at the sudden glare of light in a new direction of the horizon and therefore there was no need for them to approach closer. As she glanced round upon hearing the noise of two horses, Radcliffe making his customary sign which Gertrude always understood beckoned her to come down to them. For a moment she seemed puzzled, and glanced round carefully to see for sure if the signal was really re-directed to her. Seeing that no one else was near her, she again looked at the boys, and Radcliffe earnestly repeated the gesture, making also a flag signal with the flag he carried which she gave her the words "come at once."

Gertrude, feeling something strange was happening, and giving one more steadier and more suspicious glance at the increasing red glare, ran down the steps two at a time and hurried toward them. By the time she reached them, she had no need to demand questions. James Green was leaning up the gate crying as if his heart would break, Radcliffe stood with his hands on his lips as if to check the sobs from breaking out, while the tears streamed down his cheeks.

"Dolores, Mildred, Jane have not returned. Missing!" she demanded.

Radcliffe shook his head, told the story of how because they were wounded he had left two of them at the Rangers, because they couldn't go further. I thought they would be safe, there but the Glandelinians who have been searching for us have burned the woods, set the rangers home on fire, one of the men though mortally wounded has escaped and brought the news. We know nothing more. Perhaps they are carried off, not killed. We had decided to organize a force to go there and bring them here when we got the news."

Gertrude staggered under the sudden blow.

"Carried off?" she murmured to herself. "It's worse than death."

"Yes Gertrude," Radcliffe said, anxious to give Gertrude thoughts a new turn. "But we will rescue her and her companions if they are alive, wherever they may take her, and if they're dead, we'll commit a grand massacre."

"We must and will," Radcliffe said Gertrude earnestly, and rousing herself at the thought and asserting herself proudly for now she was in her dangerous mood, which cause all Glandelinians to dread her as they would a reptile they couldn't slay. "I must go up and give the sad news to Angeline, though I shall do so I cannot say, but she'll have to help us recapture her and get all her abductors too. We'll give them no quarter whether they do them girls harm or not. For kidnapping us or the Princesses you know there's no quarter. Do you give what orders you desire for collecting the force of troops. Bring out half the army caviary if necessary. First let us question this wounded man. I see he is a Ranger. When was it?"

"Two hours ago at three thirty. I and my leaders followers had just laid down in my hut, when all of a sudden I heard the galloping of many horses, and glancing out a window I saw the Glandelinians were surrounding the whole place. I felt sure it was too late for me to try to escape, but I threw myself out of the window, and lay flat by the wall, as the Glandelinian soldiers demanding of us to surrender the girls they were after, burst into the door. There were eight of us in that hut, and I closed my ears to shut out the sounds of the desperate death struggle within. Up at the main house too and other places I heard the sound of terrific firing, screams of the wounded and cursing of the Glandelinians. The Glandelinians were all around everywhere, and I dreaded lest one should tumble up against me. Then a sudden bright glare shot up, and I saw they were setting the log cabins on fire. The glare of the flames would have shown me clearly enough, and if the forest caught it'd be too bad for me, but I remained where I was ready to sell my life dearly, but soon as the trees did go by thousands at once, and

I crawled on my stomach till I came to a small clump of brush a few yards off. One Glandelinian saw me, and dashed at me but I hit him on the head with my pistol butt and he fell. I dragged him into the brush with me, and as I lay in their midst the plants covered me completely and my prisoner. In another minute or two all the other huts were set on fire also, and then I could hear a great tramping as of horses going away in the distance, and a Glandelinian officer on horseback with others passed me, and one of them said:

"That is what we do to those hiding escaped spies. Burn up everything." Then they soon had all gone for I could hear voices for a short time, and Glandelinians had been moving about everywhere in search of any one who might have escaped. Many came close to me several times, even an officer who was uniformed as if he was a prince and I feared they'd thread on me with their horses. After a time all became quiet but I dared not move until the heat of the flames drove me off. I jumped off, and got on a horse and dashed off. Then I was spotted and half a dozen chased me. They hurled grenades, and that is how I'm wounded."

Gertrude now slowly went up to the house, to break the sad tidings to Angeline Jennings. Radcliffe ordered eight Abyssinian messengers to saddle eight horses instantly, and while they were doing so he wrote, on eight leaves of his diary:

"Rangers home and sheds destroyed by Glandelinians, Rangers slain or carried off, three girlscouts and eighteen child slaves among them. For God's sake send us caviary quick as possible so we can recover them. Give kidnappers no quarters. Meet with caviary at Gertrude's or general Vivians headquarters as soon as possible. Send this note round to all caviary commanders."

Radcliffe."

One of these slips of paper was given to each messenger, and they were told to ride for their lives to every one of the eight Caviary generals, for that three girlscouts were carried off by the foe. This too was the first intimation of the tidings that had arrived for it was telegraphed throughout the army, and a perfect chorus of lamentations arose from all the girlscouts and of execrations of rage from the soldiers. Just at this moment George Zime Zimmerman came running down from the house.

"Is it true Master Radcliffe?" Jean Turner says that Angeline Jennings is receiving bad news, and that three of our girlscouts her sister one them have been murdered by the Glandelinians."

"Murdered or carried away, George, we cannot tell yet."

George Zimmerman was a warm hearted boy, and he set up a yell of lamentation which drowned the sobs and moanings of the others.

"Hush George," Radcliffe said. "We shall have time to cry for them afterwards, we must be doing now. We are going to pursue with half the Christian caviary, and all our scout forces except those to remain on guard duty are to follow."

"I will Master Rad, but will you let me go with you to recp recover them. won't you now, Master Radcliffe."

"You George in fact for what you are we'll need you badly. I will have you accompany us, and leave just the sentries in charge. Send for George Maxwell, Mildred's brother, for he too must come, and have Clarence Trene come here."

Trene was close. He too was really affected by the loss of his young girlscout friends, for they were a favorite with every one indeed.

"Trene, you and Miss Angeline Riches are good guides, so you'll guide us with her. We may be away a long time maybe twenty days. I am sure I can trust you as an expeditionary leader. The sentries will take care of the camp."

The boyscout bowed with his hand on his heart. All Abbeunian boyscouts do and always did preserve this grand manner.

"And now Trene, do you know of any of the other boy and girlscouts who know all parts of this country well?"

"No Master Radcliffe, but one of the Camp fire girls Olga does, and her loud voiced brother does."

Radcliffe at once wrote notes commanding that these two might accompany the expedition, and dismount dispatched them by mounted couriers.

"And now Trene, what amount of caviary equipment have we in store?"

"A good stock in store, enough for all our own force and the caviary soldiers besides."

"All right, Trene go up to the house and see what provisions is there. George Lopez, get all our own horses saddled and have the bugler arouse the whole camp of boyscouts and girls too, and get George Zimmermans horse and gave our own horses a feed of oats. Now Rudcliffe lets me go up to our house or headquarters and add to our captured pistols with my own."

"How are Angelina Jennings and others Gertrude?"
"Despite her grief she is quiet and composed boys. They have gone off to send in the news. They're going with the expedition. And said 'oo is going with us, and Angelina hopes at my wish is to lead the expedition. We are to storm the moment we find the foe who stole them off. And now had life dear what arrangements have you made."

"That is right." And now we will be off at once. Give Angelina Riches directions as to where to go as you came from that direction."

"I shall we bring you a load of exploding rockets overhead
 "No they may not be of any use, but everybody must bring their grenades, and the dangerous atom bomb, not the small ones, but if you wish each of us may bring along a rocket or two of each sort, and roll up a pinch of us may bring along a rocket or two of each sort, and roll up a pinch of us two boys, and fatten it on your saddles. Put plenty of ammunition in your bags, and have three cartidges balls on, see that their brandy canteens bottles are full. The others must all bring along with them their water canteens, and get all the spare canteens possible, and see that you can get the pungent tobacco which you'll find in the storerooms we'll use them or that to gas the foe with, and be sure to bring plenty of water for because of the draught and of the heat of fires the country may be too free of water, and besides remember the flood waters and the rivers may be foul."

... ..

... .. attended to, and then just in as short a time as possible all this was attended to, and then just as they were going out of the house, Sally came up her face swollen and crying.

"Won't you two brave boys take a cup of tea and just something to eat before you go. You've had nothing yet and you will want it. It is all ready in the dining room. You can bring it out if you wish and eat it on the way."

"Then you Sully, you are right. Come boys try and eat a good supper. We'll pep up our hearts, you know and we will bring our little heroines back, ere long. I've ordered Masses to be said for the sure success of our expedition, and the Masses will be said first thing to-morrow morning."

long. We can be said first thing to morrow morning and the Halls spoke more cheerfully, and the boys too soon felt their own spirits rising. The bustle of preparations, the prospects of the perilous adventure before them with bad conflicts to come no doubt, and the thought that they should assuredly sooner or later come up with the enemy if they didn't go to their own lines all combined to gladden them hope. Gertrude had not the fear of finding the body of the girl crouched under the ruins of the conflagration. The Glandelinians of course murder children but probably they would wish to bring the three into camp first to be tried as spies.

The scheme of the expedition was carried out without difficulty, and the news was no sooner found out throughout the encampments that half of the christian navy was to be in the expedition and to be formed for scouting and general purposes, and that unattached officers might still receive further orders, join it, than the headquarters which contained Gertrude Angelina and her officials was besieged by other men anxious to join a corps which seemed to afford them a chance of striking a good blow at the Glandilians.

Hitherto all the christian cavalry officers in the army, had been fretting from the inactivity of the christian army that they could not be doing something to aid in the great duty of holding Calvernia, and driving the Glandelinian forces out of existence.

doing something to force out of existence. The Gaudelander forces had called for General Bonifigians light horse cavalry and the Gaudelander Angeline had called for General Bonifigians light horse cavalry and that afforded the opportunity desired, and soon the squadrons had arrived as fast as they could come. As the day was made to the generals to watch closely the Gaudelander forces in general. As fast as a big cavalry force could come from their general division the many who were sent into force could come from each with their respective officers, and there were being cavalry men of the highest order. Some of the men who were in main command had each division to be commanded by its own commander. This had been wounded during some

[illegible]

Therefore there indeed was, a deep feeling of satisfaction, as well as of great surprise, when at eleven o'clock the men were all told that the whole army of cavalry would parade for duty at evening Retreat, and the expedition was to be under way and that each man was to see that he's provided with a haversack, with cooked food sufficient for days in case of need be, and all the ammunition they can carry.

Had the route been free from enemies of the christian side, the distance might have been done in the shortest time as all had swift horses, but it would be necessary to make a detour on starting, so as to avoid striking any part of the main road, for it was all important on the way to avoid detection as to their movements, as the enemy cavally might come forth in all its own strength, and might assault in such strength that their return would be difficult and dangerous in the extreme and might cause a bloody cavally battle which Gertrude wished to avoid. And the purpose too was to go the route which would enable them to cut off the force that took away the children, so they could not reach the Glandelinian positions. The girls, out, and the child, save once in their possession, the return journey might be easy, as they worried a lot about no infantry, but they could avoid cavally, and had no fear of having to cut their way through any body of cavally patrol whom they might accidentally come across, especially as they would have all the full advantage of a surprise.

At exactly seven thirty the whole squadrons, of the boy and girlscoouts, and the immense cavalry rode out a flying gallop out from the christian lines amid a hearty cheer from the infantry soldiers, who hearing that the child scouts intended "to lead an expedition" had assembled in long lines on both sides of the road in drill fashion to see the start..

" Angelina Indians rode at the head of the squadron, with Gertrude Angelino, who commanded the whole scout troop by her side, and behind them came the other guides who were well acquainted with the country. All of them however that is the guides were disguised as Glandelinians in order that they were far in advance and they passed any Glandelinian patrol or if they were challenged, they could ride forward and represent the troops as a body of disguised Glandelinian cavally sent out to scout around general Vivians lines. However the precaution was not quite so necessary, for after they got well outside the christlan lines and into the country they were able to continue on without interruption.

They came upon two patrols and dispersed them, capturing half the body disarming them and tying them to trees and leaving them behind so they could not return to their positions and report the expectation. They even passed through several ruined villages, but although the tramp of the horses and the rattle of sabres might have been heard by any one not afraid for the Glandollin patrol might have thought them their own cavalry, though many of them too had begun to believe they were masters of the country, and had heard that many of the christians had begun to doubt whether the Galverlin country could be recovered, whether the resistance was by any means a benefit so far as the war was concerned. Just after being out twenty minutes the head of the column which was in some distance advance of the main suddenly halted near a clearing having watered their horses at a stream.

They had gone on so far that they had hidden some twenty miles in a short time and were they believed about fifteen miles from the place where Madcliffe said he and Richard had left the girls alone, and which the messenger said had been stormed and burned. It might have been possible to continue on at once, but the forest fires, seeming seeming to tear the heavens with flames were dangerously close, and it would have been like to catch on in that direction and it would have been foolish too to tire out the horses in the moon when they might need all their speed and strength on the return. To Madcliffe that gloomy fiery and sad day had passed very slowly. Deciding to rest an hour to contemplate the direction of the fire movements, many of the men were allowed to throw themselves down and sleep during that time, but they couldn't because of the heat and the excitement of the adventure and from the fire. It was more than thirteen hours since the two boys had left the three girls alone and the child slaves and such dreadful things of which they didn't dare to even imagine might have happened since they were carried off, as Mungabee Gandelinnas are fierce.

"Don't let us talk about it any more," Gertrude Angelina said at last. "Because we're only all to the anxiety that all of us must feel. How mad you ~~are~~ positively must lie down for an hour at least, you now your surgeon said it was mad of you to get on horseback without waiting till your bones of the shoulder had set firmly, and that it was ten to one in favor of amputation should on again, to have much to go through yet, and you remember that it happened to poor Rose Gilm because she was foolish and care when she knew she was seriously wounded. You'll go too that way if you are not careful."

"Oh I'll be careful," Hans answered. "But who in the world can sleep in this Purgatory! can't it's supposed to be October but I believe it's early July in the American Death Valley, the way it feels."

Usually in fairer weather for all soldiers and boy and girls sleep would overcome excitement, and though the whole party tried to sleep as long as there was the hours' wait, the heat made them swelter so that they couldn't. It however had been determined to start in time to arrive at the Hungers home, before the flames of the blaze reached their path to cut them off, to see what extent of damage there was, but the two boyscouts said they hoped the fire would still burn for it would light the scene and enable them to recognize the locality, besides which it was advisable to get as far in advance of the enemy cavalry who did the business as possible before the vandals managed to reach the Glandelinian positions. If they hadn't already done so, it they had then it was necessary to find out which part they had entered, and launch a terrific assault upon that section.

The boys all the time had been riding in front of the girls.

The whole column moved on again.

"That is the portion of the wood, but its unapproachable because of the fire," Radcliffe said presently. "I can prove it by those big pines yet untouched by the flames, all growing together in a clump at a short distance in advance. I noticed them particularly."

"Where's the remains of the house?"

"Burned I suppose," said Radcliffe.

"And where's the main shed or barn you told us off."

"We ought to be able to see the barn," Radcliffe said, and he looked at Gertrude apprehensively.

"Yes," Angeline Riches said. "We ought to certainly see it, but where is it?"

"Are you sure you are not mistaken as to the locality?" Gertrude asked.

"Positively sure," Radcliffe answered. "But the big barn!"

"Let us gallop on, fire or no fire," Gertrude said, catching the fear which was expressed in Radcliffe's face.

Five minutes riding, and they drew up their horses with a cry of dismay. A large patch of wood ashes beyond the unburned forest showed the spot where the houses had stood, and the same with the shed. They sat up as well as they could in order not to frighten the others as to the truth of the messengers' story. They had scarcely reached this spot when Angeline Jennings, Mary Stanj, and Bright-eyed Mary came up to them at full gallop. Both of these two advanced girls were armed to the teeth, and at the sight they swung the heads of Gertrude.

"I see it," said Mary. "We made a copy of Radcliffe's note, and sent of half a dozen men in various directions with them. Then we came at once. Of course the enemy has had some start on us. Have you any clues as to where the Glandelinians went?"

"None," Radcliffe said.

"Well, my boy, I need not tell you then if the dear girlscoots are alive we will continue on till we find her, and I've already sent clever sluths plunging into the foe lines to find out what part they've brought in, in case we don't cut the enemy off. We'll get them if we have to tear our way through that position do to do so."

"Thanks, thanks, Mary," Angeline Jennings said earnestly. "I feel a conviction that we will recover them yet."

Many of the cavalry soldiers had by this time with many of the child scouts galloped up to the scene of the catastrophe, and absorbed in their thoughts, not another word was said, until they gained the main point. An exclamation of rage and sorrow burst from them all, as only a portion of the chimney and a charred post or two showed where the structures had stood, and a large stretch of burned still smouldering forest beyond. The huts of the rangers had also disappeared, all the trees were burned down and all the ground was a fierce smoulder. With clinched teeth and faces pale with rage and anxiety, the party rode on past the site of the houses and cabins, scattered round which were the bodies of hundreds of rangers. They halted not until they drew rein, and leaped off to examine the bodies as Radcliffe wished to see if the leader was among them. They were close to where the main house had stood but only the stumps of the corner posts remained intact though still glowing. Everything had burned as if so much tinder, and here all the forest debris was smouldering sending great impenetrable clouds of heavy rolling smoke upward to a great height through which the reflection of the flames could be seen. Here and there however were unburnt heaps, and in perfect silence but with a sensation of over powering dread, Gertrude, Radcliffe, and the three chief girlscoot leaders, signalling the main troop closest to them to be at attention, tied up their horses, and proceeded to examine these heaps in the smoulder even at the risk of being burned, to see if they were formed by the remains of human beings.

By means of heavy branches they turned them over and as they did so indeed, their knowledge of the arrangements of the different rooms helped them to identify the various articles. Here was a burned and still smouldering bed, there a metal box of closely packed linen all burned, the interior bursting into flames as they turned it over, here was the storeroom, with its heaps of smouldering flour where the sacks had stood. In twenty minutes they were able to say with tolerable certainty that no human beings had been burned, for the bodies could not have been wholly consumed in such a speedy conflagration.

Perhaps they who survived have all been made prisoners. One of the soldiers suggested, as with a sigh of relief, they concluded their search and turned from the spot. Gertrude shook her head. She was too well acquainted with the habits of the Glandelinians to believe such a thing possible. Just at this moment, Colonel Rush came forward and said:

"For heavens sake come and see what's in that ditch there. It's shocking."

All at this felt that the terrible secret was there. The boys and girls all within hearing turned ghastly pale, and they felt indeed that not for worlds could they approach to examine the dreadful mystery.

Gertrude was too much affected, and said she couldn't go.

Angeline Riches glanced at her friend, and then said gravely to Colonel Hardy:

"Do you all wait here, we will examine the ditch."

As she and Angeline Jennings left them the boys and many girls turned away, and many leaned against their horses, and covered their eyes with their hands. They dared not even look round. Angeline Riches stood still for a minute, but the agony of suspense was too great for her. She started off at a run, came up to her friends and with them hurried on through the smoulder for the ditch. But yet they couldn't see into the ditch but they glanced downward into it, and Angeline gave a short gasping cry, and caught at a tree for support. Huddled together in the ditch, was a great pile of dead bodies, rangers, and among them peeped out pieces of little female and male clothing. Anxious to relieve their friends agonizing suspense, Angeline Riches leaped down into the ditch, and getting some of the men down with her had them remove the upper bodies from the ghastly pile. First were the rangers, then came one of the officers, then the child slaves whom Ferrod had rescued, and an old woman servant, and three other little girls, the chief rangers wife, and below them were bodies of other rangers. There were no more. Dolores, Mildred, and Jane were not among them. When first she had heard of the massacred Angeline Riches had said:

"Better dead than carried off," but the relief to her feelings was so great as the last body was turned over, and that it was evident that the child scouts were not there, that she would have fallen had not one of the boys hastened to support her, at the same time crying out to those in the distance:

"They are not here."

Radcliffe turned toward Gertrude, and Angeline Jennings burst into tears of joy and gratitude. The suspense had been almost too much for them, and Angeline Jennings felt so ill and faint, that she was forced to lie down for a while, while Gertrude went forward with the others. She was terribly shocked at the discovery of the murder of the entire force of rangers, as Radcliffe had cherished the hope that they could have at least resisted the enemy to success. Yet it was pretty evident that the three girlscoots had been spared or their bodies would have been found with the others.

The bodies were hastily lined up in the ditch, and dirt was thrown over them. Rage and indignation were upon the faces of all who had seen the bodies and their feelings were redoubled, when they heard that nearly the whole of the force of rangers who were so justly loved and esteemed, were dead.

General Edwards was now up with them and general Jamelson.

"It's best Gertrude said" that some of us had better employ ourselves in burying the remains of our poor friends."

The news of this horror had arrived at seven thirty, and there was now a general murmur of assent, and those with tools looked to Gertrude. "I believe she said we cannot do better than leave them in the ditch and just cover them up so as not to delay fire. The place I believe will never be the site of another habitation. And any one hereafter who may buy property here after the war would choose another place for his home than the scene of this awful tragedy."

Gertrude then brought out her prayer book, and after she and many others in kneeling had pronounced the prayers for the dead, all the rest on their knees and bareheaded, and storn with supreme sorrow, the earth was filled in over the ditch, where the rangers, two women and children lay together.

It was awful to Radcliffe to have seen the abode of the protector of his three girlscoot friends destroyed. Other friends joined the group after the burial, the rest of the troop having dismounted at a short distance, respecting the pain, which the discovery had caused their leaders and all the child scouts.

"What shall we do now," Gertrude Angeline herself demanded, breaking the deep silence.

For a minute or two no one could find word to answer her, and then George Zimmerman said:

"Perhaps we may be able to find some of the survivors among the rangers somewhere for Radcliffe said that the leader and some others he got acquainted with are not among the bodies."

A good thought George said Gertrude.

"We must not give up hope," said Angeline Riches, there are not so many bodies lying about the place here, so maybe they are still alive if not carried away with the rest... Go to the three girlscoots if they are carried off we must go to their rescue, there is what is to be left of the big barn, Radcliffe!"

from you that the expedition is a most dangerous one. The Glandelinians are pursuing according to the same statement in a full Glandelinian cavalry division, numerous, and are dangerously armed. The time we may to say from the Glandelinian line is altogether not known for if it is a year I do not intend to return until we have found the three girls. I understood too that there is not a man, boy or girl here to who would not gladly help to rescue them,--not one who does not long to avenge our murdered friends, and comrades. At the same time many of you have ties, lives and children who had lost their lives in the big disasters. All of you have gladly accompanied me, but if any one feels any doubts from the reason that I have stated--indeed if any one considers that it is useless to run this tremendous risk--let him or her say so at once, and I shall respect his feelings, and let him or her return, to camp and my friendship and good will will in no way be diminished."

"As Gertrude finished her eye wandered over the whole troop with hearing, no one answered for a moment, and then general Jan-leson said: "Miss Gronburg it was right and perfect of you to say that any one of us, including any of your boys and girls, who might desire to remain behind and return to the camp would not lose your respect and esteem, nevertheless, but I for one will say that he or she would absolutely and determinedly lose his or her own respect. We have all known and esteemed, and loved all of you boys and girls, and they all have loved one another like brothers and sisters, and there has not been one who even is not still fearful over the loss of three of their most esteemed comrades. Dolores, Mildred and Jane. We have known and loved all you girls and boys, leaders or not as if you were children of our own. From all of you brave hands saintly girls and boys we have one and all received very great love and kindness and the warmest hospitality even though the Government places us highest amongst the warlike and carried away, and I say the dear girl scout officials who had been wounded and carried away, and I say he, or she, whether it be a man, any of you boys, or girls who stays behind or returns to the camp is unworthy of our position in rank of our very names. For myself and others I say that if we fall in this expedition--if we never set eyes on any of our loved ones again, wives or parents--we shall die or succeed satisfied that we have only done our duty. Every one of us are with you to the death."

A loud and general cheer would have broke from them all if Gertrude Gertrude recently had not as an ad for the strictest silence but nevertheless everyone drew their sabres and brandished it as a meaning that all approved. And all the officers, men and child scouts. In turn came up to Gertrude and Huddell and grasped her hand saying: "We go back, all right, but with Dolores and her two companions. We are with you to the death."

Gertrude and Huddell were too much affected to reply for a short time then she briefly but heartily expressed her gratitude. After which she said:

"No to business. We have other cavalry forces co-operating with us from other directions to close in on Marshfield if possible. Let's move forward at once."

Then Gertrude remounted her horse, and the whole troop again moved forward, and as Gertrude watched them start, she felt that in fair fight by day or night they could hold their own magnificently against ten times their number of Glandelinians. Every soldier had his terrible cavalry rifle in addition to which all had revolving chamber revolvers holding twenty cartridges apiece the use of which, since Gertrude and her troop had first fought the enemy with such deadly effect very often upon the enemy. Nearly all these Abolitionians were young, and every man had his poncho red in color a sort of soldier cloak more to stay off the heat than cold, rolled up before him on his saddle. It always was difficult to find a more noticeable object in the line of well mounted men, and the expression of their faces, as they too their last look at the grave of the massacred ones boded very ill for the Glandelinians who might fall into their clutches. Abolitionians do not get quarter.

On the way Gertrude questioned her guide as to the strength and position of the Glandelinians who had stolen the three girls, and which led out of the main road and which had not been seen by any of the troops, as Gertrude had ascertained before starting. The account was not reassuring. The Guide who was "Mexican Pete" reported that there probably could not be any fortification, but that if the foe were in the town they could use it to fortify but that half the town was on steep slopes, the only access being a straight narrow road cut in the face of a cliff, which could be defended easily by cannon, and loopholed walls at each turn if possible, and with other means if the enemy found out he was pursued. The strength of the Glandelinians Gertrude however had learned from the wounded lancer as on the road he could ascertain was none one hundred thousand strong too, the ordinary number of Glandelinian retainers being at present increased by many patriots joining them who had joined the cavalry hearing that they had captured and were going to move toward the positions. The troop halted on the edge of a clearing within one mile of Marshfield, as the guide said there was no place nearer, where the trooper force could be concealed without a certain of discovery.

Before proceeding further Gertrude and Huddell put on Glandelinian payment uniforms, which the two had brought with them, in case it should be necessary to open communication with the three girls, and to meet to say that the town appeared like, and they left the wood with one of the guides dressed as a Glandelinian officer. The disguises were not meant to deceive close investigation, and no attempt was made to disguise the hair, or wear disguise caps but they were nevertheless sufficient to enable the wearers to pass without exciting suspicion by any one who saw them at a distance. Until they be mistaken for runaway Glandelinian soldier and scouts. They found themselves within half a mile of the town which answered exactly to the description they had received of it. Gradually but remaining always at a safe distance as far as possible of cover--they made a circuit of the town, and then an hour afterwards returned to their comrades, who were anxiously awaiting their report.

"It is as hard to crack as a coconut," Gertrude said to those waiting to hear. There is no possibility of climbing any of the slopes anywhere or of storming in any way except by the regular ascent and that is a dangerous move. There are eight routes to go across, and to reach the town would be to expose all our troops to an unrelenting fire of the Glandelinians. We should require to blow up the town, but we have no siege or big field guns to drive them out with. The town is easy within range of the guns if we only had them. I do not see it would be absolutely impossible, because before now Abolitionian and Angelinian troops have done what seemed utterly impossible in all battles, but the difficulties would be so enormous and hazardous, the danger of failure so great and immeasurable, and the loss among our troops certainly so crushing, that I should not be justified in attempting such a desperate adventure on my own responsibility, and for my own private ends. We have no right boys and comrades to cause the loss of some thirty or forty probably fifty thousand of all our young fellows here ever to rescue the girls. An assault by surprise is the only possibility. At present I'm afraid none of us can see the way but something may turn up to help us. I have sent messengers to as many priests as can be found with money to demand them to lead High Masses for the success of our expedition to-morrow, failing in getting some sort of plan, our only plan is to wait until the Glandelinian commanders start out of the town with their troops, and the girls for the foe positions, and then to go into them on their way. The main drawback to this that they may not leave until they're sure Tamara is not coming their way, and that at any moment we may all be discovered, and then they'll get away from us. Besides too the there is the difficulty of feeding the horses and ourselves. The town is of course not fortified but the enemy could do that in a duff if they saw us so close. Now Huddell, and you other scouts you understand as much as I do. Think it over, while I have a talk with Angelina's Nieces, and Jennings."

"Angelina Jennings as is at the other end of the wood Gertrude, half a mile away scouting. We found too after you had gone, that the main road ran through the fire swept section of the woods, so Angelina Jennings suspected to Mary Stanek that she should go with twenty strong men and hide there, so that they could see who went or rode along the road and perhaps intercept some messenger, between the foe lines and the town of Marshfield."

"Why that was a capital idea on her part," Gertrude Angelina said. Just at that moment however Angelina Jennings and Mary returned with their parties, and Mary was bringing in four prisoners.

"Who have you there Mary?" Gertrude demanded. "Four of the hateful Glandelinian 'Wheeler' cavalry, who chased Huddell during the day. One of these fellows you see I recognized months ago, there were sixteen of them, and one Hancock officer but they showed desperate fight then we surrounded them, and tried to ride through us, so these four are the only survivors. One of them is a brother from general to Tamara, to general Stanley whom I heard is coming to reinforce Tamara. General Vivian by Heaven's sake must know of this right away. He's in danger. He must cut Stanley off at Ethelreda before it's too late. The two generals and their armies must not junction. Here it is."

Gertrude Angelina looked severely at the prisoners, who were wearing the "wheeled" designed uniforms, and then ordered them to be taken away and tied to trees at once so that they couldn't escape.

"I ought to have you hung at once," she sneered. "But as it is I'll let you rebel as it is tied to trees. I don't care however if you remain in that position for days."

"What did you men do with those who were slain in the fight, Mary?" "I had them hide their bodies under some bushes, at a distance from the road."

"You must go," Huddell said, "with some other men, take George Zimmerman with you, must strip off the uniforms, cartridge belts and all the even and their shoes, and bring them all here. If there's a Glandelinian money in their trousers than it, we don't want the filthy stuff."

"How many uniforms you want?" she asked.

"How many were slain?"

"Seventeen."

"So will have them all," answered Gertrude.

Fifteen minutes later Gertrude summoned the officers of her own command and held a meeting.

"Nothing could be more fortunate than this capture," she said. "Some one must bring this message to General Vivian right away. He will go."

"I will," said Joan Saunders.

"All right here. You now the way back. Don't let even a legion of demons stop you."

And she was off like a flash.

"Now this means to clear the way for us altogether," she continued. "But I propose to do in this, that I am of the best soldiers of our troops, the with two boy scouts, should dress in the uniform of these soldiers, that is the men men, the uniforms won't fit the boys they're too small. I have made a duplicate copy of the letter and they can go bodily in with the letter to General Hanson. They of course must be careful not to be stopped by the foe, and for this good thing they will be well received by General Hanson. While we are on this expedition we must not let General Manley join with them and start trouble with General Vivian. The two who go as officers, will be entertained by the general of course, and will learn through this letter the plans of General Manley and Tamerline. The other two will be made welcome by the retainers."

And I'm going to send out some spies, to the Glandelinian position on the town with another duplicate of the letter, for the letter must go through to Manley for if it doesn't both generals will be suspicious and may start General Vivian together at once, and our plans will be destroyed. When all is therefore quiet, and the letter has gone on its way, the spies must steal out, and wait on the cliff beyond the town pretending to be guards. That projecting hill stone would be the best place. We will go below with our ropes. We ourselves will come closer. Then a rope must be lowered. We have two long heavy climbing ropes in two big bolls, either of which would be even longer than required, but if they're too long we can cut off some of it."

"But we would have to be careful with the ropes," said Radcliffe.

"Why?" demanded Gertrude.

"Because they would be too bulky to carry in without suspicion. Our Abbeonian girdles and retainers however, will soon tear up some cloth, twist a rope not much thicker, but strong enough to hold the ropes."

"I see leave the ropes outside but use clothes inside. That's a good scheme," said Gertrude.

"Then," continued Radcliffe, "the rope can be twisted round the body without fear of detection and when the time comes lowered, with a stone at the end. We could be below with a strong rope or other sort of ladder that we can easily form made with the ropes and strong twigs of the trees, and once fixed, we shall be up in force in no time."

"That's a go," said Gertrude.

"All right," said Radcliffe, "I'll leave it up to you to decide. We can try the best men. They of course must be asked if they are willing to under take it. I myself will speak to the men."

"What do you think of the plan?" asked Gertrude.

"Excellent indeed," every officer said.

"It might be as well," said Ansellin corrected. "That each of the party and troopers should have a light rope wound round him so that if one, two or even three could not slip away, the fourth still could carry out the plan."

"Recon't the motion."

The answer came from all.

"All in favor of the plan say I."

"I." Came from all.

"No in favor?"

No one answered.

Some other details were then arranged, and then some of the officers when the meeting was adjourned went to select out the two men who could best pass as Glandelinian messengers. There was no difficulty upon this score whatever, for two of the troopers, though born in Glandelinia, and true hearted full blooded Glandelinians, but who were in favor of the Christian cause, as a saint would be, and who had for years before the war, commanded training soldiers, spoke the Abbeonian language as perfectly as the native.

The work of making the rope ladders and the light ropes for hanging them was entered upon, and with a hundred of men working this was accomplished quite as fast as the reader would think until by ten o'clock all were ready for the expedition.

Fortunately for them they did not need to remain any longer in the forest, for during their short wait five or six Glandelinian cavalry men who came in suddenly had to be captured, seized and held, and it was certain that there were many Glandelinian privates, particularly the floor of the woods (ground) was heavy with brush and weeds, and no one could see through them for any Christian trooper. There with the purpose to capture any one. However every detail of the plan was carefully considered and also discussed by every officer, so that no one could do the wrong thing and no one did. And each of those to do the main work had his part therefore assigned to him.

The two Glandelinian girdles who were however loyal to the Christian cause, and who knew much about the Glandelinians and their ways, and military life, connected more than will look to do their parts, and at the proper time being probably ten o'clock, the two disguised officers and men came from their hiding, crept and stole off toward Glandelinia bearing the duplicate of the letter from General Tamerline to General Manley. Indeed the in the town of Glandelinia there was a great excitement that night. The commander of the Glandelinian cavalry had received with all honors the two disguised officers from the Christian lines. The letter itself from General Tamerline which had been forwarded to the leg, had begged that general to come as fast as possible with his army, as it stated that General Vivian was alone by, and though General Manley was somewhat inferior in force Tamerline nevertheless was quite afraid to tackle him without help. It had also told of the situation he was in, for three sections of his own famous army was cut off by flood and fire, and could join quick enough to make in all force to repel any attempt on the part of General Vivian, and the letter begged General Manley to come at once if possible with his own forces. From the letter too it was known to Manley that the Glandelinian campaign (apparently) everywhere was a success against the Christians, and that at Big Glandelin and Little Glandelin, and Thimbleton and Abbeonabra, the Glandelinian armies were concentrated in great numbers, and it was hoped these places would soon fall into their possession.

The evening had ended early, and nice and hot in the weather, the early October night bring no chance in temperature, and the two officers pretended to be fast asleep with their "long fast hair horseback ride", and being shown into the "Glandelinian" officers' headquarters they were soon apparently asleep on the beds prepared for them. The Glandelinian commander of the cavalry fearing the strange articles of the forest fires, was afraid to proceed on further during the night and had intended to remain in the town all night, and therefore he retired to his own headquarters, and the officers to their, and although for another hour or so, talking and laughing, and singing went on in the few houses of the town, presently these too were hushed and a profound stillness fell upon Glandelinia. Then barefooted the two "Christian Glandelinian" stole cautiously out of their apartments, and made for the suburbs of the town being careful however as they felt sure none of the enemy would really sleep that night from the heat and might be aroused. However as they had anticipated, they found quite a large number of guards about and a long line of sentries at the lower town, but nevertheless they managed to slip past them without being seen, and reached an old shed near the edge of a cliff which had been pointed out to them without the slightest suspicion. Here the other fifteen had already arrived, and after these the two came small clouds of light as the signal, proposed, and which was answered by a call only and the host of an owl, the ropes were lowered without delay. Some of them were soon fastened, by somebody below, and then the others being also found were fastened to the rope ladder. The weight which was considerable, and then those above the precipice began to draw up. Everything was a success beyond belief. Scores and scores men appeared at the top of the cliff. More and more came from different parts of the town, and quickly the wide street, into the streets suddenly and pitifully overpowering the sentries without a sound being changed by them, then they formed into large parties. More and more continued to come until half the troops of the town, the leg, and Abbeonabra having entered the town at another section. All were in position at the entrance to all the main buildings, and then there was a great deal of further conversation, and many a battle was fought. But the Glandelinian army was increased by the capture of the various towns and the various parts of the town. Then the sudden surprise as an owl had reached out in the forest was made that ensued, the town became like an inferno and buildings were set on fire. The Glandelinian command or was the first to reach the town, and immediately seized and burned before he even was aware of what had happened.

"If the remainder of your men by wireless to throw down their arms and surrender," the Abbeonian command said to him. "Or we will put you and your whole army to the sword here. The whole town is surrounded, and there is no escape. Do you not hear the horses down below in the plains?"

The Glandelinian commander of course told the Christian general to go to "The Hot Place" but nevertheless whether he refused to surrender or not, it needed not his order for the Glandelinians in the town being so suddenly surprised by the unexpected sight, and having but the hands in half a minute fled, and fleeing the whole town already in possession of an Christian force of great numbers, three town their arms and surrendered, and were taken from buildings, and other places. Orders were sent to the Glandelinian commander to take the men and the other various sections to cross the night for which he was then sent. And there, however, they took their way out of the trap and escaped. Polaris and her two companions had been arrested at the head of the barren, but had not paid attention to a station at first believing it to be only from the Glandolinians because the men of both sides are played alike. When the stir and terrific fight broke outside at first the men of both sides, and they had remained quiet until they heard a loud pounding pounding on the door of their apartment, and then they could scarcely believe their ears, their faces showed in Gertrude Angelina's and Mildred's voices. With a cry of delight, both Dolores and Jane sprang up, and with impetuous rushed to the door, and in another moment the two girls were in the arms of Gertrude and Mildred.

"The whole force is here dear friends," Gertrude said, after the first wild greeting. "Hurry on out, girls, your friends are longing to see you. But where's Mildred?"

"She has been sent on with another party of Glandolinians, these having stopped here with us," said Dolores. The "The enemy thought if three of us were together we might plot an escape with her, she's badly wounded and cannot stand on her feet."

All the survivors of the foe were all collected in the street of the town, where a great patrol of troopers with their revolving barreled rifle in hand watched them closely. The whole of the arms given up by the Glandolinian captives were possessed by the victors, and the cowardly horses of the enemy all herded together, besides the recaptured horses of the surviving and dead rangers, and cattle. There were some cannon planted on the outskirts of the town and these were aimed and pitched over, and the town soon being in a blaze. All the ammunition cartridges were taken possession of, and when could not be carried away was fired. The Glandolinian general and his two sons, who were major and captain in the army, were then told to prepare to accompany the troop, and warning was given them that they would be shot in case an attack was made upon the force as it continued the expedition to recover Mildred.

"Tell all your surviving followers this," Gertrude herself said. "We had used to give no quarter to any of you Glandolinian troopers, but since you did not harm your captives and as they confessed you treated them more as hostages than enemies after all we are loving you and your followers off easy. Order them to spread no alarm or to spread the news, for other wise if we are alarmed by any other force of your side your life and all the rest will be lost. As it is you may hope for clemency when you are brought to the Christian lines, for you have not done harm to them as we feared and have even done more for the wounds of one of them than we thought, and although there is no doubt of your intention, your good conduct during your captivity with us may perhaps wipe the memory of your fault in carrying away the three girls out. But if you want more further tell me all where the other girls out was carried off."

"They were scattered."

"The is being brought to the lines. I don't believe she's there yet." It did not seem to be said of the captives greeting of the two girls, her own and their comrades or the happy half hour which was spent together on the street while the preparations for the departure were being made on the streets. The Christian commanders saw to all that was being done, leaving the girls out leaders leaders free to join the happy girl and boy out force outside.

"Are you strong enough to ride and join the expedition to bring back home Mildred, Dolores?"

"Oh I'm sure of it Gertrude, I have not been so seriously hit as the Glandolinians thought, and the thought too I could not be on my feet at all, but I am pretty strong despite my wound, and if I can't ride by myself I must then be tied on to someone else."

"You can ride with me," Gertrude said.

"NOW COME THE Glandolinians seem to have been kind instead of rude." "Bloodless and merciful though the force are usually polite to their prisoners," said Jane. "But our fate would have been woe once we were with the lines. I fear for poor Mildred, and the two girls shuddered. "She's in the hands of the dreadful Omarians."

In the meantime the commander of the cavalry had said to his officers, "Order all the men and children of the town who may not be of the Glandolinian cause into the streets. Tell them that they all will be spared their property if they are not enemies. Of course no one will be offered any of the women, but the men you will let be. Let the men be offered the women. Tell off another party to look all surviving women recently captured by the Glandolinians for food and provisions that only one that and nothing valuable and portable, and we cannot number ourselves with the men as we need to go for Mildred. Any horse the Glandolinians want to turn all the things down, they may consider themselves fortunate to get off with their lives."

However Dolores and Jane pleaded for the women and children, and the men. Inhabitant.

"They're all Christians and were in the terror while the enemy was here," said Jane. "They were killing in the name of the Lord for fear of what may come and did not molest any one."

"Well, well," said the commander of the Arabian lines. "We will not burn any more of the buildings."

In another hour the whole squadron leaving the prisoners off in another direction under an escort for the Christian lines, were well on their way after the Arabian detachment. The good fortune what had attended them so far was hoped to follow with the recovery of Mildred and the capture and destruction of the Omarians. Nowing what kind of Glandolinians these are Gertrude decided to make it really bad for them.

However they were very anxious to avoid an encounter with any other parts of the enemy and they therefore took a more circuitous route than that by which they had gone first, but riding through the burning town.

The whole force went on at a swift swift canter, the very pace they knew their horses would be able to continue for the longest time—breaking over every half hour or so into a walk for ten minutes to give them a breathing time....2.2.2.2.2. As to say the whole cavalry troop itself was well mounted on strong serviceable animals, and had special speed every one of them, some great number of them were even old time racers. It was evident that the chase would be a long and desperate one, and might be a failure. The other Glandolinian column had about four or five hours start, they appeared to be better riders than the Abyssinians, and carried less additional weight. Their horses therefore could travel as fast as those of those of their Christian pursuers. The condition of the forested land, the heat of the night, the dense darkness would it were true would be an incubance, the light thrown by the distant and near forest fire would not be so, and it was probably as the enemy had gone on with the main army the cavalry may have to go on a fifty or sixty mile journey traveling at a moderate pace only as the Glandolinians would suspect that no instant pursuit could be made.

Indeed their strength, which the prisoner had estimated at two hundred thousand horses would render them to a certain extent careless, as upon upon an open plan the onslaught of this number of men would sweep away any pursuing force not so equal. Then if they were still forced to be separated from the main Glandolinian army it would be probable that they would go on as long and as speedy a journey as the animals could accomplish. After that being all well heard their own main army and in their own territory they would come to travel rapidly as no pursuit had ever been attempted yet of Glandolinian cavalry in former instances since the war began.

However there was no difficulty at all in finding the horse tracks, despite the night, because the glare of so much flames, made such a reflect reflection that it was nearly as easy to see as if it was daylight. The Glandolinian horse shoes are peculiar and leave behind them their depression in the hardest or softest dirt, and even in grasses, and therefore the ground could be found trampled in a broad unmistakable pathway nearly road wide....2.2.2.2.2. Once or twice Gertrude Angelina who was more like an Indian guide than a girl scout could see the depressions, and she now consulted her compass.... The trail ran northwest by west, and was straight and not curved, for a time no one said a single word. The whole squadron though allowed at "halt" while going forth were too impressed, and depressed with the terrible scenes they had witnessed, and the tremendously hazardous nature of the enterprise they had undertaken in indulge in any conversation.

However gradually as it must be, the steady rapid motion, the sense of strength and reliance and hope in God, and in themselves and each other, the cause of their expedition, finally lessened the sombre expression, and started by Gertrude a general conversation began, mostly upon the battles and Christian victories of the past, in which most of the older soldiers, and the longest serving girl and boy scouts but at last at one time or other soon or soon a patting pastaken of Gertrude had started the conversation, and too she surely felt sure how necessary in an expedition of this sort with terrible perils on all sides it was to continue the spirits of all those engaged, and she endeavored therefore, to shake off her own heavy weight of care and sorrow, and to do her best to give animation of life to every one within her own hearing, again and therefore spread the conversation to them all. The spirits of the beyond girls scouts rose first, and those of the younger soldiers, and in turn the pace was therefore increased, until Anne Angelina, whose horse, as the selected guide and leader of the whole expedition was compelled to recall to them all the necessity of saving the strength of their animals many of which had already come from ten to fifteen miles before having regained at least Dolores, and Jane, and captured the enemy who survived the battle of Bushfield as prisoners. After three hours most steady riding, through smoke glare and heat, they arrived at the banks of the Ethelreda river.

The stream was so flooded and muddy that it appeared to be impassable, and here Gertrude called a halt (the stream was receding the flood) for a purpose of resting the animals and finding a way to get across the stream by having the horses wade if they're game enough.

"I believe," Gertrude said, "that we must have done about twenty miles. The main Glandelinian army is moving and therefore is the reason this cavalry force does not gain up with it. We will give the hour horses an hour's rest and all of those who can and wish may try and get a little sleep by that time. Some of us have already done quite a distance, and it will not do to press the pursued too hard. They may turn on us in the dark and surprise us and cause disaster."

All girls were therefore loosened, and the horses went either to work eating on the high sweet dry hay like grass near the water's edge or laid down. The whole force relieving the command to halt, finally threw themselves down on a sloping shore or shore, and those that felt they couldn't sleep because of the heat (which was sometimes almost intolerable) took out their pipes or cigars, or cigarettes and so forth and lit, and the probable direction of the pursuit discussed. In a short time one of the boyscouts by the name of Charley Watson awoke, and said:

"I will see if we can't get some berries for a night meal, or if you desire something better, and whistling for one of the camp mascot retrievers, trotted off up the stream. In ten minutes his rifle was heard at a short distance which started the whole force, and then again, but by this time faintly.

"I hope he isn't shooting game," said Radcliffe. "That noise will attract the enemy."

"There couldn't be any game here with that 'Red plague' said George Zimmerman pointing. "There's something wrong."

Ten minutes later he appeared wiping the perspiration from his face, with two uniform hats on his head, and a big coat, and a couple of cartridge belts on his arm and leading three horses.

"What the?" began Gertrude;

"I killed three Glandelinian patrols at two shots," he interrupted, as he threw down the articles. "They tried to ambush me and I let fly in the middle of them before they had me."

There was a feeling of general satisfaction at the sight of the trophies and other articles.

"There is one satisfaction," Gertrude said. "Radcliffe frowning frowning, we can't be trifled with by the Glandelinians and they'll soon find it out, and we can't miss the way either. We have only to ride far enough, and we must overtake them."

"We can overtake them to night and capture the whole batch of them," said Mildred James.

Both Gertrude and Radcliffe only shook their heads. They understood enough of Glandelinian methods of Glandelinian warfare to be certain that every artifice and maneuver would have to be watched for and baffled, for even whether the Charlans believed themselves safe from pursuit or not, these Glandelinians are craftier even than the wild of Indians and never neglect to take every possible precaution against it, and if they find themselves pursued they won't take to flight but would come at you at a sudden attack, if the pursuers are too close.

Gertrude consulted one of the soldier guide guides with the purpose to find out if the stream might have been followed or crossed by the Glandelinian troopers, but they said according to their examination of the narrow horse-shoe depressions, that they might have crossed the stream at the narrow part. Therefore Gertrude decided to halt till the hour was up, and then to go on for Gertrude and others new the place well from frequent expeditions to cause the discover the cause of Abbe's destruction. They had all gone through here many times, and all boy and girlscouts were well acquainted with the forest forest. Just at this moment Gertrude thought she caught sight of some movement among the trees. She therefore ordered three to follow her, and at once started for the brush, several of the others going off in other directions. Gertrude proceeded very cautiously, and the wind being started in a little breeze and fortunately toward them, they were enabled to creep up tolerably close.

RECEIVED OFF AGAIN. "..."

Who ever they were that were in the bush, were extremely cautious too, and had an idea too that some danger was about before Gertrude and her three followers could get in a fair shot. They were Glandelinian scouts in hiding for they opened a sudden rifle fire from their place of concealment, and her three followers were immediately shot dead, and she herself only escaped by suddenly suspecting something and throwing herself flat. She answered the fire with her pistols vigorously, and one of the enemy shots hurled her gun from her right hand, but she drew another and continued the fire for several moments the shooting bringing others on the jump. Six fell at once, but the others threw themselves as flat as she lay and answered the fire until the firing from the brush seemed to recede.

"Be careful the rest of you," Gertrude whispered. "Those Glandelinians are dangerous and the best shots I ever saw. Just follow me. We'll get them yet and avenge this slaughter of our comrades."

As she saw they were slowly retreating to another quarter she at once practiced a trick which she had often found to be successful in her efforts to pass a line of enemy sentries said to be impossible to penetrate. She threw herself on her back, the others doing the same, and she pulled her red handkerchief from her neck, tied it to one of her shoes so as to let it float freely in the air, and then threw up both legs in the form of a letter V. Then she began to move them slowly about, waving them to and fro. The Glandelinians who were on the point of opening fire again from their new position, paused to gaze at this strange object, then they began to come forward a little their glances still directed at this strange unknown thing, to which they were rapidly continued to approach, but Gertrude too saw something was up for they were gradually circling around. At last they were fairly in shot, and Gertrude whose legs began to be weary suddenly sprang to her feet, the others did the same, and in an instant the foremost of the Glandelinians about fourteen of them lay quivering in death.

The survivors returned the fire, with some effect, killing and wounding twelve more of the Abyssinians and six of the scouts were wounded, but they took to flight as rapidly as they could. Seeing that they were alone the surviving men placed the wounded upon their shoulders and proceeded to the others where their arrival with a number of wounded and dead, was hailed with exclamations of dismay. A new forest fire some distance away seemed to be already alight, it being a fierce blaze too.

"There's great danger in our path of advance," said Gertrude. "The Glandelinian troops know we're after them and are sending skirmishers against us. That fire may pursue us. The most of you men better for the sake to slow its progress pull up all the high weeds possible."

This was done hastily, the high weeds and dry grass being pulled up by hand, and brush cut down. A large quantity was soon removed. The others who had pursued the assailants a short distance shortly returned.

"Things are coming to a pretty pass," said one of them. "The Glandelinians had speedily rallied, and had cut up the party of us pursuers. They're setting more fires and trying to speed them up this way. See there comes a whole swarm of them to attack us. They think we're only the child scouts out here in pursuit."

However the Glandelinians smelled trouble and didn't come further, but some of them with torches were about to light another fire, when they were brought down by well aimed shots, and all within reach opened fire and those of the foe who did not fall ran for dear life. The fallen were speedily stripped of their ammunition by the victors, and all the party in front of the main column were now engaged in hunting round to see how the clearing was, and when all was satisfied that the Glandelinians were gone, pipe pipes were again lighted, and a general feeling of comfort experienced. The horses of the scout leaders had been picketed close at hand each boy and girlscout having cut or pulled a heap of grass and placed it before his or her beast.

Then Gertrude Angelina chatted apart for a short while with some of her followers, anxious to find out as much as possible of the dangerous territory into which she and her force were entering. The others chatted and told stories and turns about the war....2.2.2. Presently Gertrude joined in with the general conversation with her own following, and then during a pause said:

"Although my friends I consider it improbable that the enemy will steal up to us any more for the present, still it is just possible that they may have remained in hiding some distance off on purpose to fall at night upon any party that may venture to pursue, therefore it is right for us to begin our duty in a business way. I therefore propose that we keep watches regularly till our hour of rest is up. I believe it is now ten o'clock. We will be moving by quarter after, so George Zimmerman I'll propose that you be on the watch. I should and will place a number of other boys stationed fifty yards apart but in hiding and in different locations."

There was a general assent of approval.

"No save trouble" Gertrude went on, "I suggest that we keep watch in the style that I have heard Indians do and the enemy is if close by won't be suspicious. Twelve of us will be on till the first of this hour, and I'll include myself as in the central company. If anything happens, don't report it to each other, but to any one we can signal or come to first."

Indeed the proposed proposal was at once agreed to, and the fifteen who were to be on duty rose at once, and taking their rifles, went off in various directions, first agreeing that each one of them should give their customary scout signals but "Wahogah" as a signal that something would be seen, and two such signals close together followed by the howl of a cat, or the hoot of an owl close together would be a warning to signal the whole squadron. The watch also ascertained which were the next thing to do should a bad fire threaten them and these all agreed to link close to each other by various sentinel signals in order that they might be able to arouse every one in case of new danger.

During that whole hour nearly all of them had tried to get some sleep for that one hour, but the heat, the smell of the smoke, and the excitement of the perils prevented that. Gertrude had no intention to try any sleep for she knew she couldn't, and thoughts of the events of the last twelve or fourteen hours, of the best course to be adopted, and upon the heavy responsibility upon herself as leader of this perilous expedition, prevented her from sleeping more than the heat did. She heard the wind howl and sing through the high pine trees, and in another minute sweating as if she was in a "mucky bath" she herself rose, and walked out toward George Zimmerman one of the sentries.

"Is that you Miss Gronburg?" he asked. "I was just coming in to wake you up."

"What is it George? Your face is pale."

"It strikes me Gertrude, that there is a strange blood red light away to the southwest, where I never saw a light before. I have noticed it only the last few minutes, and thought I was only seeing things, but it gets more brighter every minute."

Gertrude looked out anxiously into the unusually deep gloom, and quickly observed the appearance that her friend had spoken of. She did not speak for a minute or two, and then as the light evidently increased and became more of a sort of yellow sheen, she took out her field glasses and examined the glare closely. Then she said with a sigh:

"It is what I feared those Glandelinian dogs would do—they have set the forest into a fierce blaze southwest of us. None of us need to stay on watch any longer. We are as much separated from the Glandelinian troopers we have been following as if the Ocean divided us."

George gave the alarm signal as agreed upon, and then returned with Gertrude to the rest of the boy and girls. Then the bugle sounded at Gertrude's order and every man and child scout leaped up rifle in hand, believing that the Glandelinians were approaching.

"We must be up and going," Gertrude Angeline said cheerfully. "The Glandelinians have fired the forest."

"There was a thrill of apprehension in the bosom of all who heard this, or who saw the glare, and who had heard of the terrible account of the dreadful forest fires but this speedily subsided at the calm manner of Gertrude Angeline.

"The big forest fire southwest of us," she said, "may be ten or so miles off yet. I should say that it was, but it is difficult to judge, for this forest does flame up pretty high in this locality, and yet need not need to fear so much if there is not much wind, and the smoke may drift between it and us. The wind fortunately is light, but it will be here in little over an hour. Now let many of you attend to your horses, to see that they do not stampede. Have the officers form their troopers in a long line a couple of yards apart, and have them clean or pull up all small and high weeds by the roots, thinning behind them so as to leave the ground clear in this clearing. I have a fear it'll cross the clearing if we can make the ground clear of the grass. The wider we can make the breach on the ground the better. If any of you rest want to have can have as many trees blasted down to as possible. But it's up to you. It matters not now how much noise we may have to make since the enemy now of our presence."

All fell to work with a desperate and hearty zeal, for their very lives depended on it. As quickly as the one hundred thousand cavalry men would fall into battle, they deployed to do the work which would prevent the progress of the flames in their direction. While desperately toiling as hard and as swiftly as the heat and endurance would allow, some occasionally would look over their shoulders, and discovered that a gray appeared to be on fire. The forest blaze was some miles away, yet but nevertheless there was no simple distant glare, for there was moving forward toward them with a strange rushing and hissing roar a perfect wall of leaping flame struggling upward in blood red color on top and dazzling white at the base. There was an occasional sound of foot, as herds of deer flew by before the danger.

"How far will it go Gertrude, do you think?" Ladcliffe, as one of the girl leader, next to whom he was at work, for all the boy and girls were doing their best too, for it was terrible for the danger that now threatened them.

"I should say that it should most likely stop at the edge of the clearing in which we have fort safely halted our troop. We are safe if the wind doesn't rise."

"What is if there comes the fire hurricane?"

"Why we'll have a desperate fight for our lives, for the wind will do all the damage to us before the fire comes up. You know it blows like a fierce tornado."

The horses of the whole cavalry force were starting to become very nervous and restive, and from many there was a momentary pause from the desperate battle to wrap ponchos around their heads, as if to prevent the animals from seeing the flames and smoke. The fire could now have been more than five miles distant when the clearing to nearly its entire width was cleared as wide as the officers believed it necessary for safety. A regular noise something between a hiss, crackling and a roar, was now plainly heard, and when the wind lifted the smoke and flames could be seen running along in a very high unbroken wall of fire higher than they even had thought it was. Night birds flew past shrieking and hooting overhead and with terrified cries, and a close hot smell of burning was plainly distinguishable.

Gertrude was horrified. The flames though so distant were catching long rows of trees as if with waves upon waves, a wind was starting in as if a gale was threatening, a wind so strong that the trees began to writ and twist in an alarming manner, and a hurricane of sparks rose through the air.

"We'll have to fight as we never did before," gasped Ladcliffe. "I'll bet it'll cross the clearing and get us if it don't."

"I don't believe so," said one of the men. "The wind wherever it is coming from is blowing from the straight west, and the fire is heading northeast."

"That won't save us," declared Gertrude. "I have a plan. It's a desperate one but I'll have to do it even if I may be killed upon an instantary myself. This will be my own forest fire. It's our only chance. Make for us a dozen of you and then follow me and do as I do."

Gertrude quickly took up a bundle of small twigs, mixed with some leaves and set it alight. Then starting half way alongside the clearing where it wasn't yet cleared, she set the dry grass, and a tree too alight. For a moment or two the fire burned slowly, and then fanned by the wind, it gained force and spread in a semicircle of flame.

"Fight it, fight it," she screamed a command. "Drive it toward the fire."

They did, and hard too, preventing the flames from coming to their way and finally they got it going toward the other edge of the forest as Gertrude desired.

"A good Glandelinian Counter fire is our only chance," she said. "It's our last chance too or we're all goners."

All the horses that could be were already picketed, and half of them were taken to the rear quite a distance and strongly guarded, while the rest did other work to prevent the main conflagration from reaching them.

The soldiers themselves were in readiness to extinguish the conflagration as much as possible if it happened to cross the clearing, for it was evident the north section of the fire was advancing head on and furiously against even the wind. Over and over again the fire crept partially across, for the clearing had been done but roughly—but it was speedily stamped and beaten out by the fighters. The spectacle as the terrific conflagration swept away before the wind, just giving them all its tail and was fine in the extreme. The whole force seemed enclosed between two high walls of flame, each more than half a mile away and throwing a terrific heat that made them suffer in the extreme, and they had to frequently stop and hang each others clothing or uniforms for so many sparks were hurled at them by the wind that there was danger of all catching fire themselves. The smoke became suffocating, the main conflagration was now fearfully close, burning up the trees were already blowing about them, and the sound of the fire was like the hissing roar of all the rockets of the world going off in that one section at one time. They saw the fire now began to come up to the edge of the clearing then it began to turn to the edge, the northern flank rolled, and now began to turn toward the west, while the other section moved southeast with a speed that they could hardly believe their eyesight at seeing, and leaping hundreds of feet. They were roofed in fire.

"Now," said Gertrude. "We have time. It'll cross the clearing after all but it's delayed. Mount every body, and forward, every one to the stream. Put your ponchos over your own heads as well as your horses. We'll have to cross our own fire to get there. Hurry. The heat of the main conflagration will set us all afire. I can feel the heat burning me already."

In another minute amid all the chaos the whole force was dashing fearlessly through their own smaller fires, for there was no other method of escape, and this fire though it had already extended over a vast tract of the clearing did not reach to any one as long as it had not yet reached the trees on the other side. The grass and weeds did not reach a height of three feet here and burned but as if it was so much hay. They beat this fire, and in twenty minutes of fierce riding with blazing trees falling dangerously close and ahead of them they finally reached the wide stream, and stood in long lines

In the center and deepest portion of the river, allowing the horses to splash to escape them to go and not all over. There for a considerably long time they remained without moving, though almost scorching by the heat of the fire and raging elements all around them but half strangled with the smoke.

"It was some time before Gertrude spoke, but when she did she said: 'It's all just now. You can be around.'"

There indeed was a general exclamation of great astonishment as all the many thousands of heads were turned away from their wrappings, and the men recovered sufficiently, enough from the effects of the blinding smoke to look around.

"Where has the fire gone? One of them cried, only observing a glare in the distance.

"Where indeed?" said another.

"The fire has passed like a great wind and thunderstorm," said a third. The main conflagration had swiftly swept by them, and divided into two beyond a bend in the river where it succeeded in crossing, and these two waves of flame growing farther and farther asunder, as the newly kindled fire had become a forest blaze of its own and grew extensive, were already far away to the right and left, and between them was the big fire they themselves had made, now twenty miles in extent along the opposite forest and already far in the distance. Yet everything was a sea of smoke. Many smoldering trees still stood, some almost burned through, and smoke rose heavily from the ground debris which smoldered fiercely.

Every one had felt very uneasy at the sight of the great fire traveling toward them.

"We're caught here and good too," said Gertrude. "We can't travel through that dense ocean of smoke and live."

"What shall we do then?" asked George Zimmerman.

"There is nothing to do but to remain where we are until morning. I'm afraid," she answered. "All the horses had better be picketed, and then all those that can had better try and get a few more hours of sleep. We shall want no more energy day to night as no smoldering smoke could reach us here through that inferno of smoldering fires, and sea of smoke."

"And the expedition will be delayed."

"Can't help it," said Gertrude severely. "It's suicide to go through that smoldering sea of smoke and live."

In half an hour's time most of those of the troops all now on the safe side of the forest across the river were again asleep, and the Glandolinian officials tried to follow their example. Example that the heat bothered them so much that they couldn't sleep, and then Gertrude signalled to them quietly, and when they stood before her she said:

"Come this way all you officers of my scout force. We are going to have a meeting. We might as well as none of us can sleep. Thank God when we can."

The boys and girl scout officers followed Gertrude to where Angelina, Madcliffe, and some of the cavalry generals were sitting down at a short distance from the first row of sleepers, and these the boys and girls made out by the glow from their pipes, cigars, or cigarettes to consist of general Jamieson, Hardy, Herries and some others.

"This is a terribly bad business now," Gertrude began, when she and the others had finished the pipes they were smoking before having a meeting and then seating themselves in a circle on the ground. "I expected it, but it's a heavy blow the Glandolinians have dealt us nevertheless. We have lost forty men, ten or twelve of our scouts and one officer dead, and have fifty wounded on our hands. And you take this fire has aggravated our matters."

"Why what in the world is the matter Gertrude?" the boy and girl officers exclaimed anxiously. "Have we lost anything, that we can't recover, the tracks we have been following?"

"Yes, command Gertrude," Gertrude said. "We have lost what at this very moment was the most important thing in the world as you said, we have lost the trail. These Glandolinians have outwitted us."

The girl uttered a simultaneous exclamation of dismay, as the truth flashed across their minds.

"The trail is lost," gasped Madcliffe. "I have never even given this a thought."

"Yes in the excitement of this dirty, old fire it has never once occurred to me that the Glandolinians were wiping out every trace of the trail left behind by the hoofs of the Glandolinian horses," said Delores.

"I'm stumped," said Jane.

"Headwinded," said Mary.

"Bamboozled," cried Joy St. Claire....2

Gertrude then went on:

"Of course you understand this forest fire was not only lit to drive us out of our homes but also in case we did escape the conflagration, then for the purpose of throwing us off the scent. Have you any idea how far it is likely to have come and then come on?" she asked of Mary Florinda.

"She knew about forest fires as her father had once been a most expert forest fire fighter and patrol."

"In what way, do you mean?" she asked.

"Far is the state of the existence of any wide stream body of water, damp ground which would have checked it and which must therefore be the furthest boundary of the forest fire sent on us?"

Mary was silent for fully one minute, then she said:;

"The next river I know of is more than sixty miles away, but it's not very wide, nor deep and would not stop the forest fire, going or not going with the wind, and the heat would dry up the stream I believe. Beyond there is no stream of any sort as far as I know of, and the region is of the desert forest."

"The ground rises high into long hills, and beyond the forests grows denser, and denser thirty or so miles on. I should declare that the only light the blaze this side of that," declared Marie Stanek.2

The other Mary nodded assent.

"We too the bearings of the horseshoe tracks by our compass..." said McWhirther said. "Could we not follow it through by compass across the more burned out debris, and hit it upon the other side?"

"I don't pretend to say where the trail is gone at all," the latter said. "But nevertheless the one and only main place where I am quite sure it ought to be, is on the continuation of the present line. But it'll be two whole days before this debris will be cool enough to stop smoking. And we can't wait that long."

"No indeed," continued Gertrude Angelina. "As you say Mary there is no for certainty." "The"

"Yes," said Mary Florinda, "and when the Glandolinians got to some certain place, which is probably about half way across the burned ground and forest across the river, either to the south or north, and traveled on steadily in that direction, sending some of their cavalry men with torches in the direction toward which we may have been coming, to set the forests on fire, and sent it toward us, so as to both sweeten all away the trail or its trace and probably holding we'd all perish in the conflagration. They may have gone to the north northwest or south-east, or may have even doubled back and faced us again at only a distance of several miles from us, and sent a sufficient number to make a petty attack upon us to detain us if possible. We therefore have no clue to guide us at present, not in this intense darkness and all this smoke, and if we do not have any daylight to-morrow we'll still be forced to remain here. There may be a probability that the enemy may reach the main Glandolinian army, and if they do we cannot save poor Mildred, unless we capture some Glandolinian officer that is prized more highly than her by them and exchange him for her return. That is the exact state of the affair."

"That makes good news..."

"And in what direction do you believe general Temer Tamerline's army is moving?" General James Jamieson asked after a pause, because it appears to me that it is a waste of time to make a search for the trail where it left off, and that our only plan is to push on after the army which we ought to reach before the fugitives get there. And in that case if we found the Glandolinians guarded, we might surround them all. If they get to the camp we can try and capture some high commissioned officer, and then exchange him for Mildred, and when we once get her we can fight our way back..."

"It seems a capital idea," the English boy said to Gertrude in his own language which she could understand, "but I've found out it's wrong too. Miss Gertrude, 'The Glandolinians I have heard won't exchange prisoners for more.'"

"Do you believe set our so?" asked Gertrude, "seeing that no one approved or seemed to prove or approve of her idea."

"Yes," he answered. "They won't exchange prisoners."

"Not especially Tamerline," said Angelina Hichou to Gertrude. "That just came to my mind. The best plan is we must arrive our utmost to prevent the cavalry who have her in their possession from reaching the army."

The latter plan was believed to be the best, but even then Madcliffe said: "But there is still a great difficulty even in that way. I observed that the trail did not lead due south, as if it should have done if the Glandolinian cavalry were going toward or following general Tamerline's army. I questioned the guides, and many others too, and they all agreed with me on the subject. The trail was too westerly for the fact of the foe cavalry following Tamerline's army too far too the south for any other escape."

And from the appearance of the soldier, troopers I do not believe they belonged to Tamerline or any of his vast separate commands. I believe Manby and his army is nearer in this territory than we believe. I fear that there is really danger of a combination of the two dangerous Glandolinian armies, as there was something suspicious in this recent slight overcautious attack upon us to right, and that on the retreat the survivors went in the direction which would prove they may have been Manby's soldiers, and that on reaching their own hiding places—perhaps twenty miles or so from here—they laid in ambush for us several times. In this case not the pursued but we are in the greatest danger. We are being closed in I'll be bound by Manby and Tamerline. In this case to even insure our own escape besides rescuing Mildred we have first to find one or the other of the two trails then to decide the terrible question, which party of the cavalry has Mildred in possession."

Some of them expressed their perfect accordance with Madcliffe's views and others were surprised at this idea of having been so identical with their own idea upon the subject. The greater danger was upon the pursued not the pursued...2

Although this conclusion was unanimously arrived at it did not nevertheless seem to be conceded or agreed to very reluctantly by most of them, and the apparent reason showed as they were talking back hard where they had left the whole command.

"I cannot and will not believe under any condition that the conclusion we have arrived at is really correct," his blank remark, "I cannot help being sorry for my doubts, for ever since our meeting was adjourned I have made up my mind that she was likely to be taken to the west straight or they really followed toward the Timorinus army. I'll tell you why I have my doubts. The glandolinians are either, or think they are more crafty than any of us, and therefore have either furnished a larger command, or it may be to hood wink or fool us have made all these tracks on purpose to have us follow these, and throw us off the right track. Of course I had no reason for thinking so, but so it is. I know Glandolinians as I do my own name and I don't believe the very evil spirits are as crafty as they are."

"That is just what I thought," Gertrude said, "and the English boy too admitted that he and some of his other friends in the majority had all entertained a somewhat similar idea, for he too was well acquainted with the Glandolinians."

At twelve o'clock they were all again in the saddle having refilled their water canteens, and of watering the horses because it was hard telling where the next stream would be.

"How far do you think it crosses at the bend?" Radcliffe asked Gertrude. "It cannot cross very far I'm sure," Rad. "And we are so much nearer the section where the Glandolinians settle the fire, that I do not believe it could have spread more than twenty or so miles across. We have to watch out though for if we find the wind changing direction, we the smoulder we left behind can set the forest in front of us, and we'll then have a race for life instead of persuading our foes."

Gertrude's conjecture soon proved to be correct. After riding swiftly for an hour and a half, they came to the other side of the burned forests which were still smouldering infernos, and reaching a point which they felt sure was to the south of the place where either the right, or the false trail would have left it... 2-2-2-2-2-2 as they now had done more than thirty miles since the trip started at night, and the horses were much distressed and every body tormented, and half smothered with the effects of the dense smoke and sometimes coming toward them from the west, it was resolved to get away from it by going more to the northward. The horses fortunately had recently relieved what water they would swallow. All too felt much distressed from the unusual heat, the smell of the smoke, the fatigue and the want of sleep, but they couldn't sleep, though they even tried it in their horses, but the more they tried to sleep the more their "Turkish Bath" manifested itself. They had nearly an hour's rest when with the help of their flashlights they believed they had come upon the real trail. They saw it clearly despite even the gloom, and as broad and as much tramped as the believed untrue one but after a most careful examination of it there was but one opinion namely, that the number of horses who had passed was decidedly more than those seen of the trail that had been found going southward before the approach of the fire. One of the guides now told Gertrude, that he felt sure that at a very short distance further on to the northwest, there was quite a good sized lake of water much used by forest rangers, and where he had not the slightest doubt the Glandolinians had used to water their horses. Finding that it was not more than ten minutes ride, Gertrude after a brief consultation determined to go that way, which might give them a trace. In little shorter of the time named, they came to an immense body of water the forest being separated by it six miles in length, and a mile across. The horses who were thirsty drank heartily themselves, and filled the water canteens. The horses who were would be allowed to drink, and the dogs plunged in it with the greatest delight, emerging in their own usual gray or chestnut color, where before they had gone into the water perfectly black as ink. After the dogs had come out and shaken themselves, they commenced hunting around the shore, and one of them started sniffing so violently that the attention of one of the nearest girls was attracted to him. Presently the dog ran forward a few paces and gave a sharp bark of pleasure, and the girl running forward gave so loud a cry, that a hundred sprang forward. The girl scout however was not able to say a word. There half buried in the ground was a sharp dagger of long size, and round the point or hilt rather was twisted a large piece of uniform, which Gertrude instantly recognized as a piece of the purple uniform dress Mildred had on. They were all silent for a while from the surprise they felt, and then exclamations of pleasure and excitement came from them all, while Gertrude and others were greatly affected at this 'proof' of the recent presence of their beloved comrade. The dagger which seemed to be half the length of a sword, but was of Glandolinian formation was deeply scabbled into the earth, but it was placed at a spot where there was no grass so that any one passing to pass by there could not have failed to see either the dagger or the of uniform dress. There was a perfect shower of congratulations, and it was some time before they had recovered sufficiently to remove their own onward trip. They seemed or were radiant with excitement. Two Mexicans, Perez Martinez, and P. Mexican Pete, the latter well known however stood quite a distance apart from the rest and conversing excitedly but in a limited tone or undertone to each other. They did not even approach the others to right away mount their horses, and Gertrude's attention being attracted strongly by this unusual circumstance, she rode up to them and demanded what they were talking so earnestly and excitedly about.

"Well, neither of them revealed her for a moment or two, and she therefore repeated the question. Then Mexican Pete replied:

"Martinez and I believe the same. The Glandolinians have again played a smart dirty trick. She didn't say that there and if she had she would have thrown it among the grass for where you found it the enemy would have seen it. The latest one she has gone the other way. Again we are bamboozled."

and conversing grandly and bravely they both spoke these ominous words, Conversation and preparations were all suspended at these ominous words, and each looked blankly into each other's faces. Now that their full attention was called to it, the whole circumstances of the end case indeed suddenly rushed to their minds, and they knew and felt the truth of what Mexican Pete said, and now their hopes fell to a zero. Radcliffe was the first who after a long silence spoke:

"I'm positively sure, Gertrude, that what Mexican Pete says is right and that we have been almost thrown off the scent by a most dastardly trick. I know he is right for the Glandolinians are so crafty no one a prisoner in their hands could do this to bring persecutors to his or her rescue. Mildred would see too strictly and carefully watch by her captors, and as it is of Glandolinian make she could never have possessed herself of that dagger, dagger and then have fastened a strip of her uniform dress on it, without being noticed and if she had tried to do so our pursuit is ended for they'd have killed her right then and there. Still more impossibly indeed indeed in it that she could have placed the long dagger where we have found it. No one could have passed without noticing it, no unless we suppose she was allowed to linger behind every one of the Glandolinians, which is out of the questions, the dagger could not have been even thrown down here by her."

"It is too true indeed Radcliffe," Gertrude said with a deep sigh, after a short silence, "it is altogether impossible, and I should therefore call it all a clumsy effort at artifice were it not that it decided us for a while, however there ought to be some comfort for us—and it should decide the question as we ourselves decided it, Mildred is gone with the larger division of Cavalry, and to the northwest."

Preparations were continued but with a very subdued feeling by all the new of the trick Radcliffe had so now mounted his horse, and while waiting to proceed, being a lad of very restless habit began toying with the dagger. First he untied the piece of purple cloth, smoothed it, and put it into his pocketbook, while his eyes filled with tears, and he continued listlessly twisting the dagger in his fingers, while he listened sadly to the conversation around him. Presently his eyes fell upon a retreating number of figures, and saw a long stream of men go out of sight. He started in a flush of excitement rushed across his face and his hands and lips trembled as he closely examined the retreating figures, and saw one man turn so that he got a good view of his face. All gazed at him and the retreating figures in astonishment.

"Oh, oh Gertrude," Gertrude he cried at last, "I know that man I saw who had turned his head."

"Know the man?" all repeated. . . .

"Yes I am quite sure I am well acquainted with him. Don't you remember Mamma to one of the girls when we were in the Glandolinian camps so long on a spying exploit, that day that so many Glandolinians fell dead or wounded at Hedrick Junction, and one of them was a Christian spy in disguise which we recognized when there. He gave me a picture of himself for reward so that we could recognize him in case we were there again. This is the picture I most solemnly declare, and you see the fellow I observed is the same. He is the man whom I helped to recover from his wounds."

"Is he a true Glandolinian?"

"In birth yes. But he is for our side and scouts and spies always for us and is a danger to the foe. He never has been discovered, he serves with them to get the plans and helps our armies more than any one else does with the information he obtains."

All within hearing crowded round to examine the picture with their flashlights, and then Gertrude and Anneline said solemnly: "Praised be God for His Mercy, for He had through the intercession of His Blessed Mother decided the way in our favor. A holy cause always has a Holy ending. Without the slightest doubt, Radcliffe says one of the men wounded in battle at Hedrick Junction was a Christian spy in disguise within the foe lines, and he would now show his gratitude. He no doubt saw Radcliffe for Radcliffe says he made a signal with his hand as of greeting."

Gertrude's suggestions was carried out, and the battle was resumed in that style. The first volley of the exploding rockets showed the region crowded with thousands of horseback over whose heads the volleys of rockets slowly whizzed and exploded like a roll of thunder. Some of them happened to shoot against the tents not yet afire and exploding there set them afire.

"Do you think they will attack us again," Gertrude asked quickly.

At this minute one of the officers came up for orders. You will need to place Gertrude said to the general, "Two Regiments in advance of our main line to act as pickets. Others will be moved forward, and

"What shall I do about your own horses Miss Aronburg and Master Radcliffe?"

"But what about our left flank Vertrude?" Indcliffe asked. "It would be a serious loss to us if they were hurried out of the position in these woods, especially if they were thrown back upon our own scouts. Then all would be in the hands and our boys and girls would suffer a great loss."

troopers covered with their plan and MacCallie himself "but it would be dangerous, and would cause the rest of our battle line the greatest anxiety. I had imagined too, that the enemy's great object is not only to get to the rear, but also they intend to recover Middle River, and to threaten from there, and they will renew the attack from a different location I'm sure, and in heavier force, and, they may make an effort upon the Abyssinians on the left at the same time that they attack us here. They will not pay any attention to us as child scouts for a while. They have already found it a most difficult business to force their way through our line, and they may not do their offense, with their main strength, until they find them out of these woods in the first great assault, and therefore while the storm comes again none of us must be idle depend upon it."

14-00000 The preparations were hastily made and it was agreed that Gertrude, Helen Hoch, and Mary Stanley, as a usual thing the Canadian Linen Cartage Co. could take Gertrude and Helen to a woods by sending a portion of the force to "destroy" the woods. Gertrude thought, however, that an exception could be made in the present case, as they understood that the Indians were two extensive, the woods too large, and the Indians were too numerous. The men while awaiting the signal, but they were behind the trees and stood, smoking their cigars, knew of cigar and, conversing in low whispers. Angelina Jennings was in front of her position, the Redna Jones was her assistant officer, and Angelina dividing her own time, between them and the top of the highest tree

"There's someone there the consultant is on again," Gertrude said. "I'll bet it is an attempted kidnapping movement. Indulge have all our own boy and girls out to return to their customary position and have them all at attention so they'll be quiet. He don't want any noise up here, to tell the Glendelians that he is on the watch. On color, I Fitzgerald, you notify the advanced element, and I will go to those that on the right to order them to fall back. Attention."

"Sure thing, I heard a dull thundering sound like an army, a vast army of horses galloping in a strange direction, and incessant firing and other strange sounds. I should say there were a great many of the sounds. It seemed to last a little while, and then all except the firing stopped."

firing began at about half past ten but these soon ceased sometimes one or another giving a suspicious yelping but between these sounds no sound except the distant firing was heard. Every one was now behind their trees in different positions to meet the enemy come what direction he may with a service fire. The girl and boy scout force took up their stand near the house and extending their own line, several young men had left the cliffs and being joined by "two Sun" the distance for the defense was the same, but more formidable and extensive, and the wounded unable to fight, offered to and outside of the distant firing there was not the slightest sound.. Then there was a slight rustling noise among the weeds, and the brush, and as if leaves were stirring though there was not a breath of wind.....

Over, and over again the strange noise,, was repeated... However
ca. 10 m. on the landfills was it was impossible for even them to get away from their camp. They then placed on a large round stump which stood about eight feet from the ground, a large blue light, fitted into a hole she had made with her hunting knife. . . . A shelf made of wood and wet leaves had been placed on top of the stump (the pump) and just so large that it threw a shadow over the top of the "forest ceiling" so that those standing behind trees and so forth were in comparative darkness, while everything round would be in brightest light. There with a match in her hand in put the blue light aflame, she awaited the time to give forth the signal. Indeed for all the others it was a long time coming—so long that the house grew very painful, and ever, one in the forests longed desperately for the bursting of the "war storm."

Then at last it came. The wildest, the loudest and the fiercest yells of the Indians would be tame compared to the loud blasphemous yells of the Gandelinians which rose in on the still twilight air, and the assault suddenly burst with frightful violence and fury upon the Abyssinians and broke through from the irresistible pressure of it, and came rushing and storming toward the position of the girl and boy scouts as the soldiers were compelled to retreat before the onslaught. Confident as the regiment of boy and girls were, there was not one of them but felt his or her blood run cold at the appalling ferocity of the outer outcries, not naturally from the tone and sound, but of the frightful and dreadful blasphemies added with it. The flash of rifles, the retreating of troops, the gloom and red glare of distant forest fires, was enough to make one believe they were really on the edge of hell if not in it.

Simultaneously from the direction expected there was a tremendous rush of gray clad troops at the left of the position of the Abyssinians covering the child scout troop, and the Abyssinians met the shock like a breakwater meets the hurrying force of a storm wave. The wave broke before the resistance, but one section of it still pressed on, and then went down all into dead and wounded and dying. The slaughter was terrific, and as the Abyssinians line though shaken stood firm and flared the woods with their blaze of rifles, the Gandelinians partially fell back but then opened a muckety storm of their own. Then came from the Christians a rain of grenades and exploding rockets, and the carnage was redoubled.

From the effects of the awful fire the Gandelinians paused in astonishment. Their assault instead of forcing the line, merely caused or cost them heavier losses than before, the brush was afire because of the rocket rockets and there was fire raging among the trees adding to the consternation. Then the assault redoubled and then suddenly a bright light lit up the whole scene. As it did so from behind every tree and other position of the boy and girl scout regiment a stream of pistol and rifle fire poured out, repeated again and again, and so many reports in one was like repeated claps of terrific thunder. The rifles in particular heavily loaded with buckshot told with terrible slaughter upon the crowded lines of the enemy, and the discharge from the line of Christian soldiers a little beyond for a while cleared the assailants from that quarter. However general Fitzgerald of the Abyssinians was killed, Terence was badly wounded, and general Lopez was disabled.

The onslaught was lulled here, but elsewhere it still continued with all its might and the Abyssinians were decidedly getting the worst of it and their assailants were overwhelming. They had to swarm away from their more exposed position, and recoiled to another portion of the woods to which part they rallied, and poured such a fire upon the enemy that the survivors finally broke and fled in panic. After the "first explosion" of this action, especially in this quarter, a perfect quiet succeeded to the deafening din which had raged there, broken only by the sound of far distant battle, and by the glare of the spreading brush and wood fires. The reserves were now hurried to the front of the position, where the presence was urgently required.

Understanding the tremendous simultaneous rush there would be made at the new position, the Abyssinians reserves were posted at the old position while the hard pressed soldiers were placed in the rear, leaving the rest of the others in the further off positions to take care of themselves for the present. The first rush of the Gandelinians was so tremendous, that the defending line was hurled out of its position, massive in numbers as it was, and the line of troops in the rear fearing that their comrades in front would be again forced to give way, threw the weight of their numbers against the Gandelinians, among whom at that one mad onslaught over two thousand fell, and ten thousand were wounded, wounded many unto dying. Then with the failure of this mad charge, came a storm of firing on both sides, and then a portion of the Gandelinians save having swung round came rushing forward to assault Gertrude's position, not knowing however that it was defended by mere brave boys and girls. The boys were in front and they laid down behind the level ledges and with their pistols leveled at the foe waited for the light which was to enable them to see their foes. As it came they fired with their pistols till every chamber was empty, and again two thousand Gandelinians fell. Again and again they fired with their last pistols until not a single Gandelinian assailing them remained to tell the tale. It was a terrific massacre of Gandelinian troops, but the main line had finally tore through the defending Christian line of troops and these driving all before them hurried forward toward the other position. The boys held their position desperately until there was danger of a hand to hand encounter which Gertrude wished them to avoid, and then they fell back to the

to the position with the girls themselves, and this position both held using occasionally from tree to tree, and chasing the mad assailants with a murderous fire of rifles pistols, and hand grenades. In this fierce fight Gandelinians did close with them but the boys and girls were somewhat hard to be reached by the assailants because of their size, and were therefore moved down in awful numbers before the position. In this fight, Dolores though wounded as she had been, had certainly the honor of the first blood of a Gandelinian officer, she was also a courageous girl though so young, and having bro on her rifle when hitting a soldier determined nevertheless to do her own level best in defense of her own country. Therefore as an appropriate weapon, she picked up a flaring fire brand which had fallen from a thick and big burning brush, and seeing the rebel captain coming toward her with drawn pistol in one hand and a sabre in the other, she seized the fire brand on the cooler end and plunged the fiery part with all her force and strength into the mans face. A fearful yell of pain and rage followed which rose even above the tremendous din of the battle all around.

There was no lull in the conflict now, it was simply wild, and after the discharge of the last barrels of the boys and girls revolvers, and seeing the Abyssinians unable to stand, the boy and girls retreated, as fast as they could, fitting fresh chambers to their weapons, and then receding further up, toward a new clearing, let go some fire rockets and these going off among the shrubbery and brush started a fearful conflagration at once that sped with incredible haste toward the assailants.

The Gandelinians before this new peril broke and fled panic stricken, and the defenders let loose three volleys of the rockets among them and opened fire again with rifles pistols and hurled grenade creating terrible carnage and panic, and the Abyssinians seeing this, rallied, and stood their ground, picking off a whole line of retreating Gandelinians in a very short time until 17,000 of them strewn the ground.

It was a twice fierce battle than Waterloo, and the retreating girl scout leaders now rallied their troops near a ravine and rejoined Gertrude, whose head was banded.

"That's right girls—the fire did it, the assault is beaten off for the present. But we got to be careful. I just heard from our boy scout officer Johnny when we all call Johnny Dolt because of his never failing in his efforts that the enemy is bringing forward artillery. I didn't now they had cannons. So now keep to cover. They'll give us shot shell and grape."

"Now take your carbines" said the officer in charge of the Abyssinian troop. "There's a wave of Gandelinians coming toward our rear. I heard the warning from our sentries when this part of the fight began, but the light hardly reaches so far."

After hasty preparations were made to meet the assault from that quarter, Gertrude said:

"Now look out those in front. I'm going to send a couple of rockets over the assailants even if it sets the forest afire. Our rear is the most important, so all of you direct your shots and grenades there. Colonel Hurbert, and Captain Charles of the Abyssinians will cover us. Huckle divide some of our exploding rocket grenades among the rest and let go when I signal."

In another moment, the rocket flew up into the air, tore through the tree tops and as the light burst out with a loud report that was like deafening thunder, a wave of Gandelinians could be seen within fifty yards of their own ravine. As the brilliant light broke over them, and as the exploding missile hurled downward a storm of canister the Gandelinians scattered with a cry of astonishment. Before the light faded a terrific fire had been opened upon them. As the rockets burst Gertrude gazed eagerly over the wooded country where it was more open and fancied that she could see a long immense dark mass at a distance of over half a mile. This she guessed to be the horses of the Gandelinians. By this time the blue light on the stump was burning low, and Gertrude climbing the stump, and stretching her hand up lit another at its base and planted the fresh one down upon it. As she did so a whizzing of numerous cavalry lances showed that they were watched. A grenade also burst near the stump and wiped out eight soldiers near its spot. One lance with a long pole went through Gertrude's thin cloak pinning itself to a tree and holding her fast, another went almost through a thin sapling, a third struck her a glancing blow on the arm, and another laid John Andrews clean open from the lip to the ear. Another struck a girl in the neck and almost took her head off. The loud bleeding to death and couldn't be saved.

"Keep low under cover everyone," Gertrude shouted, "return the fire." "Are you hurt too Huckle?" Jane who was near by asked. "Not seriously Jane, but it hurts awfully. My chest is partly laid open on the left side. He stamped with rage and pain."

"What has become of the Gandelinians assailing the rear?" George Zimmerman demanded. "They are not rushing on to any fresh onslaught, but there is terrible firing somewhere."

"No I believe they have had enough of it in that sector," she answered. "But probably for the present until they get up their artillery. Then we'll get it. Now is what we should do is wonder how we'll get away. You see our positions are all exposed to their fire, for trees here are pretty thin and don't go within twenty yards of it. The Gandelinians are in hidden positions in front and behind and our position is pretty open in both directions, and we cannot see them except by the spitting of their

of their many thousands of rifles. We are under a murderous fire. The enemy is not at this edge of the position, so they must be hiding behind trees and other positions as we are, or are crowded among the trees and shrubbery at the other sector. The enemy is not as exposed as we are now, but we are safe as long as we stay quiet.

"No Gertrude," Haddcliffe said eagerly "we could have a secure position nearer the ravine. Don't you remember we left two rocky ledges a mile long?"

"Of course we did," Haddcliffe said. "I remember all about it now. Steal down and tell the troop of scouts to be ready to retreat to the ravine, and to fire as they retreat when they see another rocket go off. I am going to send another light rocket over in the direction where I saw the horses, and directly I get the line I will send off as many exploding ones as I can or as quick as I can at them. That with the terrific fire from below among them and the fright they ought to get when they see their horses attacked, they are sure to make a rush for it. Without their horses, strong in numbers as they are they will be jeopardized."

Haddcliffe came back with the words that all was in readiness. In a moment a rocket soared away far, and just as its light broke over the clearings another one swept over in the direction of the huge swarm of animals, seen plainly & plainly enough in the distance. This however didn't do so good. However, the horses didn't stampede as expected or the rockets didn't go far enough, and then a cry of dismay burst from the boy and girls' mouths rising in yet wilder alarm as three shrapnell shells almost exploded among them and tore gaps in the crowded masses of Abyssinian lians. Again and again was the deadly discharge of cannon repeated from the enemy, and with a yell of dismay a wild massive rush was made for the ravine and its shelter. Then the Abyssinian lians followed suit, and the Glandelinians with guns loaded with grape and canister opened upon them, every discharge telling in the dense mass of red coats who struggled to surmount a huge rise of ground. Frenzied with the danger, dozens of boy and girls' mouths attempted to climb a high fence surrounding an old log cabin, followed by the soldiers, and as strong as were the boards and posts, there was a crashing sound, and the whole fence fell in another minute of the struggling mass of hundreds of Abyssinian lian soldiers there remained only some twenty struggling forms, seven thousand having been shot down near that fatal fence. The boys and girls got to the ravine with small loss, and to try and confuse the enemy a volley of rockets were sent off in the direction where the horses had been, to see then a stream of signal rockets, whose light ones broke up by the artillery fire, and though the clearing was covered with scattered figures of men and animals, the animals flying at the top of their speed, the main foe remained in position pouring a murderous fire.

Then another fierce charge was made, and was repulsed with the loss of another ten thousand Glandelinians down.

"Than God and His Blessed Mother we have reached the ravine at last and we are safe for the time being," Gertrude said solemnly as all her force was now pouring a stream of rifle fire down upon the foe. Never will the Glandelinians ever forget us. But if it does not get right time pretty soon it will be all over with us. She said to Haddcliffe as she sent off another rocket, and it will take hours for the survivors to get together again and make a safe retreat. I have also got scratched again with a lance but no real harm is done. Haddcliffe you have only a flesh wound. Don't be frightened, Dolores," she added quickly as Dolores turned pale at the appearance of Haddcliffe's chest which was certainly alarming and Mary Gloria was trying to clean the wound. "He will put it all right."

"Do you believe it will leave a bad scar?" Haddcliffe asked rather dolorously. "Haddcliffe, I should not be surprised if it does, but it won't spoil your beauty long, your clothes will cover it, besides a good scar in honorable conflicts is always admired by all our friends. Now let us get further to shelter. They won't storm us again for some time. I'm sure, my arm too wants bandaging, for it is beginning to smart awfully, and I am sure all of us who have survived must want something to eat before the fight renews again."

The meal was eaten hurriedly, and then many were stationed as guards at all respective points, and were up and moving into new positions, the firing now distant, now close, now local and sputtering still going on. Angelina, who requested that nobody should go outside the exposed position until the dead boy and girls' bodies were removed and buried, as the sight could be a most terrible one. The men themselves were sent to collect number and hastily bury the slain boy and girls' bodies. When it was finally reported, these were more numerous than Gertrude had believed, and showed how terrific had been the enemy fire during their sudden retreat. The Glandelinian cannons had been loaded with grape and canister shot and the discharge of these had been most destructive more especially those fired at the closest range. Near the fence among the dead soldiers there were no less than eighteen bodies of boys found, and sixteen girls, while around the shed of the log cabin were thirteen others, three of them only boys. The shrapnell having hit the place had showed terrible effect upon the fugitives. At the fence were one hundred and fourteen others, all girls, men and boys. Of these only twelve were surviving but would not live long, another a girl lieutenant still breathed, but evidently dying, while one other had a shattered leg. Unquestionably it was found that two hundred others had been wounded, but had managed to rejoin their comrades and had their wounds attended to.

The bullets of the Glandelinian revolvers too seldom hitting a mortal point enabled the soldiers and child scouts much less than the balls of heavier calibre which the Christians used. It was absolutely useless for the men to move the children who lay dying, all that could be done for them was to give them a little water. A little later they too were dead. The more severely wounded ones were carried carefully to the ravine. Other wounded were found down by the cattle enclosure near the shed, and these believed also to recover were brought and attended to. Many other bodies were found here until the dead child scouts counted up to nearly two hundred and ten. In the ravine during the lull which was lasting quite long this time, many soldiers dug a large grave, as wide and as deep as time would permit under fire and in this the dead children were laid side by side, with their names first written on pieces of paper, age and so forth by man after man as fast as names were called out, the earth was filled in and the turf replaced. It was a sad thing indeed, and they were all deeply grieved at the loss of so many of their own number. It was two hours before all was done so a assault having been yet made either. Johnny Doit who too was wounded had washed away his own stains of blood.

Mary Gloria had to attend to the worst of the wounded, he had a slight knowledge of rough surgery, and she discovered a bullet at a short distance under the skin in the broken leg of Hazel Mary. Two other girls held her and Mary drew her hunting knife out down to the bullet, and with some trouble and drawing of much bloody finally succeeded in removing it. The wounded girl didn't flinch or groan although the pain was very great while the operation was being performed. Mary then carefully bandaged the leg and directed that cold water should be poured over it from time to time to allay the inflammation. Elsie Ruth McWhirther brought a girl who had her knee joint broken; this was of course a need for an army surgeon and it was carefully placed in a splint by Mary and bandaged for anything else she couldn't do and had to wait till they got to camp. Jane posted to an officer had a bullet wound near the hip, and with this Mary nor even a doctor could do anything for her recovery or death, would depend entirely upon God. All the care and attention possible was given to the wounded. The child scouts all through the conflict had maintained the solid front of apathy of their race.

It was now about five o'clock in the late afternoon, and though the battle was still raging fiercely the firing was more distant. The Abyssinian troops were still in position but in sullen despair, and now that fires burned fiercely they could see how terrible had been their losses. They could not tell the exact number yet as they had no time for roll call, but the roll reader may now that upward of sixty thousands of their number were missing or dead, and upward of eighty thousand of the enemy. Their best officers had fallen, as several of the most valiant braves of the army. They had been sadly defeated by the enemy, but had avenged the massacre of the rangers and rescued Mildred however. The girls' scouts over the imminent peril were plying and swinging their hands. Presently Gertrude rose behind a tree viewing a new lull in the firing.

"My boy and girls' scout comrades," she began. "Our position, and those of the Abyssinian lians are very dangerous. And now over their loss the Glandelinian generals are very angry. We have now so far held our positions as long as it has been possible, but later on we'll be as grass before the Glandelinian soldiers. They had artillery, we haven't. They are still overwhelming our losses in disabled and slain have been terrible. It was awful that we had to go through all this to rescue one of our beloved comrades. Indeed I never anticipated, and Mildred told me we were foolish to have gone at it with an attack, that we should have waited till night and then might have had the chance to steal her away. So far the forest hides us away from the strongest copies of the enemy. However the enemy is just as badly punished as we are. If they had not killed Dolores, Jane and Mildred we would not have gotten into this awful mess. But I suppose it was so. Mildred told me too if the Mangaboo officers would have retained the agreement with their Mic-Hollett lian generals of not firing her to Hanley, and if the spy could have set out with her, we ourselves could have been joyful and relieved, and we would not have needed to throw ourselves upon the camp and bring on this awful battle. But the chief officers of the Mangaboo troops would not hear the words of some of their wiser Mangaboo colonels. Mildred said they argued, some wanted to bring her to Hanley, others wished to take her to Hanley. But where are we now. Our own troops are dead in great numbers and I dread the consequence of the roll call, and our situation is very critical."

Gertrude then resumed her seat, but as she expected no one rose to say a word after her. The depression was too general, and the fact that, had it been waited for till night before any attempt had been made to rescue Mildred the dangerous battle in the wilderness would have been averted, was too manifest for any one else to attempt to utter a single word. After a profound silence of some moments duration, Gertrude again arose.

"That in the world shall we all do? The enemy cannon fires will cause us further loss, probably the enemy will be reinforced, the assaults may start again and they may even detour round and cut off our retreat. They too have many rifles and pistols which they could shoot off for many shots without reloading, and they have gath'ring guns which carry very far without their grape and canister. We are as grass before a thrashing machine before their fire. We are almost in the hands of the foe, and if they win now they'll show us not the slightest mercy, and the troops would have to fight to the last man to defend us and there'll be a terrible massacre of us and the troops. What in the world shall we do. We have four hours of time to go to. Should we retreat now or fight on till night?"

"You too are one of my best leaders" he said. "You will have a good heart and have often stood by my side in all perils. I will present you my own special carbine which shoots many times which you can use with those who are to cover our retreat."

energy to their efforts against the foe, and to reap the fruits of the war. For a probably a little close to two years Gertrude Angelina, and her leading followers had remained in the army going through adventures that the slightest coward would quail from. It was nearly that length of time since Angelina Aronburg started first with inciting child slaves to rebellion against the foe, and she now longed to see the day when they were to be all free, and the enemy made to beg for mercy. She sure for some reason or other had a terrible feeling of apprehension or uneasiness for the future. The Gandenian army under Tamerlane had concentrated between St. Ehrenfels and Isen, and now the enemy army was fairly stretched in position for a day beyond the town. A rebellion was rapidly rising, and there was fear that there would be a big battle here soon or later as Tamerlane was bound to frustrate general civilian who had intentions of retracting his city of Corinto, the harbor town, and the story of this most famous and bloody contest beginning early in April and ending in a dreadful and fearful result far too long for any written description to be given here fully. However, the fierce assaults of the enemy had to continue up to September before the complete defeat of the Christian army under General Aguilar and the closing of the mouth of the harbor of the town by a line of glandelinian warships, torpedo boat destroyers, floating batteries on rafts, and blockade runners, with the concentration of tremendous batteries on shore, was not only to prevent the escape of the Christian fleet, but to shell the city from all quarters. Then a most terrible engagement occurred in which the one hundred and fifty Christian ships of all sorts remaining were reduced to fifty one, and the sailors and soldiers their spirits broken, were all renounce of the hope to cut their way through the red line, in which it had been attempted, and the survivors attempted to be ordered to land and save their way through the wooded shores. However the expedition was a waste and hopeless one. The Christian army too on the shore was four million four hundred thousand strong, largely destitute of food provisions, and many of the soldiers would or ill, were it was sure destined to ill fate. Put off in their march, and surrounded by superior forces, they fought still only four hundred remained and these through a miraculous intervention from heaven, managed to be spared whether they surrendered or not. The wretched state of the inhabitants of the fallen town were treated with the most inhuman and shameful cruelty by the glandelinian victors. Also near the captured city were many deep and large stone quarries and coal and asphalt mines into which the greater part of the Christian women and children were lowered, and were left confined there lying upon one or another without the least protection afforded them or any convenience whatever. For them all escape was impossible as even though any one could have climbed up the edges were closely guarded by hundreds of sentries, and each for food only received a daily ration of one pint of canned goods, and half a pint of not too clean water not half enough to save them from hunger and thirst while they were daily taunted with the cries of the populace of glandelinian soldiery on them from above. Many of the captives thus confined speedily died, the captives were not allowed the time of removing the dead, or corpses. In this terrible prison they remained for days, when all the children of the surviving parents were torn away and sold for slaves, that because of the rest these reports were not able to tell. As regards the Christian armies holding the neighbor town of St. Teresa it was so weakened by this disaster that it fell before the assault of the foe who drove a blinding storm of shells and shrapnel into the faces of the routed Christian armies with their thundering batteries.

Another wonderful siege maintained by the enemy beginning late in 1912 and ending in July 1913 was the siege of Warner Junction. The story of this siege could have been famous for the aid given to the beleaguered by the great number of Christian and the assistance in the defense of the city. During the height of the siege by the glandelinians under a portion of Physicians army, directed by General Blackbrook, these celebrated engineers and scientists almost or did without the patience of the glandelinian army, they used their very ingenuity of defense and not aggression. They even constructed a terrible number of great machine batteries for blowing to pieces the glandelinian positions, and some fortifications, and ships, and setting fire to the glandelinian fleet, by the aid of long range gas hurling mortars, and gas explosive shells, and forming deep underground a long passage of tunnels so that secretly Christian provisions could be brought and reinforcements and ammunition. Had the foe captured this city the glandelinians would have burned and pillaged, massacred its inhabitants, and left it a mass of ruins. The siege however was unsuccessful for some forty miles, for a great Christian army soon reached the scene, and in the frightful ten days battle of Warner Junction the glandelinian army was completely routed, and only a single saved Blackbrook from capture as he was severely wounded. During this theatre of war the present disasters were confined to the northeast sections of Glandelinia, and Warner Junction remained unharmed. A part of the city of Andean Outhier was destroyed during the siege in the month of June 1912, by an explosive shell fire, and the month later was again severely shelled, and threatened with utter destruction by fire and flood but these upon it by the enemy in launching a levee of the river Raminie. The enemy finally was driven off, but it was again besieged in May 1913 and the story of this violation and the efforts of the Christians to stop the ravages were so long to detail but this siege accompanied by shell fire, conflagration, gas, smoke, and explosions almost destroyed the city, while its defenders for twenty one days were subjected and forced to defend themselves against the fiercest onslaughts of the glandelinian infantry. On this occasion the harbor was choked by the wreckage of ships and by the explosions, and though the siege was raised because of Christian armies approaching from Verdelin, when the harbor is still a safe place for a while to improve it in being, called at a great expense, but this could have been against the fierce action of the enemy and is one of the handiwork and that cities along the Glandelinian coast.

At the end of the one city went through a repeated horror before the enemy and before the Christians too that smashed all records, beginning April 1912 and ending September 30th 1913.

This city was St. Pierre Glandelinia. Before the enemy came up under one of the Purgarians, it was in a flour flourishing condition, but it met with a sad reverse at the hands of the Glandelinian "Lion" who captured it, without a battle as the Christian army was there to defend it, removed all the inhabitants and sent them as prisoners to Glandelinia, and captured the city, soldiers changing its name to "Black Flag town". This change did not last long, several ships were led by a Christian army from the southwest, in possession of the city, and captured one third of the enemy, and restored its name of St. Pierre. It yet had other misfortunes throughout that long space of time. It was again seized by the Glandelinians under Nicholas, regained and later again in possession of the Glandelinians under Cicero who plundered the city of its Christian military property, sold its inhabitants as slaves, slaying the parents, and planted there a battery of impregnable cannons. Strange to say, it again was recaptured, and under the Christianarrison it was about to regain its old importance in a short time, but after it suffered so severely from a storm that it had to be repaired, later Glandelinian armies under Gotha plundered it, it was sacked, and was again conquered from them by the Christians, was again saved by the enemy during a siege, and was several times besieged by the Christians themselves early in 1913. Despite all the disasters from the war which this city has suffered it still survived and the enemy had not tolerated it since.

Another town which suffered similarly was Timoleon, when a glandelinian army whose leader was not named in the report seized the place and pressed the population into a reign of terror. Then the Christian armies three months later captured it, but a month later the foe again were in possession and because they too again could not hold it destroyed it so utterly during their retreat that it had to be entirely rebuilt. This was to be done by general Monogis who drove out the glandelinian foe. The fierce struggle that followed before the recapture of the city by Monogis led to an appeal to the Glandelinian authorities for aid which was promptly responded to. In this way this town too was concerned in the origin of the long and desperate conflicts between the two great warring armies. At the close of this struggle the general was in progress for two months in the rebuilding of the ruins when again of a great struggle the enemy was again in possession, and remained so till January 1912. Even then it did not escape the ravages of the bloody war, during the struggles that followed the death of the Christian general Julius Caesar, and which general Menzina came into his command the Christian armies were beaten, and again it was captured and sacked by the glandelinian troops. This showed the enemy was showing his power pretty soon by invading Angeline Vine State rapidly gaining control of vast territories. Menzina Junction fell into the possession of a Glandelinian army and was held by them for more than two months, when a Christian army came to dispute dispute the foe's dominion, and the city fell to the Christians.

Therefore a came to it again however when a glandelinian army came there again and held it for six months, but again things turned when a portion of the Glandelinian army perished before the Christian besiegers and who sacked it through and through of glandelinian provisions. Again it was under the control of the Christians. After a month of Christian occupation the Glandelinians under general Franchise Penchle occupied it and held it for two months, when the inhabitants from the cruel treatments of the foe rose and drove the invaders absolutely from the land. The Glandelinians came and in the series of bloody battles that followed besieged the city, but the people boldly and fiercely defended their city, and for once in its history repelled an invading army. The foe again had it. The town never recovered fully from this disaster. The people also about forty thousand died of a plague and the town was destroyed by an explosion, and great damage was done by shell fire of the foe besiegers. The shell fire destroyed sixteen thousand women and children, and explosions in July and August also caused loss of life and property. Then it was occupied by the enemy, and still is in his possession. These cities are most fortunate for the most part had been out of the path of floods, or explosions, though the forest fires resultant upon the wars upheaval has made Franchise Penchle as hard as the rest. Here the destruction had been almost as wide spread as other ruined cities, although the city is far smaller than El Verde, La Polona and other towns. Many cities in Angeline Vine State have suffered much from the ravages of the fearful war. The Glandelinians under general Max, Syrac captured it in June 1912, and in July a Christian army made a fierce onslaught upon it and was repelled, and this was the result of a most protracted struggle, ending in the complete destruction, and the capture of the temple of the Glandelinian army, and the liberation of many child slaves held by the enemy. It was restored

"It sure is an awful situation for our country of California, Angelina Province, and other part," said Haddcliffe after there was a moment's lence.

"It is not alone the disaster of this flood, or at least the explanation, but the floodhorror itself was even complicated by the disaster we call the Red Plague, a profound ocean of the fires we now have seen as much either close or at a distance have seen the fire come forward even as if they were huge billows of ocean water, and this is the whole destruction of all our entire forests will soon be due. It's just as if there was a terrible eruption of fire from the bottom pit, and so far since last September a year from now it has covered over hundreds of miles of forested territory which is one of the greatest forest fire disasters in all histories of forest fires, but preliminary to its description I have had some experiences with forest fire disasters that any of you might be interested in."

"I have heard of many examples on record," said Gertrude.

"Yes, Violet, and her sisters have had thrilling escapes, one of which that of the great forest fire that overtook Cedronine Territory after the battle or after their rescue from Augustus St. Claire, which too was the most destructive to human life, while the flames which burned up most of the cities of Collier and Standlinburg and trapped and destroyed so many of their inhabitants was seen even on low level ground one hundred and fifty miles distant west. In other cases cities one hundred and eighty miles away have felt heat waves that drove the temperature to such a rise as to cause a general exodus of those places. This heat effect is common during these blazes it is feeling in some cases the same as heat waves in midsummer but far more intense than the hottest day in Africa."

"I was on a ship not far from Logan last when the explosions came," said Jane Helford. "The ship I was on was so violently disturbed that the masts and ropes were broken while the water was still, there was no blow on the bottom of the ship, though it did feel as if the ship was grounding, and there was too about twenty one jerks on the cable. Even cannon had been hurled up and down on the deck by these sudden vibrations. Yet there was no disturbance on the water Gertrude, that would show any signs of earthquakes...2.2.2.2."

"I don't believe I could fear the fires as much as the effects of the flood," said Haddcliffe. "In some cases this flood that has caused so much country has seemed to have proceeded the explosions, as it has at Abilene. It was predicted that at the city of St. Thomas Ten miles north of Abilene the water came across land like a huge tidal wave, and the wall of advancing flood was so high at its front as to literally lift half of the town of buildings, live ships and hurl them high and dry upon the adjoining highlands. I've heard too that hundreds of wooden buildings of the town of Boston was swept upon the sides of some hills by the violence of the rushing waters that partly swept away and inundated Mildred Greenburg. At regard the Delight's Junction horror the flood ran from thirty five to sixty feet high and created havoc in the Christian lines belonging to Vivian McWay."

"Well," said Gladys Wentworth "with this view on the subject, whether you may believe me or not I will describe the phenomena I observed when I saw the flood coming toward Infanta Maria."

"Infanta Maria," said Gertrude.

"Yes indeed. About it seems an hour after daylight (six o'clock in the morning it happened there readers) when I was the flood came rushing on. I was on a high elevation at the time which really saved me and my parents. It must have been about half past six or so in the morning when my father called to me saying that the river gorges seemed strangely agitated as if its northerly course was being changed suddenly to south, the current being in peculiar motion too and pushing forward the boats or capturing them. Other craft at the wharf of the city were treated the same way and I believed there was a storm coming with terrible winds as the ships appeared bobbing about as if they were bits of wood in a tempest. I was with were startled and surprised to see the river assume enormous proportions the such as I never saw before, and with a roar one of its levees burst, and elsewhere the river rose so high it topped the levees and fell on over in water falls. I then heard a strange booming and hissing sound, from the direction of the northeast, and my father suddenly gasped out "Good Heavens Gladys! Wife come here quick! See that! What in the world is happening. Has the ocean come over the land or what?"

"What did you think it was Gladys?"

"I knew we were too far away from the sea shore to have a tidal wave, and because the water did not come from the direction of the sea, however the flood at the front the enormous volume of water did look like a tidal wave of the most enormous proportions, but it seemed to extend in a very straight line from east to west and it rolled like a sea wave, and it was sweeping across the land, mounting low foot hills and carrying all before it. The waters in roaring, foam came rushing, and I saw too and scores of big ships were swept to pieces at once, and I saw one big boat part her anchors and go careening and crashing into other vessels before the flood."

A small town north of Infanta Maria slipped out as I say it swallowed up in the rising flood that roared around it whirled in fashion, and the oncoming flood arriving a swirling land and covered with masses of wreckage which was carried along with it and up a huge roaring cloud of spray.

"No over all of the accounts of this flood she had not been able to relate except no more come on a high elevation as I said. At Zoe Town south of Infanta Maria the story of the flood had been most terrific. At this spot the flood had swept forward and then the front extended a mile or so. The water advanced in front seemingly, with the appearance of a sea wave, and swept the town or half of it to pieces, and at the highest places of the town the flood waters had rushed for large through the streets to a depth of twenty feet. Nevertheless she continued."

"I watched the progress of the flood toward Infanta Maria and this next offering might had be transfixed for quite a spell. The flood grew as it approached still it seemed as high as the signal corner near the city. It obliterated the river and crossed the river ships about like townships of trees either turning them bottom upward or tearing them on their beams ends and a lifting them along with the current. It came toward the city with the same velocity but it seemed as if it were to be before it swept over the signal tower, leaving the building as if it was made of paper and it came on and the river front was then came a head of the river's front caused the flood to form into a huge long wave thirty two feet high, and the water then seemed to be held and form the opposing sides and gathered as if it intended it to obliterate the city and the land."

"It put out many of the fires then falling in the ruins. So violent was the flood that it seemed as if a big wind was coming on. The waters then rushed itself upon the city and all the adjoining land, and as the flood advanced everything everything was swallowed in the torrent. The house of mine own trembled with the shock of the impact. It seemed to me as if two strange men, one of water and the second of land was falling, the first falling most fearfully, the one as if the other and as if the land was coming in and the whole city into the air. The flood rushed at out hill, and rebounding hurled a terrible cloud of spray upon us from the shock."

"Part of our house was injured by the concussion produced by the flood. I can say the city of Infanta Maria surely suffered frightfully, but it was not really harmed any by the flood as many had reported, but nevertheless the deluge rolled in a mighty roaring stretch of water and swallowed it. The force of the flood destroyed the levees of the Zoe Lake Run and of the lake river too and I don't believe a single soul escaped out of the whole population. I even doubt if this day if any one ever saw their eyes at the lower part of the city which for month a was under the deepest water, and I believe is still flooded. The water didn't recede for over a month from even the highest parts of that city. The lower part of the city rapidly settled because of the weight of water upon it and even now to this day it is feared that it may drop into the river. Fortunately Gertrude, the disaster never did prove to be so complete as others have stated but never a nevertheless it was terrific and soul harrowing."

"The worst part was flooded to a depth of thirty feet, some of the levees along the river front were swept from their foundations and carried along with the flood. All the railroads entering and leaving the city that is the many railroad lines were destroyed. Someone told me a sort of hurricane or windstorm added to the terror of the flood. I heard that the middle region between St. Jean and St. Michael not far from Infanta Maria was blown swept entirely away, and that even to this day Delight's Junction is still flooded. Reports told that the river front of Delight's Junction had been completely swept away, Sunbeam River is still obliterated and a raging sea, and what is to be left of the river harbor of the town is filled with the wrecked parts of vessels of every sort and that because of the vast horrors which in that locality it is impossible to approach Delight's Junction by water or land."

"Very little detail came over here from Delight's Junction," said Gertrude. "Generally, nevertheless as far as I understand, with the horrible course of the flood, the mass coming of thousands of boats, the crashing of ships, the sweeping away of three quarters of the town, the flood had become even more horrible than I had feared. The land was covered with debris of every description, loaded with human bodies and that of animals. Reports as far as the town was danger came that the landscape was greatly altered because of the concussion of the flood, while all of the magnificent houses of the city of Delight's Junction had been destroyed or flooded. I also heard that the town of Delight's Junction, the flood swept away five hundred boats, and sank a thousand and did great damage to large vessels and river steamboats. At Delight's Junction they say a large steamer moored at one of the wharves seemed suddenly to be thrown up, upon up into the air by the when violence of the flood rush...reports said it landed on top of one of the lower houses on the west of the wharve and the left hanging there all night by the receding water. A bar of water 1 1/2 in. in the river harbor ran down into the street. Many others were said to have foundered. Many railroads were said to have been washed out by the flood, and all the leading fortifications at Vivian Wiley was washed and the buildings could not be saved. The square in the city of Birmingham collapsed and sank because of the weight of water on it."

"What was the worst horror of the disaster?" asked one. "I believe when fire followed it," said another. "I understand, following, the explosion consequences at the places not touched much by flood, as in the case of the overthrow of Francis Anna which was not flooded fire and great conflagrations started in all quarters of many of the cities not touched by the inundation and had threatened to finish the work of ruin when the strange consequences had begun. Even in cities that had been flooded, and when torrential rains in those localities delayed the streets, and fierce thunderstorms raised the flames were said to have eaten through the roof. In many towns and cities with the alive effect that great numbers of those buried beneath the ruins and or injured, died a most terrible death from the devouring flames."

"Could I couldn't do one stop the flames?"

"No. Water pipes were all destroyed, and therefore no matter who made the effort by other means no one could stop the fire, while in many cities and towns the gas pipes went off the strange unusual started the centers of the conflagration, adding hundreds of small fires to the general destruction. The soldiers and what were left of the survivors bent every desperate effort to stop the flames in Mildred Greenburg, but had no effect as they were of the fact that there was no water, and by the explosions of gas, the extinguishing of the great fires there proved to them a most difficult business, and on one passed before it had been accomplished. Glandelinian prisoners brought there were made to help and lend their aid in the fight against the flames but the fires had continued to burn in some quarters still there was nothing left to burn. The torrential rains accompanying terrible thunderstorms while adding to the results of the flood helped in the fight against the conflagration and therefore had prevented the horror from being as destructive as it otherwise might have been. Many scenes of horror were declared to have been witnessed on board a rescue vessel coming down the flooded river running past the city, and the captain and said that the gloom of night settled down upon Mildred Greenburg, the conflagration that were destroying what remained of the doomed city was easily visible the sky being as red as a blacksmith's hammer and only a few scales of a house or so here and there could be seen upright in the gloom (conflagration) and as that ship moved onward it was seen by those on board that many once lively villages and towns on the neighboring shores of the river had been completely wiped out or obliterated or were nothing more than heaps of shapeless ruins with occasional flames showing themselves and revealing where the houses and once stood."

"Somebody said 'Mildred Jane' that there were no vandals in these cities on this occasion."

"There weren't! Who ever wrote or stated that was loony. Of course the Vandals were Glandelinians, and they came for a time were able to show that they had the advantage of the situation and defied the restraint of the city citizens law, and the soldier powers, and began a career of looting and outrage which almost was gone in since the war disasters started. The latest historical instance of this terrible horror of vandalism was in the Sicilia horror. There however it was put to an end as soon as possible by the stern and almost ruthless hand of the powers of order, but these series of similar events after the Apollon horror was far far worse."

"But where did all those vandals come...from?!"

"I couldn't tell the details as of other cities," said Gertrude. "At I myself witnessed Vandalism in Francis Atlanta. The prison there collapsed at the first concussion. The prisoners numbered nearly fifteen hundred all Glandelinian prisoners of war, about whom three hundred were killed, but the survivors made their escape through fire and debris and started sacking the city. There too was a confusion going on, and such efforts to combat fires that the Glandelinian 'war veterans' met with no opposition. The local officer in charge of the city's soldier home guard in a dead under the war wreck of his own home. Everywhere should the flames fire in the night bloom was rising even their very lives amid the tottering ruins shamelessly striving to profit by the disaster to obtain articles and things which their generals could see to carry on the war against our country. They even robbed the dead and dying and acquired even possessions which they themselves had no means of procuring or conveying away."

"How did the northern army to carry on, didn't they do it for their own interests as usually thieves in other countries do or did they do it for the sake of their own 'hated' Glandelo?"

"No they did it for the interest of their country's cause and to have America united with which to carry on the war. These Glandelinian vandals in Francis Atlanta pillaged the ruins of shattered buildings, and even stole all sorts of clothing, food, and valuables from the buildings, and over removed clothing from the corpses of the victims and a great many of them to be used. They were not even hindered by the flames that raged in several sections of the city, but had the advantage of the glare and reflection, for their military vandalism therefore many a day and night in Francis Atlanta was one of horror indescribable, flood, fire, robbery, death and dying in every side, the city in the utmost confusion, and the people full of panic, and under a spell of terror and apathy."

"Didn't no one try to stop this horror from the vandals?"

"Yes and it resulted in bloody fights. Severe measures were at once, effected with the purpose of stop this terrible vandalism, the citizens who survived the disaster, and all soldiers who could get there being ordered to stop the Glandelinian looting on sight, but nevertheless the wild hope for gain for the purpose of getting spoils and provisions for their country's cause led them to defy and resist the authorities, fierce fights all of them in all for both sides, so occurring everywhere in the city. Thus it was reported that at one spot in the city six hundred and seven Abbeinnian soldiers had been shot or butchered by Vandals while trying to prevent their nefarious military robbery. On the other hand a foreigner himself was said to have shot one of the Glandelinian thieves upon whom were found valuables estimated to be worth $27,561,689 and 10¢."

"No longer did the terrible scene of Glandelinian vandalism continue?"

"For two months so the reports said. For those two months the Glandelinian vandals had the upper hand, the scum of the Glandelinian military being in full control and defiantly flying their very Glandelinian flag above some of the ruins and dead and dying and even rescuers and soldiers, citizens and the Charity and Relief Committees, and priests all being victims of their merciless depredations or fury, and they insulted nurses and ripped the clothes and head coverings from the hands and sisters and heaped the dirtiest insults upon them, while these good women were at their toll of mercy among the injured and homeless. One Glandelinian vandal was shot by some one claimed to have been an American while the Glandelinian was trying to tear the ring from the finger of a dying woman, and about a hundred and fifty others were slain in the midst of their work. They being soldier of course and used to war and deeds of any sort of bravery were even defiant enough to every time engage in pitched battles with soldiers, citizens and custom officials, and often won out in the fights, and only after the arrival of a great army of troops that surrounded the city and worked their way through the ruins everywhere, did the authorities of Francis Atlanta gain the upper hand and end this reign of terror. Things the vandals did couldn't be written in a volume. Little wounded children found in the debris, the Glandelinians and murdered instead of reaching them, it was necessary for everyone soldiers and citizens to proclaim martial law as there was no other means of dealing effectively with the Glandelinian pillagers, one who was a captain and who was captured being found in possession of all sorts of rings and diamonds and other articles worth $20,000,000...."

"I didn't believe the Glandelinians could be so down right bad...."

"Maybe you didn't Glady's but you'll learn soon. It was several months however however even with the arrival of the soldiers before the reign of terror could be checked, it being finally accomplished by the efforts of General Wise who was known as Richmond Halsted in command of the troops sent to preserve order...." said Gertrude. "I got his story as he told it to me of the work he had to perform when he came. I wrote it down in my little diary. I wonder if I have it with me?"

she searched through her waist pockets for several moments and found the key fortunately. The others about fifteen boys and girls crowded round her as she sat down on a small portion of a wall. Then she read for them all:

"What especially preoccupied me since the disaster is the usual manner of dreadful robberies since the first day of the disaster. I have heard of banditry in many countries by robbers, burglars and so on but saw nothing or heard of nothing to compare to this. Hundreds of natives and foreign persons pouring into the devastated districts searching among the ruins for bodies, or to help in the rescue of the injured and homeless were set upon by these Glandelinian military malefactors and robbed or murdered. The dead and injured have been found ~~any~~ with fingers cut off to remove rings and with ears torn to remove ear pendants. Countless signs of vandalism have been discovered in half ruined houses which these Glandelinians penetrated during those two months of general fright, battles and disorder. The other night after I arrived a group of peasants who wanted to enter Francis Atlanta for evident motives of rescue, or to find bodies or the injured of their loved ones, or to find out if they had escaped were fired on by these vandals and ~~one~~ one was wounded seriously. They were armed however and we repulsed the fire slaying three vandals and wounding ten, and yet every day since the state of horrible siege by the vandals until I came with my troops the reign of terror continued. I believed the city with the help of the surviving men and good women citizens and home guards, which I maintained vigorously, the military tribunals distributing the gravest penalties to all persons caught with any suspicious goods and valuables on them.

All the severity of the military was put against them and against all those in whose possession were found objects of value of which they could give no satisfactory account. And in order for me to clear the city of these gray coated military criminals my programme is to allow no one to enter the city except those whose interests make it absolutely absolutely necessary and to them I shall give a strong escort of soldiers to guard against any harm to public or private property. The city too will be emptied as much as possible of the women and children inhabitants not able to defend themselves and have them set to places of safety and to capture or destroy all Glandelinian vandals who obstruct the efforts of the authorities. The Glandelinians will be all made prisoners and shot if anything is found on them while I will try to persuade all defenseless inhabitants to go to the cities or to be not in the danger zone or to construct huts in the hills outside the city."

"Nevertheless" continued Gertrude "despite even all his efforts however, as he wrote to me when I was at Angelina Apatia the looters in places continued their dreadful deed, the bullets of the christian soldiers or citizens not stopping them and even soldiers were set upon and robbed. And even after the rigid enforcement of martial law in Francis Atlanta complete devilment and anarchy prevailed in the outlying regions, as it left without police or military guard, and it seemed as if the whole city was possessed by devils. I also remember one great fire that broke out. That fire while all fires seemed apparently to have been extinguished, was probably lying latent under the ruins, for one day there came a disaster almost dark and furred by this and on the night of June the last they broke out again in the following day in a most furious blaze that reached such formidable proportions before it could be checked that it seemed as a volcanic eruption as came forth in that part of the city. It started near the remains of the Holy Name Cathedral and during the afternoon spread over a very large district making its way toward the heart of the city. The remains of the city walls fell in and a great fire, the conflagration an or out of burning, found its way into the smoke, and existing the terrible fear that the still living were being ~~robed~~ alive. A large section of the unharmed buildings fell in a wing the progress of the big fire, the absence of water and the abundance of open places to stop the progress of the flames rendering the efforts of the fire fighters almost slight to make it later in the evening forunately a terrific thunderstorm came up and it rained such blinding torrents for three hours that the fire went out. The mayor of the city had a narrow escape from being caught under a falling wall while helping in the rescue. When the rain at length stopped the fire an enormous gap had been opened and the rains in that part of the city, ~~which~~

However ever since the time the disaster had begun no one could tell rightly even now the horrors and the sufferings of the many refugees. At or during June the first onset of the fearful concussion disasters was one of stupefaction and for many, insanity. The disaster both of the concussion and flood had come so suddenly, and without warning during that fatal midnight and early morning arousing millions violently from profound slumber to a terrifying vision of sudden death, their houses swaying as if they were cradles beneath them, ceilings and floors falling as if there was an earth convulsion, walls being precipitated into the streets, furniture hurled in every direction numbers of those who even who were not flung to immediate death screaming in mortal terror and groaning in pain. After the recessions of the dreadful floods from most of the cities, starved, still bleeding from injuries and almost insane or insane from their many days of horror, of being murdered and of other terrifying experiences, the survivors of these towns and cities had fled wildly in every direction, terrified still more by the savage fury of the Glandelinian howls, fearful rainstorms and also from the advance of whole Glandelinian armies that threatened their safety.

The spectacle presented even thirty days after the recession of the flood, even two months after as most terrifying. The tumbled buildings in one city alone not counting the others had destroyed and mangled many thousands, while hundreds of the injured imprisoned in the debris had been drowned by the floods, and no one could have reached them. One of those who escaped said; when being questioned; "Was there an earthquake?"

"No there couldn't have been though the buildings fell so suddenly."

"Did the earth suddenly drop and turn violently on its axis?"

"No. There was a sudden bumping vibration, as if our city was on a table and the table was hit by a heavy weight suddenly and violently but no other concussions. The whole population neither was not precipitated from the houses nor spun round as if tops as we ran through the streets. We felt nothing air, but yet the buildings vibrated, jumped and crashed in, many of us fell crushed to death and others bewildered had tried to find refuge for breath beside walls that seemed to withstand the strange vibrations, but they soon at other concussions met the same fate as of their companions."

What had caused the loss of life to have been beyond estimation was because in many of the ruined towns in the path of the flood, many of the fugitives and the victims too had been imprisoned in their wrecked houses.

The tumbled heaps of refuse making even for all fugitive fugitives escape impossible, and when the floods came they perished without any one being able to lend them a helping hand. And what aggravated the horrible disaster was that because of the frightful extent and fury of the raging forest fires in other sections of Glandelina darkness continued for months to lay over all, there being for many hundreds of miles no such thing as even day, and fearing to move when the crash did come for fear of bringing down death upon their heads many waited in trembling terror for the coming of the light of day in vain. They were then by the aid of the lights of fires been able to find their way out often with terrifying peril, and a floodlike clamoring up inclined floors covered with debris and hanging dangerously loose, until the streets were reached. They had been forced even to leave behind them plauding and weeping victims and dearest friends and loved ones so deeply buried in the rubbish that it was impossible to give them succor. And half of the number that had managed to escape were more or less badly injured, and for the countless living unfortunate indeed, indeed, who could not get out from the debris that held them fast, a dreadful death by slow and lingering either from the creeping tongue of flames that shot in blood red lines upward from the mounds of places and threatened to destroy everything or drowned in the raging floods that soon prevailed, though I can also add another deadly peril, and that was from the dangerous reckless and yet merciless vandals. For days and days after the dreadful floods had subsided from these cities, the streets had been terrible scenes. Walls still crumbling down at intervals, people still were dared to remain underfoot in absolute distraction or acting as if possessed, many of them utterly frenzied, silly, or cynical from the torrents of terror grief and exposure, and among the countless hundreds of the mounds of their fleeing in still wild terror from forest fires that menaced them or avoiding floods in the open country, there were even there by Glandelinian vandals by thousands who would rob them, hundreds of thousands more gathered along the muddy beaches presentation of human peril and half insane insane terror. Gertrude and her followers went on exploring the ruins of Etheldreda one of the victim cities, and then she herself said:

"I was at Abbeinn when the disaster occurred."

"So was I," said Angelina Pichee.

"Was you there Madeliff?" asked Gladys.

"I sure was," she answered. "I sure had a terrible experience and got laid up."

"What happened there?"

"I was in northern Abbeinn, and after my experience I was in a badly wounded condition. Indeed 'Infernal' is the only word that could absolutely describe the fearful and terrifying scene which I witnessed."

"Tell us something of it will you?" asked Joy.

"Well when the first strange convulsion came the whole city was fast asleep. I will confess though before I went to bed that night I had stayed up till half past ten watching a terrific red glow in the southern horizon of which I could not account for. I was not asleep even at midnight as the day had been rather hot, and the night was close. I had got up to get me a drink of water, when I heard a noise as if two enormous cannons had been fired off somewhere, at that second time the house swayed, the windows banged and rattled, and crockery and glass crashed to the floor. Curtains of the window blew outward and then inward and then all was over."

"Is that all that happened?" kind of judding.

"No, impatient, wait till I get to the point. Well as nothing more happened and all was still again I first glanced out the window believing something must have exploded somewhere, and then went to bed. I had not lain there two minutes when there came a terrific booming crash as if it was an awful bang of thunder overheard, and I was at that instant thrown violently out of my bed to the floor by the bed absolutely absolutely, would you believe it being turned bottom upward. The whole ceiling simultaneously crashed to the floor, and a roar told me the upper portion of the house must have fallen to ruin. I was stunned, and half scared, and yet realized the only thing I must do was to get out of doors while the getting was good. I did so just as more violent 'booms' came and the city was clouded in mortar dust, and the streets were filled with survivors, everybody having rushed out in their night clothes heedless of the debris falling on all sides. As the strange crashes continued terrified screams and shrieks and yells of terror mingled with prayers arose from all sides, and we heard heartrending appeals for help from the unfortunates held beneath the ruins but I couldn't see a thing the atoms atmosphere was white with dust."

"Walls were still tottering all around us, though the 'Booms' had stopped and not one of my party expected to escape alive. Strange materials was falling upon us literally from the sky and a great cloud of ill smelling sulphurous smoke from some unknown source soon enveloped us in darkness. There were some terrified girls and boys with me and in a frenzy of terror we grouped our way through the streets holding our own against the panicky people clambering over piles of ruins until we finally reached a place of comparative safety. This was not done until I had been hurled down and badly injured by some thing that literally fell upon me from the sky."

"Where did you believe that came from?"

"I could even think then. However all along the street were we were jostled by many scores of fleeing people half clad as ourselves. The houses still were crashes crashing down in whatever direction we turned."

"Could you Madeliff recollect what time it must have been when the flood came upon the city of Abbeinn?" was Gertrude's question.

"Not by the hour I couldn't but it seemed to be exactly the time for sunrise. I did see that the levee of the huge body of water the city faces had burst, and the lower parts of the city had been under water a little after the disaster. But this started to recede before the flood came. The flood never came to where we were, but poured into the lower western part of the city as if it were an advancing flood from the Ocean trying to roll over the land. It seemed to me then that this must be the end of all. The oncoming water rolled in a huge sea stretching across the land and over it as far as eye could see and covered with debris, accompanied by a terrific roar. I was there for four days after trying to find a means to escape the ruin without encountering the flood, and at night the horizon was aglow with the reflection of burning houses, and as if this was not enough I saw suddenly rise into the air a huge burst of flame followed by another crash that seemed to convulse the city and throw down many more buildings. That probably was the last of those explosions which cause we are trying to find out. Eventually I finally reached the principal square of upper Abbeinn. Here I believe were about twenty two or thirty three thousand utterly terrified people assembled. No one could find a thing to do for themselves. We waited in an agony of fear. Men and women prayed children too. Then I lost senses and then did not remember anything more for a time. Later I was sorry I had left the house for I found most of it except the top floor had remained intact. When I came too I was lying on a straight square stone covered with all sorts of cloths. I still could hear the injured hollering from their awful tombs beneath the ruin, and from what I heard them conversing about around me horror had added upon horror, and an strange inky blackness had pressed upon us with here and there a flame shooting out from among the debris. Then we had the chance we found our way to the harbor where the flood had thrown the water fourteen feet above the level of the lowest streets of the high part of the city and torn every vessel adrift. The large harbor was full of debris cases, steamers and captured capsize and other craft. I saw four big steamers Ocean going which had been flung on the big quay. The British Consulate was found to be a mere dust heap. I located what had been a friends house, where some survivors were digging with their hands and had succeeded in breaking through the fallen masonry, beams and rafters and broken furniture. They rescued my friend, his father and mother and little sister and eighteen other persons. We found no trace of others in the same building and it was believed that all of them must have been crushed under the ruins of the three houses adjoining."

"I forgot to tell," said Jane but one of the Vivian Girl Princesses had some experience in the disaster themselves. They told me so. The stories they had told me are interesting while the house they were in did not fall it was severely convulsed and mind you and in Angelina Agathia at the time she had been there and so had her sisters on a short furlough taken themselves and she alone happened to be awake at the moment of the concussion and was flung from her bed before she could even think of getting to her feet."

She hastily aroused her sisters and managed to get downstairs while after momentary pauses the concussions would continue with ever increasing violence. They as she told me had been delayed slightly in leaving by an injured friend, whom they were obliged to drag and half carry with them. The last and worst concussion which paroxysm was seemingly in the air as they reached the street, and to this delay they probably owed their eyes for they escaped the danger of falling masonry. She told me one hundred and ten thousands perished there. The house in which they had resided before going for their palace was almost at the corner of a large square and to that they hastened. There they stood in utter gloom of the night for nearly six hours listening to the death throes of the badly ruined city. I asked her what the effect was upon her and her sisters during those hours of such awful suspense and what they could do. She replied:

"We did nothing, in fact we could do nothing. We stood silent in the utter darkness of the night, dull dazed, half stupefied. I say it was no earthquake for there had been no concussion of the ground. I do not remember feeling any such emotions at such sorts of disasters in fact I was so used to all dreadful events that it was a drama to me I did not even feel the slightest slightest fear. Joy was scared however almost to fainting, some of my sisters were badly shaken and were ill for days afterwards and returned to the army as soon as we could win without even finishing our furlough. Yet I believe we all except Daisy Bailey and Hettie passed into a condition of submissive indifference. Hettie was the most shaken and she had been so frightened that she vomited blood, and for two days couldn't eat nothing, and yet with the slow coming of daylight, Jennie told me her faculties then were aroused. The gloom revealed little until actual sunrise, though she said it was the hour for sunrise, but there was none, and then she and her sisters helping one another strove to force their way through the lower part of the city for the palace, but found that region suddenly to have been all afire, and the lowest of all being covered by water which was speedily speedily arising. They found too as she told me to her astonishment and dismay that they were prisoners in the destroyed portions of Angelina Agathia. Every street leading from the square was piled twenty feet high with impassable ruins. They imagined then that they were alone the victims of this dreadful isolation, and hoped for the speedy coming of soldiers or relief parties. They had no suspicion of the truth until four hours later when they saw a priest a short distance down the street which was formerly St. Peters. They came up to him and requested of him what the situation was elsewhere."

"I thought Angelina Agathia wasn't ruined much?"

"That was the first reports," said Jane. "You understand Violet and her sisters are too righteous to even tell lies about disasters, and what I saw myself there, afterwards for I went there, to see, they couldn't exaggerate to even save their lives. I'll tell you what they didn't see. To me Angelina Agathia absolutely seemed to more. Even then though I came to see just to send reports to the nation on the disaster I failed to comprehend the nature and extent of the disaster but I with my followers I had Alfred and Jennie Turner and Walter Starring, and Violet and her sisters with me and we struggled over the debris toward the Aronburgs Run."

midnight hour he told them he had been roused from sleep by a tremendous roaring sound as of many buildings falling down. He stated he also felt himself falling, and he thought at first that he was in the grip of a fearful nightmare. He said it seemed to him as if he had awakened in hell for no sin at all for the air was filled with the most terrifying yells, cries, shrieks, and most doleful sounds mingled with a dreadful crashing thundering and hissing sound. He told them that he soon realized however, what was happening. His bed fell to the floor below killing some one underneath. That floor also gave way at once and thus the man and his bed came down from the seventh floor to the ground, always killing somebody beneath. There was one thing I saw myself worth repeating. Continued Jane. On the day after the strange concussions Violet, and her sisters after having recovered were themselves directing a party of rescuers and heard a faint cry of "St Peter save us. St Peter save us." Coming from deep down in a great pile of rubble. They thought it was the voice of some half insane victim or in a sort of delirium and the men began to dig and pry. They strove desperately for four hours, and finally reached a big cage of some sort containing what had once been a beautiful meow bird now bedraggled and covered with mortar dust, but still valuable and lively, and from the fright of its experience a little inclined to be vicious. The diggers, and even Violet and her sisters were so dimly dismayed and exasperated that Violet herself drew out the cage and one of her sisters suggested that they wring the worthless creature's head off for felling them in such dreadful times. But one of the men discovered that the removal of the cage uncovered a human hand. The hand was seen to move. The men fell to work with more vigor and presently they dragged from the dirt, dirt, three women, two children and a man. The doctors at the hospital said that all would recover. The animals at the city were equal sufferers with its human beings. Starvation was the fate of nearly all of them. Four days after Violet tried to rescue a small puppy dog on the top of a remaining six story wall whence he could not ascend, and the pitiful way in which he howled as she climbed up the rubbish beneath him was almost human. She couldn't get him however. His sister stood in front of a warehouse at the same time the interior which had fallen in, and she saw two dirty paws protruding at for half an inch through a small opening beneath and there came from within the most heart rending wails that a little cat's throat could utter. She had some liver in her canteen and she pushed half her lunch under the opening of that door. Then she and her sisters managed to by their own efforts force the door apart and rescued the poor half starved little cat. Violet and her sisters said that many of the survivors were not hardly able to help themselves. Jennie met a family consisting of father mother and five children standing practically with no clothes on in a small open square. The ruins were on fire.

"For the love of God little girls help us get out of this inferno," said the father of the family. "We are surrounded."

But to reach the unfortunate was utterly impossible, but Violet got rescuers to do it. Many persons were distracted. One old woman who had been released from the debris of her home did not realize she had been buried for four days. She had thought she had been entombed in a cave. One woman carried a valise in her hand and thought it was a small Blengiglomean creature. Another carried a cage full of canaries, and although they were chirping and hopping about inside the covering she persisted in telling the Princesses that they were little dogs in the cage, and she would not stand for any arguing about the subject and thought Violet, and her sisters were prize fighters going to carry her off from her husband. They even came upon the assistant Count of the city. The floor of his room had fallen and half conscious he was hurled into a mass of debris. His body was lodged in a niche in a wall and he was held by a heavy stone his face being covered by a rag that threatened to smother him. He managed to remove the rag with his teeth until he made an opening in the folds through which he could breathe freely. The man had lain in that position for eight hours expecting death at any moment. Violet, and her sisters had him rescued.

"What did Emperor Vivian do about the disaster? He wasn't in Angelinia Agathia then was he?" demanded Radli Radcliffe.

"No. Yet no sooner had the news of the disaster reach The Christian army in which he commanded and come to the ears of the great and righteous Emperor, than in consonance with his great record in preceding calamities of the terrible war he left the army in command of one of his generals and made haste to proceed at once to Angelinia Agathia and other parts of the disaster zone and to do all in his power to further the toll of rescue, investigate the cause of the disaster, and ordered a special fast boat to be made ready to take him as near as possible to the scene of the disaster. From this point he designed to make use of any means of water transport capable of conveying him to any of the ruined places."

"Did he go alone?" asked Gertrude.

"No he did not go alone, however. His wife Empress Vivian on hearing of his decision, resolved to accompany him saying that she would not give up her own privilege of sharing her all her husband's dangers for the cause. For all the enemy did, she claimed was done direct to her husband and to her. In consequence the Emperor and Empress left the Christian army together on their errand of mercy and investigation shortly after one o'clock of the 18th of June. A number of Abbeinnian Ministers, Senators, and Deputies, and the President of the State of Angelinia vine together with the Mayor of Pandora accompanied them at the time they left Violet, and her sisters had returned to the army. Ambassador Handon was the only foreign diplomat to learn of the departure of the Abbeinnian King and Queen.

He hurried to the Christian army stationed at Marie Gornum and offered them their Majesty's condolences in the name of the English Nation saying that all other disasters the world had known of made it possible for all Christian nations to realize what a calamity that had raged in Quiverinia meant. The King and Queen thanked the Ambassador warmly and asked him to convey their appreciation to the English Government and people. There had been a great crowd of soldiers at the boat station to see the Emperor and the Empress go. The women refugees cried, and said "God Bless you in your dangerous adventure as they bade farewell to the faithful Abbeinnian rulers. Among the persons however were a number of Abbeinnian Deputies one who had desired to say something effective and therefore exclaimed; "I hope the Presence of your Majesties will be able to control and cheer up the stricken population." However he had turned sharply upon the speaker and abruptly replied "What do you know what I'm going to do?"

"Where did he go first?" asked Gertrude.

"To His own city of course. He proceeded by boat down the flood the only way of navigation reaching Angelinia Agathia about six days later. They then at once made for the ruined city. The surviving people, women men and children wept from emotion and gratitude when they saw their Emperor and Empress come ashore to their ruined city. The women and children threw kisses to both rulers and both were practically carried up the pier in the arms of their subjects. Immense crowds of the terror stricken victims swarmed around the royal party, prostrating themselves in the mud and crying aloud for pity. This reception and the sad horrified sights around overcame her Majesty, who took sick and almost fainted. The presence of the Emperor and the sudden illness of the Queen acted indeed as a general inspiration, even the injured found fresh strength when they found out that their Emperor and His Queenly wife had arrived among them. Many terrible stories were told to His Majesty in connection with the toll of rescue. He was told that in many cases injured men and women could not escape out of reach of the crumbling walls, and faced dire perils until they could be moved to a safer place. His Majesty however lost little time in listening to the recital of horrors. He immediately joined a big rescue party, and while directing it, labored and toiled as hard as the others, putting on a pair of old overalls and not appearing as His Majesty at all. His first act indeed was to personally remove from the ruins as many persons injured or dead as he could discover."

"What about the poor queen?" said Radcliffe.

"Well she is a strong willed woman and it did not take long for her to recover from her faint faintness caused by the distressing sights on all sides, and she when she was well enough followed the example of her husband."

"What was the most she did?"

"Why she devoted all her attention principally to the little children and rescued with her own hands a little boy and girl four years old bleeding from many cuts and wounds, and carried them to the hospital where she nursed them till herself."

"Didn't they meet with any danger during all this time of their rescue work?"

"They sure did. Their rescue work was not without its greatest perils, and one day while the King was standing in one of the streets in Angelinia Agathia he ran the great risk of being buried on or under the ruins and falling walls of a wrecked building. It had crashed down just a half minute after he had left the spot. After his work of inspection in Angelinia Agathia, so I heard from Violet herself, he visited at great peril from flood, fire, wreck, and the enemy and vandals all the wrecked villages along the Aponburgs Run meeting everywhere flooded cities and towns and scenes of immeasurable desolation. He sought Dorothy Gale on the 21st proposing to make a similar inspection of wrecked villages and towns in that province but Dorothy Gale was unapproachable. He as Violet told me reached Patricia's but Dorothy Gale was unapproachable. He as Violet told me reached Patricia's early in the morning by boat, and in company with the Queen visited the scenes of the ruin and desolation and gave directions regarding the rescue work."

He tried to go further but the flood raging south of Patricia was impassable, and full of floating debris, and thanks to his superhuman strength he was able to save his life when six Glandelinian Vandals attacked him with the purpose of robbing him. Then embarking on a warcrusier which was to go by flood northward he sent the following wireless message to Count De Biff:

"I return from the city of Patricia which I found in a condition far worse than Angelinia Agathia. The Prefect of Patricia says that grave injury had been done to all the communes of his own province. A Abbeinnian warship taking chances with the perils of the inundation will arrive at Calverine this morning with five thousand wounded and everything must be prepared for their landing and housing. Another ship will carry wounded to St. Michael. It is desirable to provide at Calverine ships that can bring an abundance of medical supplies, and having the disaster investigated. The reports of how the concussions were, and of people hearing strange distant than thundering sounds, seems fishy to me. The disaster positively was not an earthquake. I'm suspicious and so are my helpers."

Emperor Vivian."

On a Saturday Violet told me the Emperor too the decisive action of putting into a new office a Mayor and chief engineer for the city of Dorothy Gale in place of those who had died in the ruins. The Emperor continued his own labors in both these big ruined cities, and the Empress in spite of his entreaties refused to return to Abbeinnia saying firmly that her post of duty at that dire time was among the sufferers. Nevertheless girls the presence of our great Emperor gave the most unusual impetus ever seen to the relief work as far as communications did not interrupt too much. At night he walked and labored for many hours amid the wreckage apparently not even having the thought of food or rest in his devotion to the needs of his good subjects. He did as much as the others in rescuing the unfortunate victims in the ruins."

"The Emperor and Empress of Italy's done the same in the great Messina earthquake," said Joy.

"God bless him for it, but our's was the same nevertheless. In one case he discovered a man, his wife, and three children held tightly under the ruins. Of the poor woman only her head and shoulders were visible. His Majesty summoned a rescue party, and while the men were at work he did his best to give the victim all the encouragement possible, and even from his own provisions gave the man and his wife and children food and drink."

"Did the Emperor ever catch any one taking pictures of the ruins?"

"Yes, confound them, and they were foreigners. Violet herself met several engaged in taking pictures of the sad scenes as she told me in Glinda city, and she had them arrested and run out of the province. Even poor Violet, and her sisters, one of them born on foreign soil, still had done their share, and the people could not but help worship them for their love and self devotion, and their unselfish service given by them, and remember no other children of such high lineage had ever done anything so much as they have to cause them to be so doubly dear to the nation. Their mother the Empress was as if she were them too and the devotion of all was particularly strengthened by them sometimes conveying little children in their carriages from the bare hospital to their royal palace at Angelinia Agathia which had a good deal after all survived the concussions. It was reported the poor queen did not appear at all well, she too was greatly exhausted, and the terrible scenes she had witnessed had affected her very strongly. Violet told me how often she that is her mother had wept, and that on more than one occasion she covered the hands of some unfortunate man, woman or child with her tears, and with her own hands she bound up their wounds using her own dress to make bandages when other bandages were not to be had. She also had given of her own worldly possessions, including the ring and other jewels from her fingers for their aid and relief."

"She sure was a good queen."

"She sure was," said Joy.

"What else did she and he do?"

"There was one time when she was hurt in her charity work," said Jane.

While she was engaged in one of the improvised hospitals the queen was injured as a result of the onset of a score or more of those devilish Vandals whom she surprised in their robbery of victims. Before they ran away at her approach one of them threw a big stone which caught her in the chest. The queen had fallen backwards. They saw her mouth became full of blood and this bleeding continued for some time. The Vandals were pursued by enraged citizens who shot every one down as if they were mad dogs... Yet the next day she still continued her dangerous toil as usual although every now and then her lips were reddened with blood. Toward the end of the month as the Princesses told me the Emperor and Empress because of the strange and preternatural progress of the war were compelled to return to their own respective stations but their efforts was not given up. Violet and her sisters when ever they have the time always do what they can in securing clothing for the refugees, food and so forth. Emperor Vivian has also done his share by placing three of his royal palaces at the disposition of those engaged in succoring the victims of Angelinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale and other cities. Indeed Gertrude the quick and warm response of these two royal persons to the needs of the suffering did much to endear them to their subjects. However the Emperor did pass a decree that none of the disaster should be ever found out by the armies, until the true cause is known."

"You say Jane that loss of life was so heavy at Angelinia Agathia?"

said Gertrude.

"Not me Gertrude Violet, and her sisters said so. But rescuers had started immediately after day had dawned following the disaster, and even then the hands of many rescuers were at their toil of mercy in the desolate streets. Violet, herself had told me that only a miserable fragment of the populace had escaped from their fallen houses in both Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale."

"Which cities were hit the hardest?"

"They seemed both hit just as bad," answered Jane. "Both were of equal population too and the loss of life was about the same. Of the remainder not counting the survivors Violet said that uncounted thousands either lay dead amid the ruins or were buried alive in the fallen horror, some of them visible before her eyes, others made themselves known only by their call for aid or some means of pain, and to save the latter was a duty of immediate and pressing importance."

"How many rescuers were at Angelinia Agathia?"

"Their number was not estimated, but strange to say Gertrude, would you believe it they were mostly foreigners?"

"Foreigners. See here you're giving me the flim flame Jane."

"I am not. If you don't believe me ask Violet, or her sisters."

"But what were foreigners doing down there?"

"Many ships lay in the harbor even at the time of the catastrophe and most of these ships had been foreign interred there by the fear of the enemy outside of this zone of comparative safety, and from these when their crews had recovered from the terrifying effects of the strange tidal wave on the big river produced by the concussions and which had lifted and flung their ships about as if they were cork's, the warm hearted foreign sailors landed and set to time in the beginning of the noble work of rescue. They were British, French, Russian and other ships all near at hand and these too had been rushed to the harbor of Angelinia Agathia or Dorothy Gale, and their sailors and passengers sent ashore where they had at once started in the perilous work of removing the wounded from the dreadful tottering ruins and conveying them to places of safety."

"Where were the larger number of rescued brought?" asked Gladys.

"A large number of the rescued," answered Jane, "were transferred to these and Christian ships, which as Violet said, who went aboard became great, floating hospitals."

"How many doctors and nurses did they get?"

"Not a single one!"

"Not a SINGLE ONE? Say Jane are you goofy?"

"I am sure am not. Doctors and nurses were either in the ruins in the desolate region or so many in the army that they couldn't be had."

"Gertrude and the rest looked at Jane straight for about a minute."

"What's the matter now?" she asked.

"I'm just wondering if you're not talking through your hat."

"I might be but I've not got a hat on. Of course I'm telling you just what I've heard from Violet, and her sisters. I saw very little of the disaster. The disaster is far more extensive, far more dreadful than you Gertrude or the rest of you here will ever hear of for months. Three hundred thousand was the total dead at Angelinia Agathia, and that many more at Glinda which was hardest hit. Also the same at Jessica."

"Well no let's not argue about it," said Madcliffe. "We haven't the time, but I believe it's true. Go on Jane. Let's hear more. But God help us if all you say is really true."

The British sailors and men began their work by saving a family of five who were imprisoned in St. Elizabeth's boarding house and school. They aided in removing a good many more mostly children who were pinned beneath the mass of debris.

"How about the Russians? What did they do?"

"A number of them were killed in their rescue work. Violet and her sisters helped there and had a narrow escape themselves, and saw the Russian. They came from the rescue ships of some Russian names I cannot pronounce and these crews were equally as prompt and efficient and showed such courage and reckless daring in their work among the unsafe ruins at Jassica as not only to win the highest praise on lip or every lip but about sixteen of them perished, and Violet and her sisters almost perished with them. I heard these words from Evans himself. You know how Violet and her sisters are. If they ever had any fear of anything then it must have been only of sin. They hesitate before no danger, and they had been seen helping soldiers and men to dig under tottering walls, or entering unsafe shells of buildings when begged to do so by some frantic woman who had not lost all hope that husband or child was still alive."

"They have done daring stunts that I'd go in the background to escape," said Gertrude. "They had me in terror once when I went out adventuring with them."

"Will you tell me about their narrow escape?" said Madcliffe. "Where did it happen?"

"In Angelina Agatha and within sight of their partially ruined palace. It was a part of the Palace wall. The incident happened the day when they reached there after hearing the news of the awful disaster. They followed a party of both Russian and French sailors and men and stood near a part of the Palace wall still standing precariously. A foot or two or less Evans said only remained of the fifth and sixth floors and upon these narrow ledges were a number of men, women and children crying desperately for help. There were no ladders, and rescue seemed impossible. What the men did not dare to do Violet, and her sisters using good presence of mind did. They did the most heroic thing of their very lives and no one could prevent them, while

Jennie too the foot being the strongest of her sisters, the others stood starting from her on each others shoulders against the outside of the wall and Daisy carrying a large pick, climbed over them and using her weapon as an ice pick drove it into the mortar high above her own head.

By this means that brave little sprite pulled herself up to a window sill, released her pick and used it again in the same way to gain a narrow and nearer window far above, almost fell three times, and finally reached the terror-stricken refugees about one hundred feet in the air. She then was able to encourage some men to come up in the same fashion, and the men lowered the refugees with a rope to his comrades below and then after Daisy came down by means of the rope slid down himself. The little party including Violet and her sisters assembled in the narrow courtyard, prepared to depart and one of the sailors was wrapping his blouse around one of the almost naked little refugee girls. At that moment the tottering wall fell upon them and killed every one, all the victims so perilously saved, and the brave rescuers. The only reason Violet and her sisters had not been caught was that they had just then gone off to another rescue party to help there, and were one hundred feet away when the wall crumbled; some of the bricks however hit them, and they got clouds of dust into their faces and had to spend an hour and a half to get their eyes cleared of the dust by a woman who knew something about nursing. They I believe never forgot that horror. This shows indeed Gertrude that the impetuosity of these heroines, friends of ours and the foreign heroes led them to dare the greatest risks, as this disaster showed. Indeed here is another terrible thing to relate, the work of dangerous rescue at the priory house of St. Raphael Church was the most saddest and the most troublesome I ever heard of, and from the lips of Violet and her sisters themselves. The rescue party, led by them through the most heroic efforts and in the face of occasional onslaughts from Glandelinian vandals dressed as citizens finally reached a portion of the ruins under which came groans which showed that more or one of the inmates of what had once been a priest house were yet living. This fact infused fresh vigor into the men directed by our princesses, and though they were fired on occasionally they toiled most heroically, but no success rewarded them even though they continued their desperate efforts as long as daylight would let them.

"You don't mean to say," put in Gertrude, "that even the rescue workers were so wickedly fired on by Glandelinian vandals?"

"I'll say they were and two of them were killed too by the Glandelinians who were 'charismatic'. However this did not stop them, and getting with them an armed gang, work was resumed at daylight the following morning.

The reader himself or herself always knows that the heart of man always beats in a responsive manner throughout the world and all have sympathy for one another when misfortunes, such as storms, cyclones, floods, fires, volcanic eruptions, earth convulsions and the other calamities extend to the ends of the earth. As it is let the awful occasion arise and the reply and aid come forth with heartfelt efforts and so forth. This is always the case now in our own days when the means of all sorts of communications between the nations of all regions and climes are so prompt that we learn of disasters almost at the time they happen to occur, and have them detailed to us in such vivid reality (sometimes or often even exaggerated) that we seem to be almost gazing at them as they occur, and then our hearts beat with desire to help our brothers of whatever race and color for in these days the universal brotherhood of man is almost a thing accomplished, so closely linked are all the people of the world by bonds of immediate association.

It was the same with all nations in this story. Though all communications of all sorts were utterly destroyed throughout Calvernia, and as many cities, cities and towns and railroad lines as the whole United States and South America may have, as though as much forests were going without stopping as the whole State of California may have at once in fire, and though Glandelinian submarines were creating a reign of terror on the seas, and other dire perils unaccountable, the news of the disaster, its progress, its dreadful results, and its length of duration had gotten out to the nations of the world in the shortest time.

When the news had been first pulled through concerning the great lake fallen horror, the world had it in less than three days. A very recent example of this was also in the case of the destructive southeastern Calvernia Red Plague of the Forests, where the people of the whole of Atlanticia stood half paralyzed in startled horror, sympathy, apathy, and true hearted grief, feeling toward the sufferers as though they were the dearest relatives of their own blood, and putting out their wealth in untold profusion for the relief of the sufferers, and the men of various towns and cities volunteered their services to go forth into Eastern and southern Calvernia and fight the huge conflagration.

There no doubts of course were some misadventures of their own native land, linked to each other indeed by the ties of nationality, but also in the case of the other frightful almost simultaneous disasters, the affect of which would not let up, which had caused the destruction of so many cities and towns by explosion, conflagration, fire and flood, and raised by Glandelinian men violence, the sentiment felt for the victims of these disasters not by only their own nationality, but by the world in general was none the less intense and the haste to aid them none the less immediate.

In this story the world stood appalled at the lengthy duration of the big flood, three months duration already, and now only beginning to show considerable signs of recession. Therefore all up to this time the same brotherly feeling was manifested in the destruction of the fair cities of Angelina Agatha, Dorothy Gale, Jennica, and Glinda; and the world though it half heartedly believed these disasters a "Salem, cataclysm of unusual and record breaking fury" nevertheless turned suspicious eyes on Glandelinia.

Indeed though the heart of the whole world was truly shocked by the dire disaster, and the long continued suffering of the victims, and gave expressions of sympathy and aid, and offers of other sorts of aid came from all nations of the world in this story if I would even dare to conclude America, Europe, and from Canada to Rio Janeiro, and other capital capitals from the far south, these nations, and their rulers had received from news paper correspondents, and others, all such reports of the disaster, the stories of refugees, and had received such photographs of the appearance of the disaster, that all the people despite the reports of scientists that it was a natural disaster felt that it didn't listen good to them. However from all the rulers even with the continuation of the catastrophe came expressions of condolence and from these subjects of the catastrophe, great spontaneous contributions of aid which all were before the world closer together in times of great calamities. All the little children made great sacrifices, to aid the sufferers and even cried. Hundreds of ships, and trains bearing supplies were continuously on the way to the devastated country, and all the ambassadors and ministers in the Calvernia Capital Sacramento City hastened to express their deep sympathy with Calvernia and her States in her unusual affliction. However the nations did not like the looks of things, of course it is true, great disasters, such as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions and so forth have occurred during wars, as well as times of peace, but these Calvernia calamities certainly did seem a war to the people of all the nations, and they positively believed Glandelinia had something to do with it.

When the men fell to their efforts with a greater aim, feeling certain that the prisoners were alive beneath the debris. Only a muffled gas sometimes heard now and then and that meant it was a great relief, and often the rescue was forced to stop directing to fight off the number of these half man mutilated Glendelinians, and still the rescue was, among were a number of Russian allies perished. Evening fell and as twilight told me at the fifteen one of the race, racially Glendelinian Vandalia there a big bomb which exploded near the debris where the rescuers were at their efforts causing a concussion which rendered the situation so tense the men undertook to give more extremely dangerous, no the following walls about them threatened to fall momentarily, and bury them with the debris already there. The sailors were however so careful of any damage, and while some continued to fight the Glendelinian vandals, the Russians too, the others continued their desperate efforts, refusing even under fire to be denied the chance of rescue, and their persistence were soon rewarded for they found the bodies of six of the prisoners all dead. The bodies were badly crushed, and it seemed as if death had been almost inevitable. However they were not deterred by this gruesome find nor by the efforts of the Glendelinian vandals to stop them, and they kept hard at work until finally the groans and cries beneath the twisted wreck began to cease, and the efforts of the vandals grew more and more that they were convinced all had died. Only then did the men feel compelled to quit the work."

Probably if it could be said, among the earliest and the most prominent to offer compliance and aid, would have been the United States, which also could have entered upon the work of espionage activity that was to comprise the basis of the Counting thereafter with all the other confederates from the British to the Chinese. But the Counting was not to follow the first suggestion of assistance came to Emperor Theodoros of the following confession of the only communication from the Emperor of the other far distant Catholic Christian nation called Protestant. [111]

However throughout all the christian nations the appeal for contributions have continued, and indeed it was apparent the Belgian Government even of Protection, and indeed it was apparent the Belgian Government provinces had brought all the nations of the world together in a common cause as never before seen or heard of in any history Indeed from every quarter of civilization relief funds and supplies poured into Abbeville for the stricken as long and continually desolated by the strange disaster work shown by a nightide and lightning a great unanimity without parallel in all the centuries that have come on before.

A time of profound and dreadful war and yet at a time of peace with each

The Protestantia, and the Condencia ships were able to go at about two hundred and fifty miles a day, and as the distance to Sacramento Abbleannia is about thirty three thousand miles (miles) it was hoped to make the trip in less than a month. In Sacramento Abbleannia, the ambassadors of various nations were equally prompt and ardent. One of them chartered for five months out of his own salary an Olverinian Steamer, of 88,000 tons loaded it with medical supplies and provisions, put on it three doctors, and four nurses, two priests, and several Nuns and dispatched it without delay to the land of need, and he did not even expect any reimbursement to the generosity of any people. On its way this ship was accompanied by a foreign ship believed to be an Austrian also loaded with provisions. Neither of these ships have ever been heard of since.

This work of international sorrow and sympathy was received with expressions of warm feeling from Emperor Vivian and the Premier of Abbleannia, the former answering in a return cablegram to the ruler of Protestantia.

"What your country has done on this occasion is most magnificent and shall never be forgotten. Your nation takes grave chances to the loss of ships however from enemy submarines and therefore our fleets will afford your mercy ships with all the protection available. Yours and the United States have always stood first outdistancing all others in sympathy and generosity. Our gratitude is so great that we cannot find a single word in which to express it fittingly. As to your entering the war on our side is also gratifying, but it is wiser to retain your armies over there in case our foe goes forth to assault your unprotected shores, as Glandelinia is as treacherous as the serpent who deceived Adam and Eve."

"Your Friend and Comrade, Emperor Vivian...."

However all this was really only preliminary. On June the 14th, The governments of all christian nations spoke for the whole of their people, in voting the splendid sum of $600,000,000..... for relief work in the devastated Olverinian coast countries, and the Emperor Vivian warned all these nations by Telegram and Cablegram.

"If you desire to send provisions to us, send your ships well guarded, as our foe Glandelinia is as a big storm which has no regard for anything, and their submarines are as busy as bees."

However the answer came back from one of them as follows:;.;;

"The appalling calamity which has befallen the people of Olverinia, one of your Primi Primi Provinces and which is followed by distress and suffering throughout a wide region among many hundreds of thousands who have escaped with life but whose shelter, and food and means of living have been destroyed, did before appear very funny to me, but the fact that Glandelinia strives to frustrate our work of mercy in sending supplies verifies our suspicions very much, and we'll gain say that Glandelinia surely must have been utterly responsible. The ordinary machinery for supplying the ordinary wants of civilization has been even paralyzed by the enemy that is contending with your country, and as the exceptional emergency exists which demands that the obligations of Humanity should regard no limit of national lines, and which Glandelinia tries to turn to topsy turvy. Topsy turvy means that she is not only frustrating our efforts of Garitable intention by trying to destroy our relief and food ships, but is at war with us too, and when time comes we'll form a speedy intervention and wipe her for good and all off the map of the world."

Signed.

King of Blomlinia."

The immense debt of these civilized nations to Abbleannia, the strangely warm and steadfast brotherhood like friendship between that country and the others, the affection for their native land felt by great numbers of people who were Abbleannians in origin lands on touring, the abundance with which God has blessed many nations with a safe, all this prompted them to send immediate and effective relief, and to declare themselves at war with Glandelinia.

While therefore the governments of these many nations had thus sprang actively to the aid and continued to do so continually for those three months for the aid of stricken Olverinia and her provinces, the people of all these countries were engaged in the same fashion. Immense crowds were eager to contribute until the funds surpassed many a million in one nation alone. Even the Blomlinia government contributed 23,000,000 dollars and every civilized nation in the world added generously to the sum total. which was sent forth despite the Glandelinian Submarines. The tidings of the progress of the awful disaster in Olverinia and other states had barely reached the civilized nations if the of the world before the general Red Cross Society hearing of the great number of doctors and nurses wiped out by the disasters and the war itself, and of the need of the christian armies for so many doctors and nurses. That international realm of sympathy and charity was also actively active in its efforts to send aid of all sorts bringing all its energies and the opportunities of its organization to bear on the collection and despatch of the heavy funds for the benefit of the war victims.

Therefore money flowed with the most remarkable freedom into its many coffers and receivers and flowed out of them as freely for the aid of the sufferers from the catastrophe. Not if the disaster had been a true one would this have also been done in the United States but in many other lands would this activity had been manifest manifested, as they were in all of Abbleannia's other friends in this story, the International Red Cross Society being an informal union between all the Red Cross Societies of all the christian nations in union to the relief of the afflicted in every land and clime of the Olverinian Provinces. It was so organized as to make its labors wonderfully effective. They even came themselves to the disaster region, braving the perils of the war, the disasters and the fires, and every dollar sent for instance by the Red Cross of Blomlinia to the Red Cross of Abbleannia went only by cable order, and was put to work at once the cable orders therefore serving the purpose of the money itself. Thus almost even on the eve of the disaster beginning, 500,000 dollars had been telegraphed under the seas to Abbleannia, and the cash was there immediately forth coming for the purchase of supplies.

Shall we write here of the perils of the members of this help giving organization in Abbleannia in which the best instincts of the age were embodied. A brief statement of it will surely be of interest, showing what sort of a few Glandelinia was to even everybody in general.

The Red Cross Members I would say of Blomlinia came over to Olverinia in the face of submarine warfare and originated several societies for the care for the wounded and ill of the disaster. They were first joined together with the Abbleannian Red Cross and adopted the Abbleannian Red Cross as their badge and emblem. Conferences were held as to how to accomplish their purpose, as they observed there was grave peril and difficulties in their way, but the International Committee at Geneva Abbleannia, agreed to allow them that is the men and women of the organization to arm themselves.

The Red Cross Society of the United States because of certain disasters happening there, remained home to attend to their own and couldn't send any of their members. But they nevertheless showed their sympathy as far as the story will allow it to be told. It was due to the head of the Red Cross in Olverinia, that the war disasters of all sorts such as those of this big flood, famine, pestilences started by the flood forest fires, explosions, city fire disasters, the horrible result of battles, and massacres of children were added to war in the scope of such associations. This broader idea, applied probably if it would have been done by Mrs. Clara Barton herself, was immediately adopted by the societies of all the nations abroad and incorporated among their duties under the name of the "Abbleannian Succor." As a result all these Red Cross Members had collected and distributed large sums for the relief of suffering in such cases as the horrors of the Abbleann flood, the Olverinian Central Province famine which came as a result, the Angelina Agathia land of horror and flood, the Aronburg Run overflows because of its relieving the flood too much at once, the many other western disasters and on other occasions of urgent need of assistance. Many women joined them and a great Abbleannian Society was therefore definitely organized under a charter granted by the Congress of Olverinia in June 1913, and Emperor Vivian himself was chosen for its president. But because of the wide spread nature of the disaster, there was not enough members to reach, many had been shot by enemy snipers, others had over done their bit and grew ill from over exertion and no sleep in their mercy of acts and it therefore lacked completeness of organization for real effective work, the collection and expenditure of money being left to local groups, as a rule untrained to such dangerous work and unprepared for ready and effective aid in a sudden contingency.

To be obvious the weakness in its makeup as to combat with this situation more effectively two new features were therefore added, at its meeting on 30th of June, 1913.... A new and Extra Office of Director was therefore created its incumbent to be the executive officer of the Galverinian Central Committee to give his entire time to the work, and to represent the Red Cross in the distribution of money or supplies in any case of need. To aid him in this work a new class of members of the Society was also formed these to be called the Institutional Members and therefore they were drawn from the great charitable organizations of the war-torn country. Thus a trained director was aided by well trained assistants, and by the aid of such officials its effectiveness was greatly and magnificently increased, alike in the collection and distribution of funds and all the other demands upon its sole activity. In Galverinia therefore it was because of the extent of the horror divided into Three Departments, Those of War Relief, Emergency Relief, and International Relief, each under the care of a special board. And thus organized it rose in Galverinia at once to the same position as it is in other countries of the world. Emperor Vivian consented to be elected as its president, and in Galverinia and Abbeinnia it thus has the Abbeinnian Emperor and His wife at its head. His brother Hanson King of Abbeinnia State and from provinces and for all his life General Superintendent of the Abbeinnian and International Bureau of Charities accepted the position of Vice President and National Director, and on its War Relief boards were officers innumerable of the army and the navy. On its Emergency Relief board men and women and even elder children of wide experience in relief work, and on its International officers of the Abbeinnian Department of state..... Therefore this statement of the new and effective organization of the Abbeinnian Red Cross Society greatly aided by the International of other nations was of immediate interest in view of the "fact" that its services were so urgently called for throughout the ruined countries. Occupied at the time at first in the aid of the injured of the Christians and so forth in battle for which funds were even then being collected by the sale of Christmas War Cross Stamps, a sudden and immense test of its improved powers was made a little after the 10th of June when the tidings of the dire disaster in Galverinia came on the wires and cables under the ocean waves, and stirred in the heart of all nations to that labor of charity to which it is ever ready to respond. The branches of all the Society in every nation (not one one excepted) lost not an instant, leaping into the branch with the alertness and effectiveness for which they had long been notable. Throughout all Christian nations there was not a single city or town village or hamlet, which did not join without a day's loss of time in the efforts to raise the necessary relief funds, for the Galverinian disaster sufferers. From East, West, North and South came reports of record breaking contributions not as small.

By midnight it was estimated that many thousands of dollars had been subscribed from the smallest town to the fund, and from cities the funds were so big they had to be banked for the time being for safety. From Protesentia came tidings that its Red Cross Society had despatched a special car with hospital supplies for the wounded, and that a line of cars were being placed in readiness for sending on the following day, the Emperor to have them forward by ship to Galverinia.

From other countries similar news was received, and it was therefore evident that the energies of the Societies everywhere were enlisted in causing the prompt response to bring in more than was necessary. The first to leave Condencia on similar duty was Edmund Berette Trust of the Condencia Relief Committee who embarked for Galverinia to go in person to aid the stricken of that country.

So great was the activity of the Abbeinnian Society that it drew wonders while the foreign powers the International Society already had over $800,000,000 ready for use, and much of it had been cabled to the various Ambassadors at Sacramento city in Abbeinnia to be turned over to the Abbeinnian Red Cross Society. Through the latter Society it was decided that all relief for the war sufferers should be administered. By the Fourth of July the funds in the hands of the Abbeinnian Society had grown to a quarter of a billion of dollars, and this sum the Ambassadors delivered to Emperor Vivian the head of the Red Cross. Emperor Vivian was overwhelmed with emotion at this help being given him. However one of the greatest difficulties to be encountered was the prompt distributions of supplies, and therefore outside help was warmly welcomed. On the following day July the fifth the subscription to the Abbeinnian

Red Cross had swollen to four hundred billion, and on the sixth they had reached a total of half a billion all of which was cabled without delay for distribution by Emperor Vivian and the Society which he represented.

However subscriptions continued to come in during the following days and the benefit work of the Society was to continue as long as the disaster kept up the suffering of refugees. In aid of their labor the governments of the nations had prepared and sent to Abbeinnia the materials for as much rebuilding as possible, all red tape being swept aside so that the many ships could containing this material might be sent on without the slightest delay. With the lumber and stone were sent nails, putty putty and glass so that the houses could be restored with expedition. The remainder was to follow as soon as possible the whole being sufficient to shelter as many refugees as could be found.

The girlscouts and Redcliffe for fear that even in this town they may encounter Vandals, which was more than they desired, as they would miss ten to one in really fighting with them, re-started their return from the place toward the Christian lines. As they continued on Gladys herself said;

"The tale of the great explosions Gertrude, whether they really be eruptions or earthquakes or not seemed to have been unnecessarily brief in our newspapers. It is but a small birds eye view of one of the most destructive and the most terrible of calamities, that even nature if it was driven to it by the enemy has ever visited upon any country in the world since the days of the flood. In our State of Benfall there are a hundred cities that puts a person in mind of a Hundred Mesinas. Other places there are thousands of cities and towns that put a person in mind of a thousand Galvestons. Then too there are sixteen hundred places that put you in mind of a fifteen hundred St. Pierres. I wonder why the loss of life has never been figured yet. Can you account for that Gertrude?"

"Yes I can. The actual loss of life will never be found out. The flood has carried too much debris and bodies away to the sea. The most conservative estimate of the destruction wrought instantly at first, and then continued throughout these three months, and still progressing but gradually abating in all the known doomed cities and towns, and the country adjoining, not counting what the bat 1 battles and forest fires and enemy is doing, stagger the human mind to comprehend, and maybe without meaning to say a thing anything wrong I doubt if the Angels can figure it up themselves."

"It sure is a complication of cataclysms that before which all the nations of the world stand aghast," said Redcliffe. "I'll bet at the destruction of Abbeinn alone the loss was over a hundred trillion dollars in buildings alone not counting banks, and other properties."

"It is believed and said that poor Galverinia lost in this unusual disaster more of her children than both sides in the whole of this war up to now which is turning out to be the most deadly conflict of all historical records," said Gertrude. "If so I cannot comprehend it."

"It seems possible though," said Joy. "The loss of life in the Solicia horror of November 1912, when explosion flood, and fire destroyed that splendid province of Middle Galverinia was great enough, but it sure was very insignificant in comparison with this great preternatural disaster which devastated so great a Garden spot of the Galverinian country this year during the closing of May the loveliest month of the year. The destruction caused by the waters of Pond Solicia was hardly one hundredth part as great in the sacrifice of human life as was this immeasurable cataclysm which even yet fills the very world with horror and sorrow. And it is still a picture of most tragic pathos before which civilization stands in fearful and yet in fascinated awe."

"Yes and as the tidings of the great catastrophe continued so much to come in many strange items of interest became known and certain variations in the early tidings were made," said Redcliffe.

"What were they?"

"Well at first for instance it was reported that because of the force of the concussions that radical changes had been made in the depths of the river Norm it growing deeper in some places and shallower in others and that at a point in the river there had been fifteen feet of water shallow was water now prevailed. It was also reported that the shore line of Lake Mic-Holleston had greatly changed."

"I heard of that," said Gertrude. "In reverse of this opinion it was later really found out for facts that the line in front showed little if any change and that there was no geological effects of the convulsion in that locality. There is much exaggerated about it I'm sure."

"I happened to be present in the ruined city of Jessica and it was about the afternoon that day," said Redcliffe and I witnessed the daring rescue of the great treasures of the City Grand National Bank and the work had a most startling climax."

"Tell us about it," said Gertrude.

"Well the building was the strongest in the city of Jessica, and as I heard it had been specially designed to resist the greatest earthquakes. Even against the protests of the engineers, the city authorities had so constantly insisted on a deep foundation of concrete that it had been at last complied with. Above this were buildings several layers of alternate steel, iron and concrete, and the rest of the building had steel frames and even iron and concrete floors, no wood being in the building except except the window casings and the doors. In the big vaults were stored the bulk of all the saving banks deposits of that city, amounting to more than one billion six hundred million dollars in gold and cash, and bonds, and security securities amount to about fifteen billion or more. Strong as the super structure had been it had been totally damaged nevertheless, but the vaults were intact having been on the first floor. Large groups of Glandolinian Vandals had tried to loot the place on the day after the recession of the flood from the city, and many soldiers and citizens and the Vandals were shot in the fight that followed but the ghoulds were nevertheless driven away. Nothing nevertheless had been touched when the vaults had been opened after the flood for the first time but it nevertheless too fourteen days to remove the accumulated debris. The specie was safely removed under a strong guard well armed and brought aboard a river battleship. The day I was there was the thrilling one. They had removed the safes out containing the full account of the securities. A large force of men guarded from the onset of Vandals by a double line of about one thousand two hundred soldiers slowly hoisted the big boxes to the surfaces. Just after two o'clock they had succeeded with ladders and ropes in dragging the last one through what had been an entrance into the street. As I watched the operation there suddenly came close to us a terrific explosion as loud as if a 10,000 ton cannon had been fired close at hand. There was a cloud as if a great eruption had sprang from the building, the earth quaked and vibrated and a moment later the walls of the ruined building which had withstood the concussions and the force of the flood a few weeks before fell inward with a crash a great roar and crashing noise and a great suffocating cloud of dust rose high in the air. The soldiers fled off from the danger zone in time but they were not terrified as great as their danger had been. The last safe with its 10,000,000 dollars was deserted for a few moments until all was assured to be safe and the soldiers and toilers then returned while on a large number of them scoured around to find out what had caused the blast, as it seemed mighty suspicious. Had the explosion come ten minutes earlier probably half a thousand toiling men and a thousand soldiers would have been buried in the ruins and there would have been another great tragedy to be on record."

"Did they save all of the treasure?"

"Yes, all of it was safely recovered, and removed from the ruined city. The funds of many of the other banks amounting also to thousands of millions had already been removed by the toilers and brought to Angelina. Riches the only city having withstood flood and concussion in that territory though of course many of its tallest buildings were ruined. Much other wealth had also been recovered and all the treasure found was removed to the ships. Much clothing was found in many of the ruined cities so it was said."

"Couldn't anybody ever estimate even a trifle of the figured loss in the destruction?" said Gladys.

"At Jackson it may amount to about five hundred thousand dollars in ruined buildings—perhaps five times that sum may be nearer the truth. But it's hard to tell when no value to the buildings yet have been claimed. And you must understand too no one has yet been able to even imagine to attempt to count the cities and towns and villages which have been destroyed in such a large area and when it will be done no one can say. All are architecturally destroyed, as well as private interior belongings, and the believe is they include a population of a hundred million souls."

"I have heard of one thing," said Gertrude.

"What was that?"
